These banks do not redeem their notes; they do not comply with their contract with the people; they do not pay gold and silver coin for their notes. They do not redeem their notes in the mode pointed out by law. There is not a single charter organizing a bank in the United States that has not been forfeited by the express provisions of that charter. Suppose we enforce that forfeiture, have we not a right to do it? These banks are receiving now from the people interest on their circulating notes. Why should not that be paid and used for the benefit of the General Government? I know no reason.

I say, therefore, that it will be a wise act of legislation to induce the State banks to retire their issues, or to compel them to do so by taxation. It has been often said that this is an interference with the right of property. It is not. It only compels these banks to pay their debts and withdraw their circulation. It has been called a confiscation of existing rights. It is not. It does not confiscate a single right; and when these banks pay off their debts they only do what they have engaged to do: In ordinary times I would not interfere with them; but now, when it is indispensably necessary for us to reduce the volume of paper currency, I would compel the State banks to retire theirs; and I would not end there, and it is not the desire of the Government to end there. I know that the amount of United States notes now outstanding is entirely too large, and it is the determination of those who conduct the finances to reduce the volume of circulation. I know it is now being reduced day by day, and it will be reduced more. It will be and must be funded. There is no other course left. This large redundant circulation must be retired as rapidly as possible, but I ask you how it can be done now, with two systems of banks rivals with each other. Suppose the Government desires to reduce the circulating medium. The very moment the Government commences reducing its circulation, that very moment these banks would commence to increase theirs. There would be a pressure on the money market, and the banks would come in with new notes issued by them, and increase the circulation. The Senator refers to Indiana. Although the Government has been reducing its circulation for the last six months, I have tables before me showing that certain banks in every one of the eastern States have largely increased their circulation. These tables, which I will print, show a wonderful exhibit. At a time when every man in the country nearly is crying out against the inflation of paper money, these banks, scattered all over the principal commercial States, are largely inflating their issues. In the State of Maine, here is a selection of twelve banks, showing an increase in the last six months of $311,410. In the State of New Hampshire there is an increase in twelve banks—the banks with the largest increase of circulation are selected—within the last six months, of $146,325.

Mr. POMEROY. That is without any increase of capital.

Mr. SHERMAN. With no increase of capital and no redemption. In the State of Vermont—the State so ably represented by the honorable Senator, [Mr. COLLAMER]—twelve banks in that State have in the last six months increased their circulation $450,349, or thirty-two per cent. of their aggregate circulation. In the State of Massachusetts twelve banks have increased their aggregate circulation in six months $827,278. In the State of Rhode Island twelve banks whose total increase is $160,660, or twenty-five per cent. on their old circulation. In the State of Connecticut there is an increase in twelve banks of $314,132, or eighteen per cent., and that at a time when everybody admits that there is an inflation of the paper money, and when it is an offense, not against the public morals, but against the public safety, to further increase the volume of circulation.

In the State of New York the total increase is $1,254,087, of which $530,970 was in the city. In New Jersey a list of twelve banks shows an increase of $499,539, or thirty per cent. on their circulation within the last six months. In Pennsylvania in twelve banks there is an increase of $1,266,443, or twenty-five per cent. on their circulation; in Maryland there is an increase of $754,096, or thirty-eight per cent. by nine banks. The increase by four banks in the State of Delaware is $55,725.

I know that in Ohio and Indiana and the Northwest generally, the circulation of State banks has decreased; and why? Because our banks are gradually going into the national system, where they do render an active aid to the Government by the purchase of United States bonds and by coming under the general supervision and control of the national authorities. But the banks in the States I have designated have largely inflated their paper money at this time when every man knows that it is improper to increase it. What power have we over them, what power has this great Government over these banks? They may issue tomorrow $100,000,000 of their notes, and what power have we over them? They would forfeit their charters, it is true; but they have forfeited their charters at any rate already. When every addition of $1,000,000 to our aggregate circulation is destroying the vital element which sustains the national life, here are these banks behind your power and control inflating the currency, running rivals to the national Government in the issue of paper money. In a time of war the issue of paper money is the same as coining money; gold having disappeared there is nothing but paper money, and when a bank issues paper money it coins money. This is the very highest attribute of sovereignty, carefully reserved to the national Government by the Constitution. These banks, then, in issuing money in this time when money is superabundant, coin money in express violation of the Constitution, and exercise that function of sovereignty which Congress alone has the power to authorize.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio whether his table shows the increase of circulation of the different State banks from the time the law authorized the issue of the legal tender Treasury notes until the present time.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. But I will tell the Senator that he will find full information on that subject in the Finance Report which is on his table, or he can get it by sending for it. I give these figures because they are later than those shown by the published reports. I know that there are other causes of inflation besides the issue of bank paper, and it would be very wrong for any one to leave the impression that that alone is the cause of bank inflation. One fruitful source of inflation is the common habit adopted now in the city of New York and extending all over the country, of using certified checks where money is never paid; and these certified checks are used precisely as currency. I have it from intelligent bankers engaged in the business, that nothing has tended so much to inflate the currency of the country as the use of certified checks in the form in which they have been used; but that is not all.

The Government of the United States has undoubtedly tended to inflate paper money by the issue of United States notes, but there is this material difference between the banks and the Government in this respect. The Government has been compelled by the necessities of war to issue its paper money in order to furnish a circulating medium to pay the soldiers and to carry on the operations of war. The banks, however, have no excuse for their increase of circulation. They do it for gain, for profit, to the manifest detriment and injury of the public credit and of the whole country, because every citizen has his property affected by this enormous inflation. The Government has been compelled to issue paper money by its stern necessities. It has had no choice. If it had any choice I would not resort to it for one. It must use paper money in order to carry on the war; but the banks have no such pretext and no such reason. They issue their paper money now when they know that all the channels of circulation are filled. I say, therefore, that it is an act of patriotism in them to retire their circulation; and I am thankful that the State Bank of Indiana and the State Bank of Ohio have done their share in this respect. All I desire by this amendment is to induce them or compel them to withdraw their circulation, and thus leave the channels of trade to be filled by the circulation of United States money.

But it was said the other day by my friend from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] and I am sorry he is not here, as I wish to reply to one or two observations that he made, that the national bank bill which we passed the other day tends to create the same inflation. The purpose of that bank bill is, and I believe the effect of it will be, to reduce the circulation; and why? It will be necessary, I have no doubt, in the process, to induce the State banks scattered all over the United States to go into the national system or to retire from the field. That will be done. I think an unhealthy competition long continued between these two systems of banks would be injurious to both. I wish that the State banks themselves would look at it in a patriotic view and see that two rival systems standing side by side, filling the channels of circulation, cannot exist and prosper. One or the other must give way. I have no doubt of it. The objection to the State banks is that they are diversified; they are not under a common head; they are under no common control; they make no common reports; they have no common security, no common basis of redemption, no common system of exchange. The most that can be said of them is that the banks of the State of New York are compelled to redeem in the city of New York.

This system of local bank paper will not answer the purpose; and it is a good old Democratic doctrine that the Government must not rely upon the use of local bank paper. It cannot use it as currency. We have provided a medium through the national bank system by which the State banks, without a sacrifice of any interest of theirs, may go into the system based on national stocks, where they will be compelled by their organization to render the Government some aid in the purchase of bonds, and where they will be under the control and supervision of Congress, and, through Congress, of the people, where they may be called to account, where their circulation may be limited, where all their functions and operations may be controlled by the public will, for the national banks depend solely on the public will; they are always within the power of Congress; every man who goes into them knows that the system must be so conducted that the public sentiment will sustain them, or else they will go to the wall. The law organizing them may be repealed, and they may be driven out at any time by the power of Congress. They are under bonds for good behavior. They file in the vaults of the United States more than the amount of their circulation in bonds of the United States taken at this time when it is necessary for us to sell our bonds. I say these two systems running rival with each other will undoubtedly endanger each other, and therefore it is our duty and our right, exercising the sovereign power of Congress, to compel the local banks either to retire from the field or to go into the national system.

But, Mr. President, the remark has been made several times, and I may as well answer it now, as I do not wish to continue this discussion long, "Why issue bank paper, why not continue the issue of greenbacks without interest, and let the Government get the benefit of the interest?" There are several answers to this suggestion. The first is that paper issued without any plan of redemption is always uncertain and unstable, and tends to inflate and depreciate the currency. The greenbacks are simply a promise of the Government of the United States, redeemable in bonds. To the amount of a reasonable circulation, say two or three hundred million dollars, they would be nearly equivalent to gold; but the very moment you issue more than that you depreciate their value. The aggregate notes of the United States now, about $400,000,000, are not worth as much in gold and silver as $250,000,000 would have been if only $250,000,000 had been issued. We know that very well. Every issue tends to depreciate their value. The ease with which this paper can be issued, the fact that it is not redeemable, that there is no private interest to protect it, operates against it. There is another and a very striking argument against the further use of United States paper money; and that is, that the experience of several nations, where the Government has issued too much circulating money, shows that the inevitable road which has been often traveled is, first, a decline, and, finally, repudiation. France repudiated her Government paper money. Our own Government repudiated the Continental money. That has been the history of large issues of paper money by all Governments; but it is very different with bank paper. No bank paper will be repudiated by the Government, because it is not a loan of the people, it is not a debt of the people who control the legislation of Congress, but it is the debt of banks, of private individuals, of private associations, who are bound by the law to redeem their notes. No Government will ever relieve a bank from that liability.

Therefore it is that the notes of the Bank of France, which is a private corporation, are just as good as gold and silver. They may fluctuate backward and forth occasionally, but after all the French people will demand that the private individuals who have invested in the Bank of France shall redeem the notes of that bank. So in Great Britain, the notes of the Bank of England are not the debt of the people, but they are the debt of the corporations, the individual citizens who own the bank, and the people of England will always insist that those notes shall be redeemed. If the question should ever come up hereafter in future times, and we should have a large issue of paper money outstanding without any foundation for it except the credit of the Government; there would be a bare possibility, although I can scarcely conjecture it, that the United States might do what other nations have done. That, however, can never be the case with notes which individuals are bound to pay, which individuals have pledged their property to pay, which individuals are personally liable to pay. The nation will always enforce such a contract against individuals, though it might not as against itself; and therefore it is that bank paper secured by the Government is always better than the Government paper itself. If the United States should repudiate the greenbacks, it might be excused by the example of other nations; it would be a wiping out of a debt of the people of the United States, it operating as an unjust form of taxation, but the people will never allow the owners of these banks, the men who take stock in the national associations, to repudiate their notes until not only the stocks in the hands of the Government are exhausted and sold, but until their individual liability is exhausted, and that is more than ample to redeem them whatever may come.

It is for these reasons that bank paper, secured by the Government, has sanctions and securities that are not contained in the mere issue of Government circulation, because it has the liability of the Government in the first instance, based also upon the liability of individuals, with the interest of the whole community to compel the banks to pay their debts. The national bank currency will be better and less in danger of repudiation than the greenbacks, though I have entire faith and confidence in both.

But, Mr. President, it is said that the issue of this national currency has the same effect as the issue of local bank paper, and that it will tend to depreciate the value of United States paper. So it would if you kept out in circulation all the United States money you now have out, and also authorize the issue of national bank currency besides. The inevitable effect would be to destroy both; both would go down together; but, sir, I take it to be the policy of the Government, as it is the plainest dictate of reason, to retire its circulation at least as fast as the national bank currency is issued. We can do it by funding; we can do it in various ways. We must do it. If the United States continue to issue its own notes in the form of currency and also authorize national bank notes to be issued par passu, both together, in overwhelming amounts, as a matter of course the result would be to destroy all values; but I take it that it is and must be the policy of the Government to retire as rapidly as possible the United States notes and to substitute for them the national currency. It may not be done to-day; it may not be done to-morrow. It will be a gradual process, taking time. It is a slow operation. The sad perils and necessities of war may keep this money outstanding longer than it ought to be, but still that the policy of the Government will be what I have just stated no man can doubt.

Suppose to-morrow we should hear of great and glorious victories from our armies in the West and our armies in Virginia; suppose confidence should be restored in this country and the Union restored, how rapid a process would the funding of all the United States notes be! Very rapid. Every man then would have confidence in the Government. Although the debt of the United States now may be $1,700,000,000, who doubts the power of the Government to pay the interest on this debt and very rapidly to pay the principal? Even the retirement of $200,000,000 of outstanding circulation would be worth more to us than a great victory, by reducing the value of gold and removing the perils and dangers by which we are now surrounded. I say, therefore, that the national bank circulation will be of great importance when we shall step out of this stage of war into the stage of peace, when the notes of the United States shall be funded and retired from circulation and we again assume it in the form of a debt. Then this national currency, made uniform in its redemption, in its execution, in its security, in its law, will furnish us what we never have had in this country, a national currency founded upon the public faith, secured by the public bonds, and also doubly secured by the individual liability of the stockholders and the interest of all the persons engaged in the system.

Mr. President, I have said all that I desire to say in regard to taxing banks, but as the tax bill is now under consideration I will occupy a moment or two in relation to the general merits of the bill. In my judgment this effort to codify our tax law this year was unwise. I believe that all that is vital and essential in this volume of law might have been far better condensed into five or ten pages. But still the House of Representatives, being the judges of this subject, have sent us this bill. In my judgment it is not sufficient. It is trifling with a great duty and is inadequate to sustain our vast expenditure. I believe that a simple law trebling the income tax, or raising it to ten per cent., (not a very high war income tax), a tax of about twenty per cent. on manufactures, would be far better than this complex mammoth bill. I would levy it any moment. If Senators will look back to the discussions in the early history of the Government they will notice a very singular change of opinion in regard to taxation. In the First Congress when the first impost law was framed duties on imported goods were put at the rates of five to twelve and a half per cent. They hesitated whether they would put three per cent. or five per cent. on many articles. They finally concluded, as the country was terribly in debt, that they would levy a duty of five per cent. on certain imported goods. They looked then upon a tax upon imports precisely as we do now upon a tax on manufactures. A duty of fifty per cent. on all the manufactures of this country would not add to the price of the articles sold by the manufacturer one half as much as your inflated currency has added to that price.

Take bar iron in its roughest state, the simplest production of labor; it was worth before this war commenced about $50 a ton; it is now worth $140. It is true this is partly caused by the demand for labor; many causes operate in this matter. It has more than doubled in price. The inflation of the currency has contributed some to it as well as the absence of labor. How much now does the little tax of five dollars a ton we have put on that article contribute to its cost? Nothing whatever. If we had a stable currency, limited in amount, well regulated, controlled by law, so that the people would have confidence in it, a tax of twenty-five or even fifty per cent. on all the domestic manufactures of this country would not be felt by our people. It would be cheerfully and promptly paid. The tax we here impose does not add materially to the cost of the article. A system of taxation could be devised that, in my judgment, would yield much more revenue; but I do not propose to offer any such amendments, nor do I suppose the Committee on Finance will, and may entirely disagree with me in these propositions. We would not be justified in the present condition of the country in delaying this tax longer in order to change and modify this, or adopt a new system.

This bill, such as it is, has been sent to us; we ought to pass it. It is said it will yield $250,000,000, but I believe that an income tax of ten per cent. on all incomes above the mere product of a man's daily toil, a tax of twenty-five or even fifty per cent. on manufactures fairly collected, a large tax on those articles of luxury consumed by the rich, and then a tax on common carriers who are but the freight agents of this country, would yield more than twice as much, with far less trouble and expense in collection. We could then dispense with all the insignificant and trifling taxes with which the bill abounds. A tax of one half of one per cent. on gold dug out of the bowels of the earth in California is perfectly insignificant. We have never exercised our power of taxation. The wealth of this country and the manufacturers of this country are capable of bearing an enormous taxation. We could pay twice the amount levied by this bill. I do not feel alarmed at taxation. I feel more alarm at the condition of the currency than I do at any system of taxation or on account of our public debt. If we could reduce the currency by a wise system of legislation to a stable basis, so that every man would feel that the note he held in his hands was the representative or nearly the representative of gold and silver, we should have no difficulty by taxes in carrying on the war. A system of taxation might be devised that would yield $500,000,000, which could be paid now better than at any other time. Now, prices are necessarily inflated by the war, but when the war is over there will be a period of depression. Now is the time to collect taxes. England for years collected sixty per cent. of her enormous war expenditures in her struggle with Napoleon; her income tax was raised to fifteen per cent; many of her taxes would now be considered almost fabulous.

We have all this rich mine of taxation open to us. We have a people who are patriotic beyond comparison, a people every where demanding a just and fair system of taxation; nowhere complaining that the burdens of this war are thrown upon them. They feel that their national existence, all that is near and dear to them as citizens, as families, as States, and as a nation, is depending on this contest. They do not complain of the burdens that are heaped upon them; they demand those burdens; all they ask is fairness and equality.

Sir, I believe that if Congress should now resume its just and legal power over the currency of the country, and control all currency with its mighty power, we might do more good to our country than General Grant can do even by a great victory at Richmond. Yes, sir, although the State Bank of Indiana may be a very good bank, although the State Bank of Ohio may be, as I know it is, a very excellent bank, yet as the $167,000,000 of State bank currency is now a part of our circulating medium, it fills a place that is dangerous to our peace, dangerous to the condition of our country. I would, without doing any unnecessary injury to the owners of this property, put it out of the way, compel these bank proprietors to pay their debts, to retire their circulation, and conform to the general laws prescribed by Congress, or else cease to do the business that now inflicts a great national harm. Then, sir, I would, if necessary, by law, although I do not believe it is necessary to pass any such law, adopt a policy that would compel the funding of the United States notes to an amount that is reasonable, even if necessary by a sale in open market for what they will bring of the bonds of the United States. It is better for us to sell our bonds even below par than to continue this enormous inflation of paper money. Then, sir, by a wise system of taxation we could approach very nearly our expenditures, and the difference between our expenditures and receipts should be paid by the sale of bonds of the United States. Make them a mortgage on the future earnings of our country. I believe we should do more good to our country by such a financial system than even General Grant can do at the head of his army against our foes at Richmond.

Synopsis of increase of circulation in State Banks (as shown by report made to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue) from October, 1863, to April, 1864.

MAINE.

Seventy-one banks, of which but thirty-eight show circulation for both periods, October, 1863, and April, 1864.

Of these thirty-eight twelve exhibit an increase, as follows:

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It becomes the duty of the Chair, under the order of the Senate, to announce that a recess will now be taken until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask the consent of the Senate to have an amendment printed which I propose to offer to the bill (S. No. 286) to prohibit the discharge of persons from liability to military duty by reason of the payment of money.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, and the order to print be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON submitted amendments which he intends to offer to House bill No. 405, to provide internal revenue, &c.; which were received, and ordered to be printed.

PORT OF ENTRY AT PLATTSBURGH.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to suspend all previous orders, and take up the bill (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes. I think there is no objection to it.

Mr. CLARK. I hope we shall not postpone the bill before the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill will not take time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) If there be no objection, the motion will be regarded as carried, without displacing the regular order.

The bill (H. R. No. 120) was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal the third section of an act to equalize and establish the compensation of the collectors of the customs on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, changing the port of entry for the district of Champlain from Plattsburgh to Rouse's Point, and to reestablish Plattsburgh as the principal port of entry for that district, at which the collector of customs shall reside; and a deputy collector is to reside at Rouse's Point, and be vested with all the power and authority given to deputy collectors by law; and all vessels coming into Lake Champlain from Canada, through the Richelieu or St. John's river, are to enter and report to him.

Mr. MORGAN. At the suggestion of the Senators from Vermont, I move to strike out the last clause of the bill in these words: "and all vessels coming into Lake Champlain from Canada, through the Richelieu or St. John's river, shall enter and report to him."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLARK. There are several amendments which have been unanimously agreed upon by the Committee on Finance to perfect the bill, and while Senators are coming in perhaps the pending amendment may be informally passed over, and I can offer these amendments in behalf of the committee.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent, there being a pending amendment. If there be no objection, that will be passed by for the time being to consider other amendments moved by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend by striking out, in the first section of the bill, the words "an office is hereby created in the Treasury Department to be called the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate, and, with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, a Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with an annual salary of $4,000, who," and in lieu of them to insert, "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose annual salary shall be $4,000." I will state what is the object of this amendment, and several others which I shall offer in connection with it. It is to prevent the giving of new bonds by the Commissioner, Deputy Commissioner, cashier, assessors, and inspectors, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON. Leaves them in under the present law?

Mr. CLARK. Leaves them in under the old law. The office of Internal Revenue Commissioner was established by the old law, and I propose to let him stand under the old law, so that his old bond will hold good.

Mr. WILSON. I doubt the wisdom of this amendment, and I have prepared an amendment that I intended to offer to this section, requiring that immediately after the passage of this act the President shall appoint a Commissioner. I desire to have this bill so framed that it will require the appointment of a new Commissioner immediately. I think the great interests of the country demand it. I think that it depends very much upon the man what we are to receive as revenue; that some men will raise from fifty to one hundred million dollars a year more than others. I have not a word to say against the gentleman who at present fills that office, but in my judgment it requires one of the very first men of this country to fill that place. He ought to be a man fit for the office of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States. The salary ought to be larger than $4,000; it should be at least $6,000. I find in this bill that the Commissioner, who ought to be one of the foremost men of this country, a man fit to take any Department of this Government, is to have $4,000 a year, while some collectors in some of the districts may have $5,000.

I do hope that we shall not attempt to legislate the present Commissioner in his place; but I hope that it will be so amended that it will require that a new Commissioner shall be sent into this body, and that the Executive will understand that we demand one of the first men of this country. We want a man who will cast his eye over the whole country, who will sleep with his hands upon the wires, who will know every man under him, who he is and what he is, and all about the condition of every district of the country. We want a man of power, of influence, who knows how to interpret the laws, and how to administer the laws. We want the President to understand that if such a man is not sent in the Senate will not confirm him. I hold this to be one of the most important things before the country; that in assessing these great taxes upon the country there shall be put at the head of the Internal Revenue Department one of the ablest men of this country.

There is nobody who will pretend that the present gentleman, respectable as he is, is that man. Few men in the country are fit for the place, very few men; and I think the Senate should demand in passing this bill that if we have such a man in the country he shall be put at the head of this great department of our Government. The present condition of our finances demands this action, and we shall be false to duty if we fail to place a first-class man at the head of the Internal Revenue department, which is to collect three fourths of the revenues of the nation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to one point in the proposed amendment. I believe all our courts have held that when you change the duties of an officer, or impose a new duty upon an officer, the securities that he formerly gave are not bound.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That depends on the character of the bond and the form of the law.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am told by gentlemen around me that the Supreme Court have decided the reverse of what I have said. If so, I am mistaken.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If my colleague will allow me, I will state that it depends on the character of the bond and of the law. The bond may be so drawn as to make the securities responsible for additional duties imposed upon the officer, and I think that was provided probably in the other law and in the bond. If so, the securities are bound.

Mr. RICHARDSON. My opinion had been in reference to the law on that point that you had to require the securities to give their assent before they were bound.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not if the law provided when the man took the office, and the bond provided that in case other duties should be cast upon him, he would discharge the duties of the office and any additional duties imposed upon him by law. Then if the securities enter into that bond with that understanding, I see no difficulty.

Mr. McDUGALL. That is the law undoubtedly; but is that the case in this instance?

Mr. CLARK. I did not suppose, Mr. President, that it was the object of the House of Representatives or of the Senate in framing this bill to legislate the Commissioner out of office. I should agree with much that has been said, perhaps with all that has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts in regard to the qualifications of the person who shall hold this office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It should be filled by a man of extraordinary ability, of fine talent, and great watchfulness; but I did not suppose that Congress would wish to take the extraordinary course of abolishing the office and establishing a new one to get rid of the incumbent. If that be so, and the Senate come to the conclusion that it is best for them to retain the provision of the bill for the purpose of turning out the incumbent and establishing a new office, then I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that that should be done in regard to the whole of them, that you should not single out by legislation this one man and discharge him in that way. I submit to the Senator whether it would not be best to make the effort in another direction, because if you legislate the man out of office you have no surety that the President will not appoint the same man.

Mr. WILSON. The Senate can take care of that.

Mr. CLARK. That may be or may not be. I think we have had a great deal of experience in that direction. I think it may be worth the Senator's consideration whether it would not be best to let the bill be perfected; let the amendment be made in Committee of the Whole, and let us see what we get from the bill, and then he can retain his control of it in the Senate.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. McDUGALL. Having just come in, and not understanding exactly the run of the debate, I should like to know how the amendment affects the status of the present Commissioner.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment that I propose allows the present Commissioner to remain in his office. It does not abolish the office or create a new one. I move the amendment for that purpose, to leave the Commissioner in his old office, with his old bond standing until he is removed, or in some other way out of the office. I will suggest to Senators, as I have done already, to let the amendment be adopted and let us perfect this series of amendments; let us see how the bill looks, and then the Senate will have control over it; and if when the Senate is fuller it chooses to take the extraordinary course suggested for the purpose indicated, I do not know but that it will be wise; I do not know but that I shall go with the Senator from Massachusetts if that is thought to be best. I concur with him in his object to a very great extent, but I should desire to reach it in another way if I could.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a whole series of amendments now offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, simply to carry out that idea, in order to avoid impairing the validity of the bonds, to recognize the offices as continuing. The Presdent, of course, will have power of removal ample and complete, and it is very important to preserve the existing liability of the bonds. If the bill should pass as it came from the House of Representatives, the securities would be discharged and the bonds released, and new appointments would have to be made; and besides that, the probability is we should lose the benefit of the income tax for this year. It is a very serious question. I hope, therefore, the Senate will adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire, simply for the purpose of preserving the bonds and the liability of the sureties. If the President chooses he can make removals and send in new appointments at any time; but we ought not to force him to make removals or changes by legislation.

Mr. WILSON. On the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, to allow him to present his amendments and perfect the bill as he desires in committee, I will withdraw opposition to his amendment at the present time; but I certainly want it understood that before this matter is closed I shall want an understanding about this bill, for I have no heart to vote for a bill to be administered as the law is now administered in the country.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I will labor with him cheerfully to accomplish his object.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill upon the 4th page, section three, by striking out after the word "that" in the first line of the section down to "shall" in the sixth line, and inserting what I send to the Chair.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

The President shall appoint in the Department of the Treasury, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a competent person, who shall be called the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with an annual salary of $2,500, who.

The words proposed to be inserted were read, as follows:

The Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose annual salary shall be $2,400.

So as to read:

That the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose annual salary shall be $2,400, shall be charged with such duties in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, &c.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire, does he mean to withdraw him from the confirmation of the Senate?

Mr. CLARK. Not at all. I propose to leave him standing under the old law as I did the Commissioner.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Very well.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move to strike out "who" at the close of the eighth line of section three, so as to read, "and shall act," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill in the sixth section, page 5, by striking out after "that" the words "the President of the United States is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a competent person, who shall be called the cashier of internal duties, with a salary of $2,500, who," and inserting in lieu thereof "the cashier of internal revenue, whose salary shall be $2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On the 6th and 7th pages I move to strike out the whole of section seven and to insert the following section in lieu of it:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States may divide the respective States and Territories of the United States and the District of Columbia into convenient collection districts, and may after such districts as the public interests may require, and may include any of said States and Territories and the District of Columbia in one district; but the number of districts in any State shall not exceed the number of Senators and Representatives to which such State shall be entitled in the present Congress.

The only effect of the amendment is to leave the assessors and collectors under the old law.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have the law read for information.

Mr. CLARK. It is precisely as it is here.

Mr. DAVIS. Then there is no necessity for striking it out.

Mr. CLARK. It is for the purpose of preventing them from being obliged to give new bonds.

It maintains the organization and prevents appointing new assessors and new collectors or giving new bonds.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend by inserting in the seventh line of the eighth section, after the word "Treasury," the words "whenever there shall be a vacancy or the public interests shall require."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I further move to amend by striking out all after the word "that" in the first line of section one hundred and seventy-three, on page 229, down to the proviso on the 230th page, in line thirty-three, and to insert in lieu of the words stricken out the following clause:

The following acts of Congress are hereby repealed, to wit: the act of July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt," except the one hundred and fifteenth and the one hundred and nineteenth sections thereof, and excepting further all provisions of said act which create the offices of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, and inspector, and provide for the appointment and qualification of said officers; also, the act of July 16, 1862, entitled "An act to impose an additional duty on sugars produced in the United States;" also, the act of December 25, 1862, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1, 1862;" also, the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1, 1862, and for other purposes," except the provisions of said act which create the offices of Deputy Commissioner and cashier of internal revenue and revenue agents and provide for the appointment and qualification of said officers; also, the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth sections of the act of July 14, 1862, entitled "An act increasing temporarily the duties on imports, and for other purposes;" also, the second section of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more certain and speedy collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes;" so far as the same applies to officers of internal revenue; and also, the act of March 7, 1864, entitled "An act to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes," together with all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith.

It repeals the same acts that are provided to be repealed by the section as it stands, but in different language, except those clauses which create the offices that have been retained.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it:

That so much of an act entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1861, as imposes a direct tax of $20,000,000 on the United States, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that amendment will not be made at this time without further consideration. It was not the design of the committee to repeal that act, but to leave it suspended as it now is.

Mr. SHERMAN. In case the amendment of the Senator from Iowa be adopted, he should also propose to strike out the exception of the one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of 1862, which otherwise would continue the direct tax.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Iowa can move to insert his amendment at any time. It does not qualify this amendment of the committee. It only adds to it.

Mr. GRIMES. As I understand it, the Senator's amendment alludes to the particular section that I wish to have repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is a little mistaken. The act that he proposes to repeal is the original act which provided for the direct tax; but that act was modified and suspended till 1865 by a section reserved from repeal by the Senator from New Hampshire, so that in order to accomplish the purpose of the Senator from Iowa he must not only repeal the original act providing for the direct tax but repeal also the one hundred and nineteenth section of the act of 1862, which is expressly reserved from repeal by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GRIMES. I think my object will be accomplished by repealing the original act. There is an act passed since that that suspends the operation of the act of August 5, 1861.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that second act expressly provides that after 1865 this direct tax shall be put on. If you repeal the original act, you may still leave the direct tax to stand.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I withdraw my amendment for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend by inserting after the word "assessed," at the end of the thirty-fifth line of the one hundred and seventy-third section, the words "or liable to be assessed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I further move to amend the bill at the close of section one hundred and seventy-three, on page 231, by striking out all after the word "reappointment," which occurs in the forty-seventh and forty-eighth lines. The words to be stricken out are "upon the execution of new bonds and taken anew the oath of office."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. These are all the amendments which relate to that particular object. I have several further amendments, but I will give way if the Senator from Ohio desires to go on with his bank amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we may as well take a vote on that now. The Senate is about as full now as it will be to-night.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio to let that question lie over until the morning. I wish to say a little in reply to him in regard to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is not in my charge. I offered the amendment simply on my own account.

Mr. CLARK. I have sent to the committee-room for the chairman.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Why cannot the Senator from New Hampshire go on with his amendments?

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to offer an amendment if the Senator from New Hampshire is not going on.

Mr. CLARK. I will go on. I move to amend the bill on page 144, by striking out the item between lines four hundred and forty-six and four hundred and fifty-two of section ninety-three, and inserting in lieu thereof:

On tobacco manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stems, and not sweetened, twenty-five cents per pound.

On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, and all other descriptions, from which the stem has been taken in whole or in part, or which is sweetened, including fine-cut and shorts, thirty-five cents per pound.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know what is meant by the first class of tobacco there indicated.

Mr. CLARK. The committee meant to impose thirty-five cents duty on all tobacco which is manufactured by taking out the stems in whole or in part, and sweetening, including fine-cut.

Mr. SUMNER. The sweetening qualifies it.

Mr. CLARK. Stripping the outer stem and sweetening makes the line of distinction. The lower grade is that in which the stem is not stripped from it, and which is not sweetened. It is found to be a better line of distinction.

Mr. SUMNER. In what does the latter differ from what is sometimes called leaf tobacco?

Mr. CLARK. It does not differ from leaf tobacco with the stem in.

Mr. SUMNER. Such as you would find on the farm or on the plantation.

Mr. CLARK. Certain grades you will find on the farm or plantation. There is a difficulty about the provision as it now stands. By the provision of the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, smoking tobacco, which is manufactured of the leaf and stem ground up together, is taxed thirty-five cents a pound. It is thought by the committee and by others that that is too high, and that it is best to make a second grade. In the purchase of tobacco, say of one hundred hogsheds, you will get perhaps thirty hogsheds first quality and then fifty or sixty of inferior grade, some to be made into chewing tobacco and some into smoking tobacco with the stems all in. It was necessary to have a provision of this kind so as to include that description of tobacco, which we propose to tax at twenty-five cents.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know whether in point of fact and practically this is not a tax on what is usually known as tobacco in the leaf. I incline in favor of that tax, but I wish to understand precisely the effect of the language that is used, because such a tax as that would attract very great attention in the country, and if it were imposed I am sure it would be very profitable, though I do not know how popular it would be in certain quarters.

Mr. POMEROY. I feel no particular interest in this amendment myself, but I wish to state that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] feels a great interest in it; and the effect of the amendment, as he suggested to the Senate the other day, is that taxing stemmed tobacco is in fact taxing the raw material. The process in the West, especially in Missouri, now, is to take the stem out of the leaf and ship it. It is like shipping the raw material formerly. When we had water communication from the West all the way to New York, tobacco was shipped to New York in the stem, but since the communication is cut off by the way of New Orleans, and the article must be transported by rail all the way, the tobacco is stemmed before it is shipped, and the stemming process has no more to do with manufacturing tobacco than taking off the stalk has. The expense of transportation by rail is so much now that the tobacco raised in the West, in Missouri especially, cannot be sent East by rail in the stem. This taxing at thirty-five cents a pound with the stem out is taxing leaf tobacco as raw material thirty-five cents. That is the effect of it. I do not know that that is too high a tax; but it will have this effect: the manufacturing of it will have to be done West instead of East, because it will not bear transportation by rail all the way to carry the stems.

Mr. CLARK. I do not know that it affects the process of stemming, and it is necessary to tax the tobacco in this form to prevent a great deal of fraud. I am told by the Senator from Kentucky that not much of it, if any, is manufactured in this country, but that it is carried to the coast and exported. It is necessary, therefore, that it should be taxed in this country the same as other tobacco is, in order to prevent frauds and prevent its use without the tax; and if it is afterwards worked up in this country into cavendish or other forms of tobacco, it pays no additional tax, because the discrimination is made by taking out the stems and the process of sweetening. Where the stems are out and the tobacco is taxed, it does not bear any additional tax if it is worked into cavendish or anything else.

Mr. POMEROY. What is the tax on leaf tobacco under the old law?

Mr. CLARK. I cannot tell the Senator precisely now.

Mr. SUMNER. There is none on leaf tobacco.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought there was none, and this is virtually a tax of thirty-five cents a pound on leaf tobacco.

Mr. CLARK. On tobacco after it is stemmed.

Mr. POMEROY. The stemming process is no more than taking out the stalk.

Mr. CLARK. I understand it, and it stands precisely the same in the amendment I propose as in the bill that came from the other House. It does not make any alteration in that particular, except that in the other provision the stemmed tobacco is liable to be taxed again when it is worked into cavendish, plug, or twist. That ought not to be. It should only be taxed once. I think if Senators will examine the provision they will see, on looking at line four hundred and fifty-one of this section of the bill, that stemmed tobacco is taxed, and there is also a tax on cavendish, plug, twist, or manufactured, so that if stemmed tobacco is not manufactured tobacco, when it comes to be manufactured it is liable to be taxed again. We propose a new line of discrimination, which is stemming and sweetening.

Mr. POMEROY. It occurs to me that where we have imposed no tax before, thirty-five cents now is rather high. It may not be too high, however.

Mr. GRIMES. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will permit this amendment to lie over until the Senator from Missouri, who feels a very deep interest in it, shall return. He will be here to-night or to-morrow morning. It is a matter in which the people of Missouri are deeply interested; and I will say to the Senator that the people of my State are becoming very deeply interested, as are all the other people of the Northwest. As I understand the proposition it will operate to the injury of the Treasury, and only to the advantage of railroad corporations that transport our tobacco to the eastern markets, and to the advantage of the large manufacturers of tobacco. However, I may not comprehend it, but I prefer that it should lie over.

Mr. CLARK. I think it is very evident the Senator does not comprehend it.

Mr. GRIMES. Is the Senator willing that it should lie over?

Mr. CLARK. If such is the pleasure of the Senate. I want to make as much progress as we can; but if Senators are ready now to take up the bank amendment I am entirely willing.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will permit this matter to lie over.

Mr. CLARK. Very well; I am willing to let it go over.

Mr. POWELL. If the question is going to be laid over I should like to have the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

Mr. POWELL. I think the last amendment moved is very wrong, and should not be adopted. It needs modification, certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question properly before the Senate, which was passed over by unanimous consent, is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to section one hundred and nine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is further debated I will modify the amendment by making the tax on circulation one sixth of one per cent. instead of one fifth of one per cent. a month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By common consent that modification will be made on the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, but the amendment, having undergone amendment already, is placed beyond his control.

Mr. SHERMAN. One sixth of one per cent. a month would be two per cent. per annum on circulation up to ninety per cent. of the capital stock paid in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The modification will be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That modification being made, let me state the difference between the two sections. There is the same tax on deposits and the same on capital in the section which the committee reported as in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio; but while we propose a tax of one per cent. on circulation he proposes two per cent. Then there is a difference in the time of collecting the tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Maine if in the bill as reported by the committee there is not this discrimination against the State banks that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio contains?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Upon their issues over ninety per cent. of their capital stock there is a tax of one half per cent. semi-annually, which cannot be on the issues of the national banks, for the reason that they can only issue ninety per cent. of the amount of bonds.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was put in to make them equal and to prevent the excess of circulation. The national banks now can only issue ninety per cent. of the bonds they deposit.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But you tax all the issues of State banks, whether below or above ninety per cent., one half per cent. semi-annually first, and then you impose an additional tax of one and one half per cent. semi-annually on State bank issues which cannot be put on national bank issues.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator understands that the national banks can only issue ninety per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We allow the State banks to issue ninety per cent. of their capital on precisely the same terms and conditions. We design if they go over the ninety per cent. to put so heavy a tax on them as will make it unprofitable. The object is to restrict them also to ninety per cent. of their capital. It is not a discrimination against them, because we do it merely for the purpose of bringing them to the same ratio with the national banks precisely.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand then the difference between the taxation of the two systems is to be learned by taking this bill in connection with the bank bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We tried to make it equal, and I think we did.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was reluctant to say anything further on this subject this evening.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before my friend from Indiana proceeds, I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Ohio in lieu of section one hundred and nine will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was remarking that I was reluctant to ask the attention of the Senate to-night, for I am not in a condition to discuss this question on account of my health; but I am not willing to ask for a delay in the consideration of any part of this bill. An early adjournment is desired as much by myself as by any other Senator, and I shall therefore submit now a very few remarks in reply to some arguments presented by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The Senator from Ohio, with his usual frankness, states to the Senate that the purpose of his amendment is not so much revenue as to drive the State banks from the field, and to give up the commercial field not to the Treasury in its issue of Treasury notes, but to the system of national banks about being established, which was provided for by a law at a former session. I submit to Senators that that is not a proper motive to govern us in legislating on a revenue bill. This purports to be a bill to raise revenue; its consideration is claimed on the part of the Senate on the ground that it will increase our revenue, that it will supply to the Treasury that revenue which the condition of the country demands. Then, when we are legislating for that purpose, is it proper that we shall depart from that purpose with a view of striking a blow at any interest in the country? To legislate against the State banks with a view of driving their currency from the commercial world is not an effort to raise revenue, but an effort to favor one system of banking to the prejudice of another; and I submit that this is not a proper consideration to govern us in legislating upon a revenue bill.

But the Senator discusses the merits of the State banks; and first he says that they furnish but a local currency, that they cannot regulate exchanges. This is a very old argument, an argument that has been used from the time I believe that a system of national banking was first advocated. I suppose that we of the Northwest are as much interested in the question of exchange as the people in any other part of the country. The eastern States are not much interested in that question. The exchange for a number of years has been so trifling as not materially to interfere with the operations of our trade. Our currency at the West has been so good, it has had the confidence of the country to so great an extent, that exchange has been but very trifling against our section of country.

But the Senator says that the State banks furnish but a local currency, that the currency furnished by the State Bank of Indiana or of Ohio is not well received in the eastern States. That is not an argument in favor of revenue; it is not an argument to be addressed to the Senate, in my judgment. It might be an argument to be addressed to the Legislature of Indiana or of Ohio if a proposition were pending in the Legislature to repeal the charters of those two banks, but with us it is not a consideration as I attempted to suggest a moment since.

The Senator's main argument, however, is upon this proposition, that the inflated condition of the currency is the evil of which we now complain. That is true; and he says that $167,000,000 of this currency is furnished by State banks; but does the Senator propose to reduce the currency? Does the Senator propose to reduce the paper currency of the country by $167,000,000? By no means; he proposes simply to drive from the channels of trade a currency in which the people have confidence, and to supply its place with a currency that the people have less confidence in. It is to give place for the operations of the system of national banks. Instead of having $167,000,000 of State bank paper, the Senator proposes by this policy to give us at least $167,000,000 of free bank paper; a paper that cannot now compete with the State bank paper. If the Senator proposes to give us a better currency, if he proposes to give us a currency in which the commercial world will have greater confidence, if he proposes to give us a currency that will have good credit in every portion of the country, he need not be afraid of the contest between that currency and the State bank currency, because the better currency will control the contest and occupy the field. If the Senator proposes simply to reduce the currency by $167,000,000, there would be some force in his argument. I admit all that he says in respect to the condition of our trade so far as it is influenced by an excessive paper currency. I do not question that; but I do question the propriety of driving from the field by arbitrary legislation a currency in which the people have confidence, to supply its place by one that cannot take its place by virtue of its own merit.

The Senator as an argument against State banks has said that in the earlier days of the Republic our statesmen doubted the power of the States to authorize the issue of State bank paper. I believe he is correct about that; but it has now come to be established that the States may charter State banks and that those banks may issue bank paper as a currency or as money. That is not a question now, I believe, and it is hardly worth while to dig up from the grave that argument, which is now disposed of by the decisions of the courts. I will not discuss the question whether bank notes are bills of credit prohibited to the States by the Constitution or not; for the reason that I assume it to be a settled question by judicial authority. Whether that be so or not, it is not for Congress to undertake to decide that question. The States have incorporated these banks, they have issued their paper, and it is not for Congress to decide that the States had no authority to do this thing.

The next objection made by the Senator to the State banks is that having failed to redeem their paper money in gold and silver they have violated their charters. That argument might have come with some force from myself, but I think it cannot be heard from the Senator from Ohio. The charter of the State Bank of Indiana requires that that bank shall redeem every dollar in gold or silver; and why does she not redeem in gold and silver? She is prepared to-day to do it; she would experience no difficulty, as I understand, in redeeming her whole circulation in gold and silver. Why does she not do it? For the reason that the Senator in connection with the rest of his political party have made the Treasury notes a legal tender; and the supreme court of Indiana have decided, in a case taken before it last year, that it was competent under this law for the State Bank of Indiana to redeem her issues in this legal-tender money. It is not her charter; it is no action of the State of Indiana that has enabled the State Bank of Indiana to redeem in anything else than gold and silver; it is the policy that has been adopted by Congress making the Treasury notes a legal tender, and enabling the State Bank of Indiana and every other State bank to discharge their indebtedness, as it has enabled every citizen to discharge his indebtedness by the payment of Treasury notes. I thought it was a very singular argument coming from the Senator. Inasmuch as the courts have decided that under the law of Congress the State banks have the right to redeem their currency in the legal-tender Treasury notes, the Senator cannot say that those banks have forfeited their charters. I suppose he alluded to the fact that they had claimed to discharge their indebtedness in legal-tender notes when the Senator said that they had violated their charters, and he even went so far as to say that they had forfeited their charters. So far as there has been any decision of the courts on the subject, those decisions are uniform that the State banks may redeem their bills in Treasury notes. I believe that one of the courts in the State of New York at one time decided that they could not so redeem their currency; but the court of appeals, as I understand, has decided otherwise.

The Senator has admonished us that the gold disappeared from the country at the commencement of the war. It was not the war that drove the gold out of the country. It was something else; and I think the Senator from Ohio had something to do with that policy which has driven gold out of our country. I think the Senator from Ohio had something to do with the policy which has created the distance between the paper money of the country and gold and silver. By the very act which authorized the issue of Treasury notes, those very notes were depreciated in the market. That law did allow the receipt of those notes in the payment of customs at your custom-houses, and to that extent from the first they were a currency inferior to gold and silver. As I understand, the first issue of Treasury notes which were receivable in payment of duties never did fall but to a small percent. below gold and silver; but as soon as that issue was exhausted and this other class of Treasury notes came into the market with a prohibition against their being received in the discharge of duties, that very instant the difference between gold and paper commenced increasing, and has gone on until the present time. That is one of the causes of the depreciation of the paper currency.

Another cause is its enormous increase. As the Senator informs us, $400,000,000 have been issued under one law, and $200,000,000 under another law, making in all $600,000,000 of paper money issued by the Government. When the Senator makes this statement to the Senate, does it not strike every Senator that the statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury to which I have alluded, that the depreciation of the paper currency was owing to the increased circulation of the State banks, is not sustained? When but $167,000,000 of the bank issues are in circulation, and $600,000,000 of the Treasury notes are in circulation, it can hardly be said that the depreciation of the paper currency is owing to these $167,000,000.

The Senator called my attention to the tables to be found in the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury. If I understand those tables aright, I will make a statement from it. From 1834 to 1840 the average bank paper currency of the country was $120,904,000; from 1841 to 1845, $82,872,000; from 1846 to 1850, $117,133,000; from 1851 to 1855, $173,231,000; from 1856 to 1860, $193,228,000; from 1861 to 1863, $208,206,000. And now I understand the Senator to say that in the northern States the circulation is about $167,000,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The statement in that table I think shows that it is not any less now than at any previous period. It is, I said, $167,000,000.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I understand that is about the case, independently of the table furnished by the Secretary. I thought it was about $168,000,000. Senators will observe that between 1856 and 1860 the bank circulation amounted to $192,000,000; after 1860, and between then and 1863, it footed up to $208,000,000, being an increase of only $15,000,000, and since then it has fallen off very many millions of dollars.

Then, sir, is it fair to say that the inflation of the paper currency of the country, and its consequent depreciation, is chargeable upon the issues made by the State banks? The facts do not sustain the Senator; the facts do not sustain the Secretary of the Treasury. But, sir, if it be so, does the Senator order the Secretary of the Treasury by the present policy propose to remove the evil? His proposition is not to decrease the currency, but to supply the place now occupied by the State bank issues with money issued by the national banks. The amount being maintained, the effect cannot be changed. While we have so much currency, while the proportion between the paper and the gold of the country is as it now is, we cannot expect paper to come any nearer to the gold standard than we now have it.

What does the Senator propose? I do not speak of his proposition upon this particular bill alone, but upon this bill in connection with the bank bill which he has reported. He informs us, as we were before informed, that $400,000,000 of legal-tender Treasury notes are in circulation, together with $200,000,000 of interest-bearing Treasury notes. He then brings into the Senate and advocates the passage of a bank bill authorizing the national banks to issue $300,000,000 more of currency. According to his policy we shall have in the country $900,000,000 instead of $767,000,000 of paper money. He now shows that we have $600,000,000 of Treasury notes, legal-tender and interest-bearing; and that we also have $167,000,000 of bank paper, which makes $767,000,000 of paper currency, and his policy is to withdraw the $167,000,000 if possible and to supply its place with $300,000,000 more, to be issued, not by the Treasury direct, but by the national banks; and that is the policy of the Treasury Department by which the currency of the country is to be reduced and the difference between gold and paper money removed!

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the Senator does not wish to do me injustice; it is not a subject on which that could be desired.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think I said expressly, at least I ought to have said, that I had not the slightest doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury had so declared in public communications, and in every other way, that he intended to reduce the circulation of United States notes at least equal to if not more than the amount of national bank currency issued from time to time. I will now state a fact to the Senator that within the last month over sixteen millions of interest-bearing notes have been retired, and they will be retired just as rapidly as possible. The Senator is also probably aware that that species of paper money was issued under compulsion to pay bounties to soldiers, and the policy of the Secretary is to withdraw it just as rapidly as possible. The amount fixed by him in his annual report for the circulation of the United States notes was $400,000,000. The interest-bearing notes are to be retired. Every dollar of them that comes in in the ordinary course of payments at the Treasury is canceled and not reissued. It was issued under the circumstances by which the Secretary was compelled in December last to provide for the payment of bounties and other unforeseen expenses of the war. His own standard, according to his reports, fixes the amount of United States paper money at $400,000,000, and just to the extent that national currency is issued he expects to retire United States paper money. The Government of the United States is ultimately bound for the redemption of the national currency. The Senator ought not in justice to account the $300,000,000 as additional, but it is a part of the $400,000,000 which is fixed in the mind of the Secretary as the ultimate limit of paper money in this country.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not making any attack upon the Secretary of the Treasury; I was not in this connection charging him with improperly issuing the legal-tender notes or the interest-bearing notes. I may have something to say about that directly; but I was attempting to defend the State banks against the charge made by the Secretary of the Treasury. He has assumed to say that it is the presence of the State bank currency in the market that has depreciated the national currency. That is not the fact. The fact is that the State bank currency has been depreciated by the presence of the legal-tender notes. This day, in my judgment, the bills of the Bank of the State of Indiana would be worth nearly gold were it not for the fact that the bank may redeem them in the legal-tender currency furnished by the Treasury. The very fact that the bank cannot retire her currency shows that it is not in the way of the national currency. As I stated before, for three years the State Bank of Indiana—and I believe the same is true of the State Bank of Ohio—has been trying to retire her circulation; and she has not been able to do it, because in the market it is worth more than the greenbacks; and while that is the case the people will not pay it in to receive greenbacks in its stead. Can it be said, then, when the people are simply locking this money away, putting it in their pockets and in their safes, that it is causing an inflation of the currency? It is not the case.

But the Senator anticipated a question that would of course have been asked him. He asks, why does the Secretary of the Treasury then favor a national banking system instead of issuing the notes directly from the Treasury Department? That question has presented itself to my mind, and I presume to the mind of every Senator. Why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended, why does the Senator from Ohio advocate, the issue of bank paper by a national bank under a law such as has been passed by the Senate, instead of issuing the notes directly from the Treasury Department? The Senator has given one reason, and that reason is that Governments usually repudiate their obligation to redeem their paper currency. Does the Senator contemplate a possibility of that sort that we shall ever fail to redeem our Treasury notes, our interest-bearing Treasury notes or the legal-tender notes? He cannot. It is a question of ability on the part of the people to pay the taxes that will enable the Government to redeem this currency.

What is the practical effect? The Treasury notes, legal-tender notes, pass and circulate, of course. They must circulate, because they are a legal tender in discharge of indebtedness. Upon them the Treasury pays no interest. The holder of such a note feels secure that while the Government is maintained, while the credit of the Government is good, it will be a good paper currency in his pocket. He has the confidence in that which he has in his Government. The Secretary of the Treasury then says, "I will issue no more of this paper, but I will favor a national banking system;" and how does he do that? He first issues the bonds of the Government at six per cent. interest. He sells those bonds to the people. Persons wishing to establish a bank buy the bonds and deposit them in the Treasury, and then the banker receives, on the deposit of those bonds, bank bills from the Government, and he turns round immediately and loans those bank bills to the Government, and they then become the Government currency. With that the Government pays the soldier; with that the Government pays the contractor. But what is the effect? No better currency, no higher security, because the security for this bank paper rests upon the bonds of the Government; it is upon the faith and the ability of the Government to pay the bonds. That is the security of the bill-holder. And yet to get this currency into the market, to supply the place of the State bank currency with this currency, the United States is paying six per cent. upon every dollar of it. The bonds are lying in the Treasury, but the banker is receiving the interest upon those bonds, which are the security for the payment.

Then, sir, the Government, instead of furnishing the people any better currency, furnish what I think is not so good a currency as our own legal-tender notes, and for every dollar that finds its way into the market the Government is paying six per cent. That is the policy that has been adopted by the Treasury Department, a policy that costs us upon these $300,000,000 that are to be issued interest to that extent, interest payable in gold or silver equal to nine per cent., and that to supply the place of the State bank paper.

Senators say that this will be an unquestionable security in the hands of the holders. I do not intend to discuss that now. If the bank bill shall be in the Senate again in a shape proper for discussion, I may have something to say about it. I have never believed in the free-banking system. I opposed it in the State of Indiana. It subsequently proved a failure. I do not believe in it when supported and fostered by the General Government.

The value of this paper depends on the value of the United States stocks. While our bonds are taken at 110 in the market, of course this bank paper will be all good and the bonds will remain at 110 while the currency is so inflated that it will float them. The Secretary of the Treasury could not sell a six per cent. bond, payable in gold, until he had so inflated the currency of the country that it became a desirable investment under the depreciation of the currency. Does the Senator expect that this currency will remain so inflated without limit? I admit that while the Government has out $600,000,000 of notes in the market, the bonds will be worth par and above par; but when our currency is reduced, when it approaches the gold and silver standard, what then is to be the value of the bonds? The value will depend upon the ability of the people to pay the taxes. It will depend upon the ability of the people of the country to pay the interest in gold and silver upon the bonds. Do Senators not have some doubt that the time may come when that interest will not be paid in gold and silver?

I understand that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives announced, during one of the discussions of the present session, that he desired to meet the question at once, and that the interest on these bonds ought to be paid in paper. I did not read the debate, but I understood that a statement like that was made by him in the course of debate. I am not ready to take any such ground. As far as I am concerned, while the people are able to pay it, I shall vote for its payment. But when the currency is reduced, when hard times come upon the country, such as are sure to follow a terrible war like this, are Senators sure that these bonds will always be at par? Suppose the banker does not redeem this paper, then what is to be done? The Secretary of the Treasury, I suppose, is to sell in market the bonds. The banks are not going to fail in good times when there is an abundance of currency, when trade is flourishing, but the failure will come when the people can least bear a failure, when there is but little money in the country with which to buy stocks, when there is no special demand in the market for stocks, and that is the time when the Secretary will be called upon to provide for the failure of the banks to redeem at their counters this currency of the national bank system; and I ask the Senate then, when that time comes, when there is no demand in the market for bonds, when there is a scarcity of money, when there are hard times all over the country, if this is a good security dollar for dollar for the issues of the national banks.

The Senator has alluded to the fact that there is a personal responsibility on the part of the stockholders. I have never known a bill-holder yet to realize a dollar from the personal responsibility clause. We had it in our State; I have known law-suits about it; but I have not known one dollar to be collected on the personal responsibility clause in any charter; and I do not believe under this charter a dollar ever will be collected. As soon as the time comes for failures the stocks are generally found in the hands of persons from whom but very small collections can be made; at least up to this time it has been found to be a valueless provision in the charters. That, then, I regard as no security at all; and the only security filed here is the bonds deposited in the Treasury Department. While they remain at par we have the security; while there is a demand for them at par we have the security; but when the times come during which banks are likely to fail, my judgment is this will not be a good security.

What I have to say I will close, for I do not intend to discuss at this time the general banking system. I regard it as a very dangerous system, placing in the hands of one man a power over the values and business of the country that ought not to be placed in the hands of any one man; but my purpose was to vindicate the State banks from the charges that have been made against them. So far as I know, in the Northwest they have furnished the people a currency with which they were content and in which they had confidence. I have no patience with this war that is being attempted to be made against State banks, not with a view to give place to the Government money, but to give place to a system of banks that I regard, and the people regard, as not so good as that against which the war is being made.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I inquire if the amendment offered by way of substitute by the Senator from Ohio will be amendable if it shall be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not so as to qualify any portion of the body or text of the amendment; but additional matter, by way of provisos, may be added after its adoption, if it shall be adopted as a substitute.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer a proviso, which I will read. If it will be in order to offer it after the substitute amendment is adopted, I will defer offering it until the vote is taken on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. If not, and it is in order now, I will offer it now as an amendment to his substitute. It is in these words:

And provided further, That the notes or bills of circulation of all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals, issued before this act goes into operation, shall not be liable to pay any duty whatever.

Probably it is in order, and I might as well offer it as an amendment at this time. The Senator from Indiana has uttered much truth, indeed nothing else but truth, in the remarks which he has made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Kentucky as offering this as an amendment now to the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio? The Chair will suggest to the Senator that it will be in order now or after the amendment, if it shall be adopted, has been adopted. It is independent matter, not qualifying the text of the original amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. I will defer offering it until the question has been taken on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POWELL. The matter under consideration is one of very great moment. I have been somewhat struck with the speech of the Senator from Ohio in advocacy of this proposition. It seems that a conflict has come up now, and to that the question is to be narrowed down, between the State banks and the national banks. The truth is the system of finance that has been presented by the Secretary of the Treasury, and which has found an able and zealous advocate in the Senator from Ohio, is wrong in principle. There is not a sound principle of finance, in my humble judgment, connected with the whole scheme. It has thus far proved a failure and disastrous to the country, and the longer you continue it the more disastrous will be the result, the more manifest and striking will be the failure of the paper-money system of the Secretary of the Treasury. I remember, sir, when the national bank bill was introduced here originally, when it was so ably and zealously advocated by the honorable Senator from Ohio, we were told that it would furnish the best currency in the world, a better currency than gold and silver. We were told that it would equalize exchanges throughout the whole country, and that the result would be a currency based upon the credit of the Government, and one that would be sound, healthy, and uniform throughout the whole land. I then opposed the national banking system. I felt confident then that it would result in the most disastrous ruin to the commercial and industrial interests of the country; and from the time the first note was issued up to this hour my saddest anticipations have been more than realized.

After trying a Government paper-money system for a year and more, by issuing greenbacks, and other forms of paper currency, some with and some without interest, the Secretary of the Treasury at the last session of Congress presented the national bank scheme; and we find that this paper money is going down in value daily until to-day gold is worth 134½ in the city of New York. You come up now to try and tinker it up again. Allow me to tell you, Mr. President, the Senate, and the country that the only way to relieve the country from this great disaster is to abandon the system utterly.

But the Senator from Ohio to-day ascribes the ills that arise from this system to the local bank issues. He and the Secretary of the Treasury desire to make the local banks, the State banks, the scape-goats to bear their financial blunders into the wilderness. Sir, that cannot be done. It is not the State banks but it is the rottenness of the system that has been adopted that causes the disasters we all witness and feel. If you wish to remedy it you must put the ax to the root of the evil, you must stop your infamous system of paper money, you must curtail the issues, you must repeal your national bank law. That is the remedy, and that is the only remedy. No financial tinkering of Secretary Chase will relieve the system from that disaster which has followed and will continue to follow it.

I have stated that the system is wrong in principle. There is nothing new in this system of the Secretary of the Treasury. I mean no disrespect to that distinguished functionary; I admit that he is a man of ability; but his abilities have not been displayed in a financial line. He presents his reports to the Senate and to the country; he comes here rigged out in all the effete and exploded ideas that mark the pathway of commercial disasters and bankruptcies in other nations for a thousand years. He has adopted all their bad policies and rejected all their good. He has his advocates; he has those who laud him as the great financier of the age. So it was with Law when he threw his paper-money system upon France. So all the paper-money-bubble men have had their followers. Under such a system money is plenty, prices high; to the superficial observer everything looks well. The results ever have shown and ever will show that the system is rotten to the core, and will result in injury, bankruptcy, and ruin to any and every country that adopts it.

The Senator from Ohio advocates his scheme and the scheme of the Secretary with very great ability, and certainly with very great tenacity. I had thought that a year or two's experience would have caused the Secretary himself to abandon it, and the able Senator from Ohio to come up and admit that it was an error and ask that the system be repealed, and that we resort to those principles of finance that have been received as good by all the nations of the earth; but so far from that his whole speech to-day has been an effort to lay the sins of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the State banks. Why, sir, the State banks have not been in default in this matter, as I think I am fully able to show.

But, sir, allow me here to state, as I have often before stated to the Senate, that no system of banking ever was or in my judgment ever will be sound and advantageous to the commercial and business interests of the country unless the notes of the bank are made redeemable, at the counter from which they are issued, in coin upon demand. That is a principle in banking that cannot be departed from without injury to the country upon which the system is inflicted. I do not suppose there is a financier now in any commercial State in the world, save and except Mr. Secretary Chase, that would think that any other system was calculated to promote the good of the country.

Have you such a system in your national banks? No, sir; and I am very much mistaken if the word "coin" appears in the national bank bill at all. I tried, when your first national bank bill was passed, to introduce "coin" into it. I wanted to give it a little stiffening. I wanted to let the people see when it went out to them that it contemplated something like coin; something at some time like a redemption of the paper in gold and silver coin; but I could not get the word "coin" into the bill. I offered an amendment that they should be required to redeem their issues in coin. It was rejected. I then asked that they be required to keep on hand one fourth of the amount of their issues in coin, for the benefit of the note-holders. That, too, was rejected. I then asked that a smaller amount should be required to be kept on hand, but none was put in. What security have the holders of the notes of your national banks? The distinguished Senator from Ohio to-day told you that bank paper secured by the credit of the Government was better than the Government itself. If that be true, the Government is at a very sad discount to-day. I should be pained to think that the Government was in no better credit than the national bank issues. I should be sorry if it had no more credit. The Government to-day, according to the Senator's theory, is at a very heavy discount, nearly two for one, and perhaps by this time to-morrow it will be at little over two to one. Many countries have passed through dark and stormy trials, and have come out with honor, with dignity, with grandeur, with wealth, and with power; but it has always been by abandoning paper-money schemes. The paper-money system has fallen to atoms all around us. It has been tried in almost every commercial country in Europe at some period of its history, and the experience of its sad effects should be a warning to us. We resorted to it in the time of our own Revolution. The Continental money was issued, and it finally became utterly worthless. Still we held on to our Government, and we thought that our fathers had given to us in the Government a priceless legacy; and if we can preserve it with all the constitutional guarantees given us by our fathers, it will prove a priceless legacy to our children after us.

Sir, this paper-money system is wrong. There is not a single sound principle of finance in it. I have asked the question, what are the securities for the bills issued by the national banks? The Senator says they are issued on the basis of the Government bonds, to the extent of ninety cents of notes to a dollar of bonds. What is your Government bond worth to-day? I suppose it is at fifty per cent. discount, gold being at the price it is to-day in New York. What other security have you? The national banks are required to keep on hand in greenbacks twenty-five per cent. of the amount of their issues; and those greenbacks are at a greater discount than your Government bond. Put the two together, and the issues of the national banks are not secured. You issue ninety per cent. of notes on the basis of the Government bond, and when you take the bond and the twenty-five per cent. in greenbacks required to be kept on hand, and put them together, they will fall twenty or thirty per cent. short of securing the issues. I speak of the security of the notes of the national banks, considering gold as the measure of value. Do not tell me that such a system of banking will result otherwise than in injury to the country. The national bank notes fall still-born; the country does not take them except at a ruinous and heavy discount. The securities for the bank issues are greater to-day than they will be to-morrow or next day. The issues are not secure now; what can you expect will be the result two years hence? It will get worse every day. It has grown worse every hour since the first note was issued. I admit there has been some little fluctuation; it has been some days up and then has fallen back again; but the general tendency of the paper money has been downward. Six months ago, when we met here, I declared that by midsummer a dollar of gold would be equal to two dollars of paper. Already that point of depreciation has been about reached.

The Senator from Ohio says you must have this paper-money issue in consequence of the exigencies of the war, and he wishes to know what else we could have done. He asks whether we could have kept the sub-Treasury law in operation all the time, receiving and paying out nothing but gold and silver. During the consideration of the national bank bill which is now on the statute-book, I suggested to the Senate what I would have done. I would not in this crisis content myself with receiving and paying out coin alone; I would have suspended so much of the sub-Treasury law as required payments to be made in coin; and I would have used the issues of sound State banks, receiving and paying them out during the war. If you had done that, you would have had a paper currency which the people appreciated, a currency furnished by State institutions that were solvent and in good credit. The Senator said to-day that many of the State banks were good and others bad. I admit that some of the banks in some States were not worthy of credit, but at the beginning of this war the larger portion of the State banks were in excellent condition, and they are in excellent condition to-day. I believe that all the banks of the New England States at that time were in good condition and are to-day. The banks of New York certainly were. The larger portion of the banks of Pennsylvania were. The banks of Ohio were. The State Bank of Indiana and all the banks of Kentucky were. As to the condition of the banking system in the more remote Northwest, I am not so intimately advised; but the Government could have well regulated that matter and issued its orders monthly or quarterly saying which bank notes should be received; and then at the end of the war we should have solvent institutions with which our people were familiar. There might have been some expansion in the course of the war, and after it was over there would probably have been necessity for contraction; but things would soon have accommodated themselves to the wants of the country.

The Senator desires the conflict between the two systems to subside. He says it ought not to go on; it is injurious to both. I concur with him in that. I want the conflict to cease; but I want that bank paper taken out of existence which is of the least value. I want the State banks to maintain themselves, and I want your national bank trash to be driven out and the law authorizing it to be repealed. I think it is a lamentable thing that the contest ever commenced. I suppose every Senator here wishes the best paper issue we can have. Surely it is not seriously proposed to drive out the better to substitute a meaner paper currency. We should desire to continue that which is most secure, that which is most solvent, that which will pass with the least discount, and every Senator must know that that is the currency of the State banks. Why then destroy the State banks for the purpose of foisting upon the country the paper issues of your miserable rotten national bank system?

The Senator says that the State banks have forfeited their charters. When did they forfeit them? What they have done they have been forced to do by the action of the Federal Government. Many of them never failed to redeem their issues at their counters in coin, in accordance with the provisions of their charters, until the Federal Government at Washington passed laws making its greenbacks a legal tender, and then they did as the citizens of the United States did, they paid out the greenbacks. I think the country is pretty well satisfied now, notwithstanding the glowing predictions which were made as to the success of your national bank system and the excellency of the currency it would furnish, that the issues of the State banks are much better, and they are to-day at a premium over your greenbacks and national bank issues throughout the whole land. The truth is that in obedience to a law that regulates currency here and everywhere, the State bank issues have pretty well gone out of circulation, at least in all the region of country from which I come. The reason is that that which is of the least value and which will pass at all fills all the channels of currency. The greenbacks and national bank issues being the most trashy and least secure of all the paper money in the country has taken the place of the State bank notes. I do not believe that $5,000 of Kentucky bank paper is now paid out and received in the State from which I come in a year. So it is in the State of Indiana, and I dare say it is so in other States. Why is it so? The bank paper of the States I have mentioned is so much better than the greenbacks that the people put it in their pockets and keep it, and use the Government paper in their ordinary transactions. If your currency goes on depreciating, what will become of the securities for the issues of the national banks? It may happen, and I believe it will happen whenever an intelligent and honest and upright court of final resort shall sit in judgment upon the greenbacks, that they will be held not to be a legal tender. If that should occur, what will become of your issues? Then the twenty-five per cent. of greenbacks which the national banks have to keep on hand will be comparatively worthless, for we all know that there is scarcely anything which keeps up that description of paper now but the fact that it is made by law a legal tender; the national bank issues are redeemable by law in greenbacks.

I will say no more, Mr. President, as to the question of the security of the national bank bills. The Senator from Ohio has told us over and over again that it is necessary in time of war to have paper money. My reading of history differs widely from that of the honorable Senator. My opinion is that in times of war when excessive issues of paper money have been resorted to they have always resulted disastrously to the country that has issued them. It was so in England at one time. Great disasters followed there in consequence of the very large issue of paper money. I hold in my hand a pamphlet written by Mr. Gallatin, of New York, and I wish to God we had his financial brains in the Treasury Department to-day, in which he treats of the subject very elaborately; but I shall not trouble the Senate by reading it. In the French Revolution that Government issued their assignats, and, as we all know, the result was utter ruin. When the first Napoleon came into power he swept their paper-money system by the board and he paid the soldiers that bore his eagles in coin. Then he had victory, and then he restored that country and relieved it to a very great extent from the disasters that had followed the fatal paper-money system. Napoleon I, on the 20th of October, 1805, from the scene of Ney's victory, from which he took his title as Duke of Elchingen, the day after the capitulation of Ulm, when engaged in the great and marvelous campaign of 1805, consequent upon the coalition of Russia, Austria, and England, wrote the following letter:

ELCHINGEN, October 20, 1805.

M. REGNIER: I am sorry to see that my Tribunal of Commerce does not attend to its business. Bank notes are not money, and do not bear the mark of the sovereign. Payment in notes is no longer an obligation. In a country where justice is compromised social order no longer exists. The bank must exchange its notes for coin at the counter, or close its doors if it has no coin. I will not have paper money.

NAPOLÉON.

This letter of one of the greatest soldiers and statesmen the world ever knew plainly expresses his views of the use of irredeemable paper money in time of war.

How was it in the war of the Revolution? What was the condition then? Did our Continental paper serve us in that trying struggle of our fathers? No, sir. They issued two or three hundred million dollars of Continental money, and what was the result? They passed laws decreeing that a man was not a patriot who would not receive it; and they published every edict possible to compel the people to take it; but what was the result? It went down and became worthless. How were the fortunes of our fathers then relieved in a financial way? Every reader of American history knows that it was the genius of Robert Morris who formed a bank in Philadelphia—the bank that was afterwards called the Bank of North America, a few years afterwards chartered by the State of Pennsylvania. It was a hard-money bank. It paid its issues in coin. He it was who furnished the sinews of war to Washington when your paper issues had brought us almost to utter ruin. And yet, sir, with these examples before us, we are told every day and every hour when this question is up that in consequence of the war we must have excessive paper issues. It is all a mistake. There is no more necessity in time of war for having a paper currency that is not convertible at the counter from which it is issued into coin than there is in a time of peace; and that Government which enters upon that description of finance does the greatest injury possible to itself.

It is claimed that the necessities of the war have caused the excessive paper issues. What has been the result? It is this excessive paper-money system and the inflations that have followed which have entailed and will entail on this country nearly one half the public debt under which we labor and will labor for years and years to come. How has it that effect? When you make these very great and very redundant issues, you inflate the price of everything. We are told here now that the Government is the heaviest purchaser in the market for all the products of the farm and of the loom. They have to feed their armies; they have to clothe their soldiers; they have to furnish the meat, the bread, and the vegetables to the soldier; and the food for their horses and their stock used in the Army. In consequence of this inflation prices have risen, nearly quadrupled on many articles. The Government when it goes into the market has to pay these very extravagant prices, and every dollar that it pays becomes a six per cent. interest debt payable in coin. That is the way your debt is increased. It requires much more of this trash of money to subserve the purposes of circulation than it would if your money was good. For this reason it does not take more than half a dollar of good money to buy a dollar's worth of the commodities that you have to buy and pay for in this paper trash. Half the amount of issue would do. Suppose you go to buy $10,000 worth of pork, or corn, or flour, or horses, and you pay in this paper money, those commodities are doubled in value. You have to pay $10,000 in this paper money. But suppose there had been no inflation of currency and prices had remained as they were, it would have cost but $5,000 to make that investment, and you could have bought it for $5,000 in good currency. As a currency depreciates in value it requires more of it to answer the purposes of trade and commerce; there can be no doubt about that; and hence it is that by this inflation, caused by the blundering and bad policy of Secretary Chase, you have put hundreds of millions of debt upon this people. You have destroyed confidence in your currency. Everything has gone up to the most extravagant price, and when you go into the market to purchase you create a debt the interest of which is not payable in this paper money, for the interest on your bonds is payable in coin, and a six per cent. debt with interest payable semi-annually in coin is a very heavy interest for a solvent Government to pay for money.

But, Mr. President, it is claimed that you sell your bonds at par. The honorable Senator from Ohio spoke the other day about these bonds being sold at par now, and he said that before this paper-money system you could not sell them at all perhaps, or else at a discount. Why, sir, they never have sold at par. If you sell one to-day, you sell it at a most ruinous discount. Senators will remember that when I speak of discount, I always speak of gold and silver as the standard of value. That is what I conceive to be the constitutional currency, and none other. You sell every one of your bonds at the most ruinous discount to-day. There is no question about that. You receive for them this paper money, and you give a bond, the interest of which is payable in coin; and so really, instead of borrowing money at par, you are paying ten, twelve, or fifteen per cent. interest to-day.

The Senator from Ohio says that you must decrease the paper issues, and that, he says, is the policy of the Secretary of the Treasury. If so, he goes to work to effect it in a most singular manner. He does it by recommending a system of banks that are authorized to issue $300,000,000 of paper money. I concur with the Senator from Ohio in saying we must reduce the circulation of paper money before we can have a healthy currency. What amount of paper money have we now? I hold in my hand a table that I have made out from the best information that is at hand; I do not suppose it is entirely accurate, but it foots up as follows: of temporary loan there is $47,207,545; United States Treasury notes, $449,073,616; fractional currency, $19,173,320; interest-bearing Treasury notes, $200,000,000; certificates of indebtedness, $131,098,000; and the State bank circulation I put down at $170,000,000. That makes $1,016,552,481. I do not take into that account the issues of national banks, which perhaps amount now to some fifteen or twenty million dollars. I include the certificates of indebtedness because I know that in large mercantile transactions they are passed as currency. Then we have to-day over a thousand millions of paper money in circulation in these various forms. Does anybody suppose that we can have any healthy system of currency with that enormous issue of paper money? But what is the remedy the honorable Senator proposes? He says we must retire it, and first he wishes to legislate out of existence the State banks. I will not enter into any argument to prove that State bank paper is a better currency than the notes of these national banks or the greenbacks. Although the country knows that the Government here at Washington is making war upon them, notwithstanding the Secretary of the Treasury cries out daily that they must be put down, notwithstanding his able and eloquent advocate, the Senator from Ohio, every time this question is up proclaims boldly, and I admire his manhood, that his object is to put them down—notwithstanding all that pressure upon them, the issues of those banks are greatly more valuable than the paper of your national banks.

I could without the least trouble take up the charters of these banks and show the security that exists for their issues, and make it manifest everywhere that they are solvent, while no man on earth can take up the law you passed here organizing the national banks and prove that there is a sufficient security for the issues of these banks. It does not exist to-day, and every day, in my judgment, the securities will grow less valuable.

But, sir, the Senator would retire the one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy millions of State bank issues. That will not do. You would have some eight hundred and forty-six millions of currency left. I will suppose that three hundred millions of issue, at the outside, would be sufficient for this country, particularly with the seceded States off. I know that in 1837 we had three hundred and forty-four millions of bank issues, and what was the result? A crash and a breaking up, commercial disaster and bankruptcy throughout the whole country. In 1857 we again had an expansion, and a crash followed, not so great, however, as that of 1837. The crash is now upon us in consequence of the Secretary's paper-money issues. The honorable Senator from Ohio would reduce them, I suppose, by retiring the greenbacks; and right here, while I never did advocate the issue of a greenback, I must come to the defense of greenbacks. I think if we must resort to Government paper money the greenback, costing the Government no interest, is the one we should have stuck to. I was opposed to the issue of that description of paper money. I was opposed to it upon policy, such as satisfied my judgment, at least. I was opposed to the legal-tender clause, because: I thought it was a gross violation of the Constitution of the country.

But, sir, how is the Senator to get clear of the greenbacks? How can he get clear of them and support his national bank system? In the bill authorizing your national banks, you require the issues of those banks to be redeemed in what you call lawful money of the United States, and that is a greenback. You cannot retire them while you have your rotten paper-money system created by this national bank scheme. You have to keep twenty-five per cent. of them in the vaults of each bank as security for the note-holders; there twenty-five per cent. is absorbed. You have to redeem the bank notes in them. So, then, it is utterly impossible to retire them. You might retire a portion of them, I grant you, but a very large issue of them must remain out for the purpose of redeeming the national bank paper. Suppose you issue three hundred millions of bank paper, I should suppose that, according to every system of correct banking, there must be at least half of that amount in greenbacks for the purpose of meeting the provisions of the law, and for the redemption of the bank issues. It will not do for the advocates of the bill to say that gold and silver may be used, for I suppose there is no man who thinks that a note issued by a bank formed on this national bank system ever can be at par in coin. Such a thing does not exist and never will exist in any State in the American Union. That is the very worst species of "wildcat" banking. It has been exploded in the States. Many of them had a similar system, and there was not one in which the system was not better than your national bank system, because all of them with which I have any acquaintance required a certain amount of coin to be kept on hand, some ten, some fifteen, some twenty per cent. Those systems, too, required another thing which your banking system does not require. If there was a depreciation in the bonds, they either had to retire their issues or furnish to the custodian of the bonds an additional amount sufficient to secure their issues.

I say, then, you will be compelled to keep your greenbacks afloat. You cannot retire them under this system. As long as you retain the national bank system, so long will you be compelled to keep the greenbacks out to enable those banks to comply with the provisions of the law; for the idea of their ever redeeming their notes in coin is absurd unless you amend the law and require them to keep coin on hand for the purpose.

I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that in order to carry out the principle which he has in mind when he says that the issues of paper money must be reduced, we should commence by retiring that which is of least value, and whenever you apply that test the favorite pet scheme of the Secretary and of the Senator will be at an end, and the issues of the national banks will be retired. If we must have paper money that is not redeemable in coin let us have that which is of greatest value and which approximates nearest to coin. That, it strikes me, is what wise, prudent, and sensible men would do. But the Senator from Ohio and the Secretary of the Treasury desire to retire the best paper currency we have and to leave that which is most worthless and trashy in the hands of the people. To that I am opposed. I admit, with the Senator and with the Secretary, that you must retire the redundant issue of paper before you can have a paper circulation that approximates to the value of coin; but let us act like wise and sensible men and retire that which is of the least value.

There are many other reasons why I cannot advocate this scheme for the destruction of the State banks. The Senator from Ohio makes that direct issue. He says these two systems cannot live; either your national bank system must go down or the State banks must be destroyed. I for one will stand by the State banks, and I will endeavor to destroy that system which I think furnishes the least valuable currency. I am glad he has made the issue, for I do not believe there is a Senator in this Chamber except himself who does not believe that the State banks furnish a better currency than the national banks. That being the case, let us hold on to the State banks, and let us commence the retrenchment of these issues at the right place; let us repeal the national bank law, and then, as we receive the greenbacks for dues to the Government, retain them and not reissue them; and then when your paper circulation shall be reduced to some two hundred and fifty or three hundred million dollars, you will find that it will approximate to gold in value, and not till then.

Secretary Chase may come here with his financial tinkering; he may ask you to pass gold bills, and you may pass them, and yet you will not put down the value of gold nor put up the value of this paper money. When you withdraw your paper money from circulation, bank paper, if issued in accordance with approved systems of banking, having sufficient capital, and the note being redeemable in coin at the counter from which it is issued, you will have a paper currency that will be of equal value with gold, and not till then. No financial tinkering ever did or ever will cause a bank note not issued on healthy principles of banking to circulate at par with coin. I believe that since the world commenced no country was ever cursed with a more disastrous financial policy than the present Secretary of the Treasury has inflicted upon our country. We have seen its bad effects all around us, and the longer it is continued the more glaring they will be.

I am opposed to taxing State banks. I am opposed to the proposition contained in the report of the committee as well as to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. There is really very little difference between the two propositions. I do not believe that the circulating medium should be taxed. It should be like the air we breathe, free. Of itself it is not of value. Its value is representative altogether. It is the medium of exchange. It is the measure of values. It does for commerce the office that the vital air does for the human system. All the tax you should lay on the State banks is a tax on their earnings, their profits, as you tax citizens engaged in other business. You have taxed the net income of men in business heretofore three per cent. Tax the profits of the banks that much. If you raise your income tax on individuals raise it on the banks. Treat them as you treat individuals. If you lay additional taxes on them, everybody knows that if they issue their notes the corporations will not pay the tax, for they will exact it from their customers in some way. I would tax them like individuals on their income, and I would not tax them any more. I think it is bad policy to do it; and particularly would I not do it in order to carry out the object avowed by the Senator from Ohio and the Secretary of the Treasury, to kill off the State banks and substitute for their paper this miserable national bank currency.

Sir, was there ever such a magnificent failure as this national bank currency? You have had it for some time; it went forth with the faith of this mighty nation pledged to it. It was proclaimed to the people, "If your Government stands this money will be good." And yet it is not to-day worth more in gold than about half its nominal value, and every hour it is growing worse. I admire the tenacity of my friend from Ohio. I thought we had had experience enough to convince him that the system was a failure. The Senator, I know, has discussed the question with great ability. I do not believe you could find a gentleman here or elsewhere who would have made so elaborate, able, and plausible a speech in advocacy of such a rotten scheme. I had hoped that after our past experience he would give it up; but he fights on with the tenacity of Butler's hero, Hudibras:

"Down he fell; yet falling, fought;
And being down, still laid about."

He is now laying about the corpse of this miserable system, for it has died in its infancy. We find him and the Secretary of the Treasury harping on it, and wishing to murder everything that comes in competition with it. I expect that after the State bank currency is all put out of the way, an edict will be issued banishing gold and silver coin, because it is a better currency than the issues of the national banks.

Mr. President, I hope the country will no longer listen to those who urge this paper-money system. Let us act for ourselves. I know and the Senate knows that the national bank bill which was passed here at the last Congress was passed against the judgment of the Senate. We thought we had killed it; but the Secretary of the Treasury came into this Hall; he told Senators privately that he could not carry on the Government for sixty days without the bill; and yielding their judgments to him they gave it to him; and how did he get along with his finances afterwards? I think nobody will now say that the national banks have helped him. The Senate yielded their judgment to that functionary then: I hope they will do so no more. It has proved a most magnificent failure, if I may be allowed to use such an expression. Let us act like free and independent Senators, and protect our country from the great and crushing disaster that must follow from this paper-money system of Mr. Secretary Chase. I verily believe that this paper-money system of the Secretary will be quite as disastrous to the commercial and industrial interests of this country as the rebellion itself. For God's sake do not let us follow such a leader any longer; let us turn to the right path; let us carry out such financial schemes as the history of the world for a thousand years has indicated are not fallacious, and then we will discharge the duty of patriotic Senators.

Senators have spoken of the Continental money. Sir, I verily believe that the fall of this paper system that we now have will be ultimately as great and more rapid than that of the Continental money. I have a table here showing the fall of that Continental money. We passed the first law for the issue of legal-tender notes on the 25th of February, 1862; then we passed another in July of that year. We have had those legal-tender issues now for about two years, and what are they worth? Gold is 194 to-day. I hold in my hand a table of the value and depreciation of Continental money, which I will send to the Secretary's desk and ask him to read it.

The Secretary read, as follows:

CONTINENTAL CURRENCY.—A friend hands us an extract from an almanac written for the year 1791, giving a scale of the depreciation of the Continental money for the settlement of old debts, as directed by the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, from which we gather some particulars of the progress of the depreciation of Continental currency which may not be uninteresting to the readers of the Age:

In 1781, the depreciation was fixed at about 75 during the months of January, February, March, and April. At 75 per cent. discount it required four dollars of paper to represent one silver dollar. From this point the depreciation was much more rapid; it soon required five, then six, then eight paper dollars to represent one in specie. On the 1st of May, 1781, one hundred paper dollars were equivalent to one dollar in coin, after which the difference became so wide that the Continental money ceased to circulate.—Philadelphia Age.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, we all know the condition of that Continental currency. It became utterly worthless. It will be observed, however, from the table that has been read that it stood much better than the issues of paper money we have now at the end of two years after it was issued. I have no doubt that this paper money will become quite as worthless as that.

The law establishing the national banks makes them depositories of the public money, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and overthrows the independent Treasury system, a system that has worked well and met the approval of the entire country until the bill to create national banks was introduced. I had supposed that there were no statesmen of this day who were not fully and entirely satisfied that the public money should be kept apart from the banks, that the wisdom of the independent Treasury system had been fully vindicated by its practical workings.

When you make the national banks depositories of the public money you will entail upon the country tenfold the evils of the pet bank system, which worked so disastrously to the country. That illustrious patriot and statesman, General Jackson, placed the country under a debt of everlasting gratitude by his overthrow of the United States Bank, which he conceived to be dangerous to the liberties of the people, and his advocacy of hard money. That wise statesman said:

"Give the people an honest Government, freedom from monopolies and privileged classes, and hard money, not paper currency, for their hard labor, and all will be well."

In the place of an honest Government we have the most corrupt and venal Administration the world has ever seen, monopolies in the shape of a high protective tariff and mammoth systems of internal improvement, followed by high taxation, which impoverish the people by wringing from them the honest earnings of their labor, while a worthless paper currency floods the land.

I have another objection to this national bank system. I believe that it is unconstitutional. I think there is no warrant in the Constitution for the organization of such banks. I believe it tends to consolidation. I believe that it creates a moneyed power here which, if they carry it out, will be dangerous to the liberties of the people. I am utterly opposed to it in every form. I am in favor of the local banks. I wish to make no war upon them. I believe that no institutions ever acted more patriotically than those banks have done during this war. It was the banks of New York chiefly, and the banks of Philadelphia and Boston acting in conjunction with them, that gave the sinews of war to the Government at the beginning of the strife. We could not have got along without them. They enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to get along; and he now, with great ferocity, has turned against them, and wishes to crush and destroy them. I think it is a species of ingratitude that a virtuous and honest people ought not to submit to.

Mr. McDougall. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the question is put I have a word to say.

I shall not oppose an adjournment if the Senate see fit to adjourn, and I am perfectly willing to stay here as long as the majority of the Senate see fit to stay. But in the course of the day many Senators apply to me, as having charge of this bill, and ask me to have an evening session. They say, "We cannot otherwise get through with the bill; it is necessary to close this session; we must finish up some time or other." Very well; we have an evening session. When we meet in the evening, many Senators come to me and say, "It is very oppressive in this Chamber; I cannot stay here; my health is suffering; let us adjourn until to-morrow." I ask Senators as a personal kindness to me to do either one thing or another; either not ask to have an evening session or else not ask me to agree to end it, and then settle the question for themselves without reference to what I may think or wish on the subject. I am willing to stay here as long as Senators choose; but I warn the Senate that if we expect to get through before this time next year we must be content to act on a bill of this kind, large as it is, without these very long speeches, because if we continue them, especially on our side of the Chamber—I have nothing to complain of at all—we shall not see the end of it for many weeks, and we want to get through some time.

Having said thus much I leave the Senate to act on the question of adjournment at this time according to their own pleasure.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope we shall come to a vote on this amendment to-night before we adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand the honorable Senator from California [Mr. McDougall] desires to address the Senate upon it, and that is the reason why he has made the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CONNESS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. WADE. I think we might commence earlier in the day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that the Committee on Finance is obliged to be in session every morning at half past nine o'clock, and do not get through their business until twelve, and then they are compelled to be in the Senate Chamber. I have more business on my hands than I can possibly attend to in the committee-room. Senators must reflect that at this period of the session all this business accumulates on the Committee on Finance, and if they do not give us some time to attend to that, we shall be compelled to act without any consultation in the committee in the premises. I should be very desirous to meet as early as you please if I could only be relieved from the committee-room; but I am obliged to go there at half past nine in the morning and work until twelve, then come into the Senate and work here until half past four o'clock, and then come here again in the evening and work until the Senate adjourns.

Mr. WADE. I have nothing more to say about it.

Mr. McDougall. Of course this debate is all out of order. I stated to the chairman of the Committee on Finance that I desired to address the Senate on this subject. We have been in evening session until twenty minutes to ten o'clock. Many Senators have left the Chamber, and those who have not left have generally been engaged in private business. I should like to have the privilege of addressing the Senate on this subject in the morning, and therefore I have moved the adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Monday, May 30, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, to go upon the Calendar, and not to be brought back by motions to reconsider.

CAPTAIN ANDREW RUSSELL.

On motion of Mr. PRICE, the Committee on Revolutionary Claims were discharged from the further consideration of the petition of W. F. Percell and others, in reference to Captain Andrew Russell; and the same was laid on the table.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. SPALDING, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with sundry amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 266) granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar and the bill and accompanying report ordered to be printed.

No further reports being made from committees, the House proceeded, as the regular order of business during the remainder of the morning hour, to the call of States for resolutions.

EVACUATION OF CUMBERLAND GAP.

Mr. COX. Under this order of business, I suppose, the resolution which I offered last Monday, calling upon the Department to inform us why my former resolution calling upon the Department for the report of General Morgan, in reference to the evacuation of Cumberland Gap, has not been answered, comes up for consideration. Since that time the original resolution has been answered, and I withdraw the pending resolution.

CABINET OFFICERS IN CONGRESS.

Mr. PENDLETON offered the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the select committee to which was referred the bill to admit members of the Cabinet to seats on the floor of the House be continued during the present Congress.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

JUVENILE OFFENDERS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill providing that all juvenile offenders convicted of crimes in the District of Columbia shall be sentenced to that house of correction outside of the District which, after sixty days' notice shall have been given by the Secretary of the Interior in some newspaper in each of the principal cities of the United States, shall agree to keep them at the least expense to the Government.

CHANNEL OF THE POTOMAC.

Mr. THOMAS submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to deepen the channel of the Potomac river from the Long bridge to the wharves in Georgetown, so as to open an outlet for the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, in place of the Alexandria canal aqueduct, which has been seized and appropriated to the use of the quartermaster's department of the United States.

SIDE-WHEEL GUNBOATS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as double-enders; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ADDITIONAL AIDS-DE-CAMP.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested, as soon as practicable, to furnish to this House the names, rank, and date of commission of all aids-de-camp, commonly called additional aids-de-camp, who were in the military service of the United States March 31, 1864, and who have been appointed by authority of the act approved August 5, 1861, entitled "An act supplementary to an act entitled 'An act to increase the present military establishment of the United States,'" approved July 19, 1861, and been continued in service by authority of section nineteen of the act approved July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to define the pay and emoluments of certain officers of the Army, and for other purposes," together with the name of the major general for whom such additional aid-de-camp was appointed; the name of the major general or other officer under whom he was serving on the last day of March, 1864; the nature of the duty performed by such additional aid at the date, and the place where performed.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, also submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the Washington National Monument Society, to ascertain the amount of funds collected for the association since its last report; the amount expended and paid for salaries, since said report, to the respective officers of the company, and also in what manner the funds on hand are invested or kept; and that said committee be authorized to make any other inquiries which they may think best, and also to send, if necessary, for books and papers, and witnesses, and that they report to the House.

THE DRAFT.

Mr. ANCONA asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to inform the House what notice has been given to the people of the quotas due and required from the sub-districts after the credit for veterans reenlisted and volunteers under the various calls for troops have been ascertained and deducted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That resolution calls for information from one of the Departments. I object to its consideration to-day.

RENDITION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report to this House a bill for the repeal of all acts and parts of acts providing for the rendition of fugitive slaves; and that it be in order for said committee to make said report at any time.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

OBJECTS OF THE WAR.

The House then proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of a resolution offered on the 16th of December, 1863, by Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, declaring that, prompted by a just patriotism, we are in favor of an earnest and successful prosecution of the war, and that we will give a warm and hearty support to all those measures which will be most effective in speedily overcoming the rebellion, and in securing a restoration of peace, and which may not substantially infringe the Constitution and tend to subvert the true theory and character of the Government; and we hereby reiterate that the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists now in revolt against the constitutional Government; that in the progress of this war Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

The SPEAKER stated the pending question to be on the motion of Mr. MORRILL to refer the resolution to a select committee.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has just been read I had the honor to offer to the House on the 16th day of December last. It is in effect the same resolution which was adopted at the July session, 1861, of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, with only two dissenting voices—Potter of Wisconsin, and Burnett of Kentucky; the last-named individual being now a member of the confederate congress at Richmond. I believed it to be right then—I voted for it—and I believe it to be right now. It is presented in no partisan spirit. At the time of its introduction it was pronounced by a member on this floor, now deceased, (Mr. Lovejoy,) a "secession document." Upon a motion to lay the resolution on the table the vote stood—59 yeas, 114 nays. After the vote, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] proposing to debate it, it went over under the rules of the House, and now for the first time since comes up for consideration to-day. While it is not my purpose to detain the House at length, I feel that it is but right, as the mover of the resolution, that I should say a few words in regard to it. Whatever may come of it I have to say, Mr. Speaker, that it presents a platform upon which I have stood from the commencement of the rebellion; and it has occurred to me that it is a safe platform, upon which every sincerely patriotic Union man in the nation might stand, no matter to what political party he might belong. And it was offered not only as expressive of my own sentiments, but as affording a rallying point for all the friends of the Government in the terrible struggle for its maintenance. I hope the House will come to a direct vote on the resolution. Let us see who is for it, and who is against it. I hope there will be no indifferent motions made in regard to it.

If ever there was a time, Mr. Speaker, when there should be a cordial unity of sentiment and of action among all those who desire to preserve the happy form of Government under which we live, it is the present moment. And, sir, if we fail in this gigantic and important struggle; if the ship of State, so richly freighted, tempest-tossed, and threatened on all sides with dangers, shall go down, it will be lost not on account of inability on our part to preserve it, but because we exhaust our strength upon questions of secondary importance, and because of the infidelity of the crew, in not directing their whole energies to the safety of the vessel. Sir, for what do we contend? Is it that this or that institution, long existing in some of the States, should suddenly perish? Is it to have this or that amendment hastily, and it may be irregularly, incorporated into the Constitution? Or is it for the far higher and nobler object of preserving the Constitution itself, and which is the only bond of union which can bind indissolubly together the people of all the States?

Mr. Speaker, in my younger days it was often a matter of congratulation to myself that the American people were so blessed in their happy and matchless form of Government, and so far advanced in Christian civilization, that they would never attempt to settle political questions in any other mode than by the peaceful processes of reason and of logic. In the history of the world

I had read of the desolating civil wars by which other nations had been visited to gratify the ambition of kings and of despots, but I had flattered myself that we would be exempted from these calamities, and that the fierce barbarism which in other periods of the world's history had stained with blood the annals of our race would never disturb the good order of society, endanger the structure of our own Government, or mar the beauty of our social and political organization. In this I have been sadly mistaken.

I confess, sir, I placed far too high an estimate on the good sense, the virtue, and intelligence of the American people. Foolishly involved, as we are, in one of the most causeless and disastrous struggles that the world has ever witnessed, we are but following in the footsteps of those who have preceded us, setting at naught the precepts of wisdom, trampling under foot the teachings and setting at defiance the moderation of the great and good men who, with so much care, had built this grand temple of liberty, and beneath whose shadow their posterity for ages might have lived in the enjoyment of every blessing which a great country and the noblest and freest institutions ever planted on earth could confer; we find ourselves rapidly undermining this beautiful temple, bringing poverty and death upon ourselves, and destroying the hopes of the world in the capacity of men to maintain and preserve a Government based upon the will of the people and a written Constitution. It is an old adage that "human nature is the same in every period of the world," and we seem determined that its truth shall be fully exemplified in our own history. Sir, mankind are amazed at the events which are now transpiring around us, and we are stupefied at the follies and calamities which we have brought upon ourselves. We are now solving the important problem whether we shall be equal to the task of preserving a Government and a Union which our ancestors had the wisdom to create and establish. No greater problem was ever presented for solution since the first dawn of creation; and no question more important to the well-being of our race in all the ages that are to follow, was ever discussed among men. And, sir, if we can pass through this civil war with the Federal Constitution and the American Union preserved, it will be the sublimest spectacle that the world has ever witnessed, growing out of the political interests and actions of men.

In my poor view war is not the best mode of preserving a Government and a Union founded in the popular will and having for its chief cornerstone the affections of the people; and a fearful responsibility rests upon all those who, in public and in private life, have in any way opposed conciliation, and by their conduct nurtured and encouraged the deplorable civil war which alike disgraces and afflicts our country. But, sir, for the present we must pass by these questions. At another time, and under other circumstances we may be permitted to inquire into these matters, while the record of history will be properly made in fixing the blame which rightfully attaches to all those to whom the country is indebted for its present misfortunes. The question now is not so much for what causes and by whose indiscretion this civil war exists, but how we can most safely and honorably get out of it, with the life of the nation and the union of the States preserved. In the settlement of these important questions the heart of every true patriot throbs with anxiety; and to these, and these alone, should all our energies be now directed. In the midst of these great events, more important in their consequences than any that have ever transpired in the world's history, we should rise above all considerations of party malevolence or mere personal revenge. For whatever may be the errors, however great the crimes, which the southern people have committed in commencing this war against the Government of their fathers, we must remember that they sprang from the same stock with ourselves, that we have the same religion, speak the same language, were educated in the same schools, have the same traditions, and must share a common destiny; and in the very war now being waged they have proved themselves in generalship, in ingenuity, in courage, in pertinacity, in endurance, and in military skill a foe in all respects "worthy of our steel." It is idle for us in these particulars to underrate the high qualities of the southern people. Upon a hundred bloody and well-fought fields they have attested their valor, and wrung from us an unwilling tribute of their stern devotion to the bad and unjustifiable cause in which they are engaged. If we may boast of a Grant, a McClellan, a Hancock, a Sedgwick, and a Sherman, we must remember they have their Lees, their Johnstons, their Beauregards, their Longstreets, and their Hills. I know, sir, that in giving expression to these liberal sentiments, founded as they are in truth, I run the risk of incurring the displeasure of those rampant patriots who are unwilling to acknowledge the possession of any virtue by our obstinate and deduced enemy. We have underrated these people. Engaged as they are in an unholy cause, and despising it as we do, we have been slow to acknowledge the high qualities by which they have thus far sustained it; and at last, sir, when their military power is overcome, as, by the blessing of God, it will be, if we would then expect to have peace in the land, we shall have to treat with them upon the same terms and in the same manner that other liberal and enlightened nationalities have treated with those violators of the law, who have attempted to overthrow and destroy the Governments under which they lived.

Mr. Speaker, since the outbreak of the rebellion, the actual commencement of the war, I have seen no other mode of ending the struggle than by fighting it out. It was, and is either this or the acknowledgment of the independence of the confederate States. These have been and are now the alternatives presented to the American people. These issues cannot be changed; and regarding disunion as fraught with every possible evil to ourselves and to our posterity, as a stigma upon our national escutcheon never to be obliterated, a disgrace to the American name, a drawback to civilization and progress, a destruction to our nationality, in the continuance of which is centered the best hopes of mankind, I have seen no other way since the war commenced of ending the controversy and reestablishing the authority of the Government than by the dread arbitrament of arms. The southern people themselves who are actually engaged in the rebellion contemplate nothing else; they have staked their all upon it; disunion is their watchword; to it they are wedded, and they will give it up only when, exhausted in men and resources, they shall be compelled to yield to the superior power of the Government. Hence, sir, in my view that legislator best meets the obligations of true patriotism in this crisis and sustains the idea of an early and a lasting peace who stands by the Government in voting men and money to carry on the war, and in encouraging every constitutional measure calculated to weaken and at the same time to end the rebellion; not in a spirit of "passion or resentment," in the language of the resolution, "nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired."

Such is the language of the resolution; and these, in my view, are the only true objects for which the war ought to be prosecuted. And any departure hitherto or hereafter made from the spirit of this resolution will only tend to prolong the struggle, complicate it with new and difficult questions, produce division and alienation among those who ought to be united in the one essential object of saving the Government and reestablishing its authority over the entire country. To the securing of these everything else ought to be incidental and subordinate. And, sir, I venture the assertion, that if from the beginning, when a similar resolution was adopted with such great unanimity by this House, and approved and sanctioned, I believe, by all the departments of the Government, its spirit and purpose had been strictly adhered to, and the policy of the Government in no respect changed, we would this day have not only greater harmony among ourselves, but we would be much nearer the end of the rebellion. In other words, sir, if from the beginning we had pursued the policy which all Union men started out upon, if we had held aloft the Constitution and the olive branch in one hand and the sword in the other, assuring in every way the people of all the States of the South that our sole purpose and duty was to defend the Constitution of the United States, to maintain the authority of the Government and uphold the Union of the States, it is my firm conviction that to-day, sir, there would have been a Union party in the South equal in numbers to the party who are now endeavoring to destroy the Government. For we know at the commencement there was a powerful Union party in every southern State with, perhaps, the exception of South Carolina. And if we find matters so greatly changed we have mainly to look for the cause in the changed policy into which we have drifted and which has been pursued. Commencing the war without excuse or justification, we have been continually making a cause for them until they now present an almost unbroken phalanx against the Government and the progress of the national arms.

I know, sir, that the President has been surrounded by great difficulties growing out of the rebellion, far greater than any which ever beset any other President, and having confidence in his patriotism and his sincere desire to overcome the rebellion at the earliest possible day, and to reestablish the authority of the Government, I have not felt it to be my duty to make war upon him in regard to those questions wherein I differed from him. In a great crisis like this, while there must be wide differences of opinion there should at the same time be permitted the freest toleration of sentiment among all those who claim to have the same patriotic object in view. Nor would I hold men to the strictest account for those changes of opinion which revolution and the constantly varying aspect of public questions tend to create in their minds. I can well see that men may be equally honest and patriotic, and yet differ widely in reference to the best policy for the Government to pursue, where dangers threaten on all sides. But many questions have been started and issues presented having no necessary connection with the war, and which have been greatly calculated to distract and divide and draw the attention of the people from that which should be the only true issue before the country. And to the extent that these ill-timed and irrelevant questions are continued to be urged upon us will the cause of the Government and of the Union be weakened and endangered. For at last, at the end of the struggle, we shall have to come back if we would save the Union, and to which all of us profess so much attachment, to the very terms and spirit of the resolution now under discussion. In the language of Mr. Lincoln in his inaugural address, "Suppose you go to war, you cannot fight always; and when after much loss on both sides and no gain on either you cease fighting, the identical old questions as to terms of intercourse are again upon you." And I repeat, to be settled if at all in the spirit of that resolution.

I know of no punishment too severe to be inflicted upon the authors of this cruel and unnecessary rebellion; but so far as the masses are concerned, who have been deluded and led astray, we should not only adopt a policy of the broadest amnesty, but we should abandon all schemes of confiscation and legalized plunder, some of which have been persistently and too successfully urged upon this House. I take the same view of all those insane theories, having for their object the subversion of the State governments, and converting them into territorial dependencies. In looking to reunion, I have no other idea than that the States will be preserved in the same geographical and political relations to the General Government which existed anterior to the rebellion. That there will be changes in some respects I do not doubt. As well might we expect to see the hurricane and the storm sweep across the land without uprooting the forests as to see a country like ours pass through the bloody ordeal of a great revolution without some important modifications in the organic law. But it is to be hoped that these changes will not materially infringe the true theory and character of our Government or upturn the essential features of the Federal Constitution.

These unavoidable and incidental changes produced by a great rebellion we must submit to. But we can never have, in my view, a better form of government than the one under which we have lived—the most perfect, consistent with the idea of the fullest enjoyment of human liberty, which was ever formed. The division of the powers of the General and State Governments, so admirably adapted to the protection and the promotion of the interests of the nation and of the individual States; the perfect harmony and beautiful simplicity of the whole machinery working in such admirable order, commanded alike the admiration and wonder of men. Endangered at last by an attempt to put into practical operation the extreme and dangerous and, I would add, absurd theory of the constitutional right of a State to secede from the Union, we must be careful, in avoiding this danger in our political system, not to drift to the other extreme, whereby the rights of the States would be ignored and swallowed up in consolidation and centralization. Our safety consists in guarding with jealous care the rights and the powers of the individual States as well as of the General Government, as defined in the Federal Constitution; a Constitution which in the achievements of human wisdom stands without a parallel, and of which a distinguished Virginian, at one time an eloquent member of this House, now a general in the confederate service, said:

"Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, all combined, in Congress or out of Congress, in Convention or out of Convention, never made that Constitution; God Almighty sent it down to your fathers. It was a work, too, of glory, and a work of inspiration.

"I believe that as fully as I believe in my Bible. No man, from Hamilton and Jay and Madison—from Edmund Randolph, who had the chief hand in making it, and he was a Virginian—the writers of it, the authors of it, and you who have lived under it from 1789 to this year of our Lord 1858, and none of your fathers, and none of your fathers' sons, have ever measured the height, or the depth, or the length, or the breadth of the wisdom of that Constitution."—Speech of Henry A. Wise, 1858.

I act upon the theory that the Union is to be preserved and the Government saved from wreck; for it may be, if we fail in the grand effort which we are now making for national preservation, the whole character of our institutions may be changed, and the Government itself converted into an absolute military despotism. For one, sir, I would be content to-day with the old order of things, with "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." They met the objects for which they were created. No people on earth ever prospered as have the American people under the influence of our free and beneficent institutions. They were established by the wisest and noblest set of men who ever adorned the annals of human history. I was satisfied with their work. It was good enough for me and for my children. I would not have changed it myself, nor do I know the men who are wise enough to improve it. And all this is perfectly consistent with that advancement and rational progress in the science of government and human improvement which a more liberalized culture among the masses and a steadily advancing Christian civilization would be sure to bring.

Mr. Speaker, as we seem to approach the termination of this struggle, questions of the greatest magnitude constantly spring up, demanding of us the most earnest consideration in their proper settlement. Even after the rebellion is overthrown, their capital taken, and their archives (if they have any) scattered to the four winds, and their military power so far overcome as to be no longer effective and dangerous, the question will still be asked, how can the masses of the people be best brought back to their former relations to the Government? I know the theory is encouraged by some gentlemen—I hope they are not very numerous—that these people are to be deprived of all their political rights, that they are no longer to be readmitted to the full privileges of citizenship under the Government. Whatever justice there may be in all such suggestions as applicable to the leaders in this rebellion, I cannot appreciate the wisdom or practicability of such a policy being extended to all the masses of the people. It would certainly be destructive of "all the ends we aim at," in endeavoring to bring about a restoration of the Government. We all profess a desire to see the southern people, who have been led astray, return to their allegiance and meet the common obligations which we all owe to the parent Government. But how can we expect them to do this with all the onerous conditions which are so strenuously urged by some imposed upon them? No, sir, even after the war is over there must be negotiation and reconciliation. All these people cannot be driven in exile from the country; you cannot punish them all for the crime of treason; they must come back, and while they will be taught and if need be forced to obey the laws, they must be made to feel that under the Government all their rights will be respected and protected, and by a faithful observance of all the laws they will be placed upon the same footing of equality with every other citizen of the Republic. To insure their fidelity, they may and perhaps they ought to be required to take such oaths and to conform to such other reasonable conditions as will be sanctioned by the good judgment and accord with the enlightened liberality of the country. By this policy we may reasonably hope to have peace after the war is over; the disorders of society produced by the rebellion will be assuaged; prejudices enkindled by the fierce conflict of arms will be softened; and we must leave to time to heal other wounds and to wear away the sectional animosities so long agitating the country, culminating, at last, in a disgraceful and bloody war, and shaking the very foundations upon which the superstructure of our Government rests.

Mr. Speaker, in my poor view this is the only mode by which we can ever expect to restore perfect peace to the country and bring again once more to all the people that prosperity and good order which existed prior to the breaking out of this rebellion. Residing in a State where at one time the opposition to the Federal Government on the part of many of the citizens was violent and unrelenting, which has furnished a large number of soldiers to the confederate army, and in which the authority of the General Government has been almost entirely reestablished, and the citizens have returned to their allegiance, I am not wholly without experience in reference to the influence and good effect of the policy to which I have adverted. I know that these opinions will find but little sympathy with many gentlemen on this floor. Extremely radical as they are and indignant at the attempt to destroy the Government, irritated at the calamities which the war has brought upon the country, and the heavy burdens which must rest for many years to come upon the shoulders of the people, and following the instincts of human nature, they think more of inflicting punishment upon the guilty than by a liberal and humane policy endeavoring to win them back to their allegiance. They would confiscate their estates; they would parcel out their lands among the brave soldiers who have borne aloft the banner of their country in the suppression of the rebellion; they would deprive them of the right to vote, as well as of the right to hold office under the Government; they would establish a system of serfdom over the entire southern States; they would create a necessity for a standing army in every county and district of that part of our country in order to keep the peace and prevent revolt! And some would even go so far as to elevate the negro to the privileges of citizenship, and the ownership of the property of the country, while they would see our own race, men of Anglo-Saxon blood, degraded in the scale of being, and become mere "hewers of wood and drawers of water" for that servile and inferior race of men whom they had hitherto held as slaves! Sir, I cannot repress the indignation which I feel and which the bare intimation of a policy like this awakens in my bosom, and I can regard the men who would attempt the execution of such a policy as none other than madmen.

"Oh, judgment! art thou fled to British beasts,

And have men lost their reason?"

Mr. Speaker, I think I appreciate at its full value the importance of the preservation of the American Union and of the Government of the United States. The idea of a continuance of our national unity and the grand results in the long vista of coming years which would flow from it in diffusing the blessings of liberty and of free government to mankind in every part of the habitable globe, has been the thought, more than any other, which has guided and influenced my political action in life. It has been the political divinity at whose altar I have worshiped from my infancy; and when I contemplate the horrors which must inevitably result from the breaking up of this national unity, the degradation and dishonor which must forever attach to the very name of American, I feel that we ought to be ready to make any and every sacrifice in order to preserve it. But, sir, there are some things, in my view, which are even worse than disunion; and rather than see that bright and beautiful land destroyed, its people deprived of citizenship, the southern States brought into complete subjection and controlled and governed by the other States, rather than see the negro, under the influence of a false philanthropy and a pertinacious fanaticism, taking the place of the white man, and made by law politically and socially his equal, or, as some would prefer, his master; sir, rather than to witness these things, horrible as the idea of disunion has ever been to me, I would say let there be separation, hoping still, however, that in the future, when the animosities of the present hour no longer controlled, another generation of men, following the patriotic example of the fathers of the Republic, would bring about union once more, so much demanded by the interests of this continent and the happiness and liberty of our race. No, sir, I am for preserving the Government, but with all the "dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired," and, I will add further, with the rights of the people, of every citizen of the Republic, in whatever part of it he may reside, equal under the law and under the Constitution, responsible only in a legal and constitutional manner for any violations of the law or for any crimes and offenses which he may commit against the Government. These are the general views which have occurred to me as most proper to be adopted in any plan of reunion which may come up for consideration after the cessation of hostilities, and they are substantially embodied in the resolution which we now have under consideration. But, sir, all these theories will fail, all resolutions passed by this House or by the Congress of the United States will be of no avail unless our arms meet with success. The overthrow of the military power of the South is a sine qua non to the reestablishment of peace and the restoration of the Union; and every measure which tends to strengthen our Army, to encourage our soldiers in the field, to sustain our generals, should receive the cordial support and hearty approbation of every patriot in the land.

Mr. Speaker, I have never despaired of the Republic. I know the terrible trial which is now upon us, and the still more terrible ordeal through which we may yet have to pass before we reach the end of the struggle. But, sir, I believe that the American people will be equal to all emergencies that may spring out of this contest. They are alive to its importance. They know the issues at stake. Hitherto they have responded with alacrity and promptness to every call which the Government has made upon them; they have not spared their means; and they have proved themselves ever ready to bare their bosoms to the storm. And now, at the very crisis of the nation's fate, in the midst of the remorseless and desperate struggle which has at last come upon us; when the capital of the confederate States is threatened, and, as we hope, on the eve of being taken, and the president and high officers driven from the sacred soil of Virginia, and their government literally broken up; when the brave and immortal Grant, worthy, as he has proved himself to be, of the highest honors of the nation, is bearing aloft the national ensign, and carrying the eagles of the Republic to the very heart of rebellion, we have abundant cause of thankfulness to Almighty God for the bright bow of promise which spans our skies. And in this hour of the deepest anxiety, when the fate of the nation and the perpetuity of our Government is trembling in the balance, and when the complete success of our arms will send a thrill of gladness and of joy, of hope and of confidence to the heart of every friend of free Government throughout the habitable globe, may God inspire every true friend of the Constitution and of the Union with courage, with patience, with hope, with magnanimity, that we may meet the duties of the hour like "men, high-minded men," not only at the present time, but also when we shall have passed the great impending crisis which is now upon us.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, if no other gentleman desires to discuss the resolution, I move the previous question; but I first desire to modify it by striking out the word "substantial."

The SPEAKER. When the resolution was offered on the 16th of December last the gentleman from Vermont moved its reference to a select committee. The previous question, of course, covers that motion.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to give me an opportunity to offer an amendment before he moves the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Having modified the resolution, I believe I must insist upon the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise for the purpose of modifying my motion so as to refer the resolution to the select committee on the rebellious States.

Mr. SMITHERS. I rise to a privileged question. I desire the House to resume the consideration of the Kentucky contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. That question will take precedence.

Mr. MORRILL. I appeal to the gentleman from Delaware to allow this question to be disposed of.

Mr. SMITHERS. If I was certain that it would be disposed of under the previous question I would do so.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. A contested-election case is always a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to ascertain from the gentleman from Delaware whether he calls up his question of privilege.

Mr. SMITHERS. As it seems to be the desire of the House that I should waive it for a moment, I will do so.

Mr. COX. Have the yeas and nays been ordered?

The SPEAKER. They have not been.

Mr. COX. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was on the motion to refer to the select committee on the rebellious States, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed an act (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Julia A. Ames; an act (H. R. No. 407) authorizing the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil; and an act (H. R. No. 432) for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed an act (S. No. 199) relating to the compensation of pension agents; an act (S. No. 288) to amend an act for the relief of Solomon Wadsworth; and an act (S. No. 291) to amend an act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

SUPPORT OF THE WAR—AGAIN.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is it in order to move to lay the resolution on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I make that motion.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Vermont. [Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. MALLORY. I make the point of order that the committee on the rebellious States, being a select committee, having made its report, and that report having been acted on by the House, is functus officio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is correct; but a select committee can be revived by the reference of a bill, resolution, or petition to it by the House.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. That committee has before it a petition which I presented, and has not yet reported.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD called for the yeas and nays on his motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 114; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Brandegee, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Grinnell, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Littlejohn, Schenck, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Elihu B. Washburne, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Fernando Wood—27.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Boyd, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Fenton, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, McDowell, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orin, Pater-son, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smathers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—114.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. COX. I wish to make an appeal to the House to give us a direct vote on this resolution, and not strangle it by referring it to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order. No debate is in order.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Is it in order to move to amend the motion by directing the committee to report the resolution at a specified time?

The SPEAKER. That motion would not be in order, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I wish to make an appeal to my friend from Vermont.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I merely wish to make a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. I desire to say—[Shouts of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri himself, and he must know that it is not in order to debate.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Well, sir, I merely want to appeal to patriotic gentlemen on all sides to pass this resolution.

The question was taken on Mr. MORRILL's resolution, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orin, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smathers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—81.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—66.

So the resolution was referred to the select committee on the rebellious States.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. LAZEAR stated that he had paired with his colleague, Mr. MOORHEAD.

Mr. COX stated that Mr. MCKINNEY had gone home with the dead body of an officer.

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. MIDDLETON had paired with Mr. BOUTWELL.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN stated that his colleague, Mr. W. J. ALLEN, was detained in Baltimore by sickness.

Mr. McALLISTER said he had paired with Mr. BROOMALL.

Mr. ANCONA stated that he understood his colleague, Mr. MILLER, had paired with Mr. JULIAN.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

HARBORS ON THE LAKES.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman from Kentucky, who is entitled to the floor on the Kentucky contested-election case, [Mr. YEAMAN.] yields the floor to me to move to suspend the rules to report and have passed a bill to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States. I move to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask if that bill has been before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. ANCONA. Then I raise the question of order that the bill, making appropriations, must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois is to suspend all rules that interfere with the consideration of the bill at this time in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were suspended—yeas 90, nays 20.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now report the bill, and demand the previous question on its engrossment and third reading.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was read.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ANCONA. I demand the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not engrossed, but it has received its third reading, and the demand of the gentleman therefore comes too late.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUNISHMENT OF GUERRILLAS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill for the punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes.

Mr. LE BLOND. I object to that bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules.

The bill was read. It is to provide for the more speedy punishment of guerrillas, and for other purposes. It enacts that the provisions of the twenty-first section of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces," approved March 3, 1863, shall apply as well to the sentences of military commissions as to those of courts-martial; and authorizes the commanding general in the field, or the commander of the department, as the case may be, to carry into execution all sentences against guerrillas for robbery, arson, burglary, rape, assault with intent to commit rape, violations of the laws and customs of war, &c. The second section enacts that every officer authorized to order a general court-martial shall have power to pardon or mitigate any punishment ordered by such court, including that of confinement in the penitentiary, except the sentence of death, or of cashiering or dismissing an officer, which sentences it shall be competent, during the continuance of the present rebellion, for the general commanding the army in the field, or the department commander, as the case may be, to remit or mitigate; and it repeals the fifth section of the act approved July 17, 1862, chapter two hundred and one, so far as it relates to sentences of imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative; yeas 79, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward W. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kernan, Kuapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Noble, Odell, Prayn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Fernando Wood—42.

So the rules were not suspended, two thirds not having voted therefor.

REGISTRATION OF VOTERS IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Speaker, there is a joint resolution on the Speaker's table which provides for registering the names of voters in this District which have been omitted. It does not alter the qualifications of voters at all, and I ask that it may be taken up and passed, as the charter election takes place next Monday. It only authorizes the registering of the names of voters which have been omitted. It is Senate joint resolution No. 57, to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I object, unless it is referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. Before moving to suspend the rules I ask the gentleman whether he desires to amend the resolution.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia for action. It properly belongs to that committee.

Mr. DAWES. Let it come before the House, and then the gentleman can make the motion to refer.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. What is the object of that?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let us go to the Speaker's table, and pass the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. It is the last one upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. DAWES. Let it come before the House, and then the gentleman can make the motion to refer it.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Why cannot I make that motion now?

Mr. DAWES. Because it is not before the House. I do not object to the gentleman's motion.

Mr. YEAMAN. Is it competent for me to insist on the regular order of business?

The SPEAKER. There is a motion pending to suspend the rules.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts want the resolution referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAWES. I prefer to have it passed now. The gentleman from New York can make his motion to refer it. If the House shall think it proper to refer the resolution to the Committee for the District of Columbia, I will not object.

Mr. COX. There may be objection on that side of the House.

Mr. DAWES. It will be within the control of the House.

Mr. COX. Why take this resolution out of the ordinary course?

Mr. DAWES. The charter election occurs next Monday, and the only purpose is, not to alter the qualification of a single voter, but to permit the voter whose name has been omitted by mistake or otherwise, to be registered. That is all I desire to do. It ought to be done before the charter election. I do not see why there should be objection to it.

Mr. COX. The Committee for the District of Columbia have a special day assigned to them, next Friday, when they can report this resolution back. I hope the gentleman will consent to that arrangement.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see why there should be objection to registering the names of qualified voters.

Mr. MALLORY. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. YEAMAN. I insist on the regular order of business.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman to give way for a moment.

The SPEAKER. By going to the Speaker's table it will be a long while before the resolution is reached.

Mr. DAWES. In order to expedite business, I will agree to let the resolution be referred.

The joint resolution was taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there authority to report at any time?

Mr. ANCONA. I object to that.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITHERS. I will not object if it does not take long.

Mr. ENGLISH. The Committee on Public Lands have had but little time to make reports. I desired to submit one, but was prevented from doing so. I ask unanimous consent to report back from that committee House bill No. 469, extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad, in the State of Michigan.

Mr. SLOAN. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH moved a suspension of the rules.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 70; noes 25.

So the rules were suspended, two thirds voting in favor thereof.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers on ordering the main question, and appointed Messrs. ENGLISH and SLOAN.

The main question was ordered, the tellers having reported—ayes 78, noes 22.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to ask whether anything has been done toward the completion of this railroad, and if so, how much has been built; and I would also like to inquire how large a grant of land this is, and whether it is in the hands of the State of Michigan or in the hands of speculators?

Mr. FENTON. I object to debate, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am surprised at the attempt to put through a bill of this kind.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. SLOAN. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. ENGLISH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

An act (S. No. 248) in relation to franked matter; and

An act (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1864.

KENTUCKY CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House proceeded, as the regular order of business, to the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested-election case of McHenry vs. Yeaman, of Kentucky; upon which the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. Yeaman) was entitled to the floor.

Mr. YEAMAN took the floor.

Mr. HARDING. Will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. YEAMAN. For a few moments, if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER. It will come out of the gentleman's time except by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE. I object, unless it is taken out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HARDING. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection, as this is a case from my own State.

Mr. PRICE. I cannot do it.

Mr. YEAMAN. I will yield the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. HARDING. It is not my desire to make any extended remarks, yet I am not entirely satisfied to give a silent vote upon a case peculiarly situated as this is, coming from my own State. I contend, in the first place, that there was no necessity for any military interference whatever, because under the statute of Kentucky every man who had aided in the rebellion was disfranchised. He had no rights, and was expatriated. That statute had been pressed upon the judges of elections by the proclamation of the Governor, and there was therefore no possible danger of any interference upon their part. A few of those rebel citizens were scattered about, but not in sufficient numbers to congregate and make any difficulty at the polls. However, an order of General Burnside was issued, the most objectionable feature of which was the proclamation of martial law on the day of an election. It was unnecessary. But the orders of Shackelford and Foster, which followed, were outrages upon all principles of law and Constitution.

The issue between most of the candidates of that election was a vigorous prosecution of the war or not, and consequently those who were in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war were in favor of voting men and money. Those upstart military despots undertook to decide the question in advance by declaring that whoever was in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war, and of course in favor of voting men and money, might vote, but that whoever was not in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion should not vote, nor should he run as a candidate. While I was in favor of furnishing men and money, and of a vigorous prosecution of the war, yet I would look with indignation and scorn upon any attempt upon the part of any officers to crush out those opposed to me or to that sentiment.

I protest, therefore, against all military interference in the State of Kentucky. It was unnecessary and uncalled for; and, moreover, it never can take place to any extent without a violation of the Constitution and law, and is wholly unjustifiable. The right of free and untrammelled voting is the great foundation right of all other rights, and the people ought to struggle to the very last to maintain it. They ought to struggle at the expense even of their blood to maintain this the most precious of their constitutional rights. While I take this view of the case, I condemn in the strongest terms imaginable all interference in the State of Kentucky or elsewhere with the freedom of election. The right is one that should never be surrendered under any circumstances, and force should be met by force everywhere where the attempt is made.

Now, here is a clear case of military interference, unjustifiable, unconstitutional, and lawless, and justified on no principle whatever. Yet the question is, does it therefore follow that where there was any military interference to any extent whatever the election was rendered void? To illustrate the matter, suppose that in an election between A and B, the sheriff in a single precinct, with a mob surrounding him, in a lawless manner and by force excludes half a dozen good and loyal citizens who had a right to vote and who would have voted for B, but still A has received a majority of five thousand in the whole district, is the whole election to be declared void? The mere fact that there was unlawful and criminal interference does not necessarily and per se render the election void. We must come down to some better test than that. I have here the votes in all the districts in Kentucky, and the vote received by the sitting member in this district would have elected any man in any district in Kentucky at the last August election. The vote he received would have been a majority of the largest vote given in any one of the congressional districts in Kentucky. He received over 5,000 majority.

Now, while these unjustifiable orders may have kept some men from the polls, yet is it not to be presumed that the majority who voted for my colleague were compelled to vote for him? The gentleman received a vote which would have elected any congressional candidate in Kentucky, and I must therefore conclude that the election was not rendered void, while at the same time I would denounce in the strongest terms all military interference; and if I give a vote in favor of the sitting member, I do not desire to be understood as giving the least countenance to military interference. I would treat it always with scorn and contempt.

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, there are various allegations in the contestant's notice, all of which are specifically denied, and a few of which have a shadow of support in the evidence taken. I will not trouble the House with reading the pleadings, but will in a few words state the points in controversy. The contestant alleges that my election was procured and his defeat was caused by military interference. He affirms that and I deny it; and that is the issue which this House has to try. It is not a question whether this or that order was right; the question is whether the people of the district have spoken, and whether I was elected and he was defeated by military interference or their choice.

Before I address myself to the main question at issue in this case, I desire to make a few passing allusions to the debate that occurred in this House on Friday evening. The contestant then declared, as I distinctly understood him after a repetition of what he said, that this order of Colonel Foster was exhibited to me in writing before it was promulgated. That statement I emphatically denied. I understood the contestant afterwards to disclaim it. When my colleague from the Maysville district [Mr. WADSWORTH] made allusion to a fact which he supposed was legitimately stated in the minority report, I explained to him that at the request of gentlemen from other counties, who were in my town, I did frank two copies of it without comment or direction.

In regard to the matter of franking this order I said on this floor that it was a statement which had been interpolated into the minority report by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] That is, foisted, improperly, unduly inserted without authority. In connection with that statement I alleged that it was not a fact averred and relied upon in the pleadings; I alleged that it was nowhere proved in the evidence; I alleged that it was a statement of a thing said to have been hinted or charged in the committee-room; and that the minority member of that committee who made allusion to this matter never was in the committee-room to hear what had occurred there. Having made this distinct statement I appealed to him (my manner may have been earnest, as it usually is, but my language was respectful,) to state when, where, and from whom he got this statement, and by what authority it was put into the minority report. The House will distinctly remember that he distinctly flinched from the question; that he made no pretense or attempt to answer it; but straightway commenced reading an extract about another irrelevant matter, putting an improper construction on what he did read, and finally illustrated his vexation and defeat by firing a volley of conditional epithets at me, and closed the door to further remark on my part by refusing to yield to me. Truly that was a piece of gallant and courtly and generous and knightly conduct on this floor. Such logic is powerful, only it cuts backwards and slays its author. Such manifestations of courage come through a cheap advertisement, and the world generally comes to the conclusion that the article is worth just about as much as the advertisement cost the owner. Having refused to answer the question, having failed to contradict the statements I made, the only possible inference that the House can draw is that he had this statement in an ex parte out-door representation from the mouth of the contestant; and on that authority he presumed to put it in this minority report. I submit to the House whether the charge I made has not been fastened on him by the facts of the case, and by his conduct in that debate.

I wish, Mr. Speaker, that that was the only instance of the kind to be found in the minority report. There is here a military order made part of it, dated "Headquarters, District of Kentucky, Louisville, July 25, 1863," signed "By order of Brigadier General Boyle." Where did that order come from? I affirm that it did not come from the record in this case. It is nowhere averred and relied upon in the pleadings. It is nowhere given in evidence under the general issue. It is barely alluded to by one witness, who makes the allusion without being asked. The contestant's brother—a gentleman who practices law for a living, and who therefore ought to know something about the rules of evidence—undertook to state a part of that paper without stating all of it, and without making proof of the instrument. He undertook to state that three or four men were prevented from voting, without giving the name of a man that was so prevented, and without swearing a single one of the men so referred to. I thank them for introducing that order into this case. I find in it this clause:

"Whenever it becomes necessary to seize or impress private property for military purposes, the property of sympathizers with the rebellion and of those opposed to furnishing any more men or any more money to maintain the Federal Government and suppress the rebellion, will be first seized and impressed."

This is an order by a Kentucky general. It furnishes authority for the conduct complained of in the notice in regard to the impressment of horses.

That order was found in a black pamphlet issued soon after the election by a committee of disappointed candidates, editors who had jumped off the Union train, and original secessionists; a defeated candidate for Governor, a defeated candidate for Congress; a defeated candidate for the Senate; in short, a very select company of courtly gentlemen with sour stomachs. The pamphlet has been industriously used by the contestant in prosecuting his case.

What else do I find in this minority report? I find an allegation that "scarcely a vote was cast for him (the contestant) that was not subject to some illegal test or improper criticism." I affirm that the member of that committee who makes that allegation in this minority report cannot rise in his place and give the names of five men who were treated as he alleges that almost all of the 3,083 who voted for the contestant were treated. In speaking of the order of General Burnside he says that he was called upon to interfere. That is not in the record. If it is true I do not know it to be true. He says in this connection that "every military officer in the State was converted into a judge of the qualifications of voters and candidates, and transmitted their opinions, in the shape of military orders, to the judges of county courts and judges of poll-books, who were constrained to receive and execute them 'at the point of the bayonet.'" The words "at the point of the bayonet" are put in quotation marks, as if they were an extract from the proclamation, or from some of these orders, while they appear in none of them. General Burnside's order gave no such directions. Besides that, his order was issued after all these other orders were issued. What is his order? To see how it comports with the statement that is made of it, I read one extract from it:

"As it is not the intention of the commanding general to interfere with the proper expression of public opinion, all discretion in the conduct of the election will be, as usual, in the hands of the legally appointed judges at the polls, who will be held strictly responsible that no disloyal person be allowed to vote, and to this end the military power is ordered to give them its utmost support."

"The civil authority, civil courts, and business, will not be suspended by this order. It is for the purpose only of protecting, if necessary, the rights of loyal citizens and the freedom of election."

I find, Mr. Speaker, another allegation in this minority report. It says:

"But there is another point in the career of the contestant, from which dates all his misfortunes. He sinned against the spirit of fanaticism on the subject of the negro. He issued an order as colonel of his regiment enforcing the laws of Kentucky on the question of slavery. For this he was dismissed from a service which he had adorned, and in which he had shed his blood."

These facts are not affirmed or relied upon in the pleadings; they are not given in evidence in the general issue. There is but one witness who I remember speaks of the fact, and he brings it out in answer to a question by the contestant himself in order to show why rebels had voted for him. Deposition of J. B. Bennett, page 163 of printed record:

"Question by McHenry, No. 1. Do you, or not, think that the southern-rights men, secessionists, and rebels of Ohio county would have voted for McHenry over Yeaman on account of the manner and principle upon which he was dismissed from the Army, all other things being equal between him and Yeaman?"

"Answer. I think they would have voted for McHenry, on account of the order he issued to his regiment which caused his dismissal, before they would for Yeaman."

Sir, I had no intention of introducing this matter into this discussion; but after its introduction into the House by the minority of the committee and by the contestant himself, let him have the benefit of it. I do not intend to mortify him by reading the order dismissing him from the Army. I do not intend to make any effort to create capital against him by reading that part of the order of the contestant which was construed to be a violation of the Articles of War, and for which he was dismissed from the Army. But it was a common remark in the district that the man who wrote that order ought to go to school a while before he went to Congress; and I will read a single paragraph from the order for the purpose of showing the justice of that opinion.

"All negroes, not slaves or freedmen, will hereafter not be allowed in this regiment, and all officers and soldiers are forbidden from employing any other than slaves or negroes known to be free."

Now, it was a curious question with plain men to know how any negroes could be excluded from camp after admitting all slaves and all free negroes. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, it was no part of my purpose to lug these matters in here against the contestant, and I should not have referred to them if they had not been brought to the attention of the House by the minority report; but I have been constrained by the course pursued by the author of that singular document.

The Committee of Elections, having given this case a protracted, laborious, and patient investigation, reported that I was entitled to the seat. They did this without hesitation, and the vote was unanimous among gentlemen of both political parties who heard the case or paid any attention to it in committee. The case was elaborately argued on both sides. The labors of such a committee on such a question are eminently judicial in their character. Its disposition ought to be attended with the candor, the propriety, and the absence of foreign matter that appertain to judicial investigation and judgment.

I would have nothing to say about this report, notwithstanding its limited and partial view of the case, but for a coarse personal assault on me which its author has seen proper to make. He says:

"But another issue has been presented by the sitting member in this case. He calls in question the loyalty of the contestant, and by elaborate insinuations attempts to identify him with the cause of the southern confederacy."

Omitting some epithets as to myself and some glowing praise upon the contestant, he says again:

"The sitting member remained at his home, which was made secure from the enemies of the country by the patriotism and courage of the contestant, whose fidelity to his Government is now impeached. This war has developed many strange traits of character, but none more so than such a trait as this."

The allegations which I have made in my answer to contestant's notice in regard to his conduct and speeches in the canvass, were made to show why the loyal people of the district voted for me and against him, and in this view were perfectly legitimate. They are fully sustained by the proof in this case. I made them and others to the contestant's face on the stump every day when we canvassed together for two months, and he never once ventured to deny them. I charged that at Calhoun he urged that he ought to be elected to Congress because he had the confidence of both parties, whereas I insisted that I had not the confidence of both parties, but only of one, and deemed it a fatal objection to a man to claim that he had it of both. That at Owensboro' he said, in referring to the beginning of these troubles, "the South said this was an assault on States rights, State laws, and State institutions, and African slavery. We Union men denied it, but it has come upon us, showing that they were right and we were wrong." That at Brownsville he exhorted the people not to send their sons to the Army to fight for radical principles which they could not approve. That at various points he would exhort the people to take their stand upon the principles he would advocate, and fight both North and South to sustain them. That at Whitesville he stated that the rebels had approached him and offered him their votes and all the money he wanted to make the race on if he would take a position against the war, said he declined it, and claimed to himself credit in rejecting the proposition. I charged that he openly, publicly, and privately sought the rebel vote of the district, and boasted that he would receive it. That a great majority of the votes he got were those of rebels and rebel sympathizers. That he and his friends and relations first asked for a Union convention to make a nomination, pledged himself to abide by it, bolted it a month before it was held, boasting that he intended to beat the nominee, and after it had met and made a nomination denounced it all over the district as a radical abolition concern. These are the objections I urged against him on the stump. These are the things that disgusted the Union men of the district and made them vote for me and against him. And because I have used some of these things to illustrate the real character of the canvass the minority member makes it the occasion for the use of language in this report which we would have more naturally expected to hear in a police court. I omitted all allusion to these matters in the argument before the committee, as all the members who heard the case will attest, and as the dissenting member would have known had he deigned to give the case any attention there. I had no desire to allude to them here. I certainly intended not to do it, and now only do it in self-defense.

In referring to that remarkable order issued by the contestant to his regiment, or rather to the newspaper press of the State, and for which he was dismissed from the service, the minority member says, "But lawless fanatics in power and out pursued him as a pack in full cry, and it is with regret that the sitting member is found adding his mouth to the trail." I believe, sir, I made but one allusion to that order in the canvass. I have made none in the record. It does not appear in the record, nor does the persecution complained of. I made no allusion to it in the debate before the committee, and had intended to make none in the discussion here. And this is the justification for my being thus officially blackguarded in this manner. My first impulse was to pass this by in silence as being the best measure of the contempt it deserves. There is but one circumstance inclines me to bestow any notice upon such language found in an official report designed to advise and enlighten this House upon a question affecting the rights of a member and his constituency. That circumstance is that he who found himself capable of using such language is one of the official advisers of the House, and is, in legal contemplation, the official peer of other members. It ought to have occurred to any one who knew something of the proprieties of place and the amenities of civilized life, that such epithets applied to a member here would not convince gentlemen in the House or out of it that the language was deserved, but would rather indicate that its author was so fitted and accustomed to "mouth the trail" with "a pack in full cry" that he had fallen into the innocent error of mistaking it for the natural vocation of man. I offer this as the best apology for this canine offense to the House.

I would scorn to complain of it as any injustice to myself. I have had heavier metal, and certainly more polished shafts, aimed at me in times past. I have survived them; I hope to survive this. But what I do complain of is the insult to this House, to the committee, and to all official and parliamentary courtesy. Such language would be offensive to polite ears and cultivated gentlemen if used in the heat of debate. But to be deliberately offered in printed form as the rhetorical ornamentation of an official semi-judicial judgment, can only be excused upon the ground of the most deplorable lack of culture and good taste. This is the most agreeable solution.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are other matters that occurred on Friday which I am constrained to notice; and in the first place I will refer to some matters alluded to in the argument of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] The gentleman selected two cases designed to illustrate to this House the character of this contest. One was that of Robertson, who had heard Davis say that he, Davis, had voted for me, for certain reasons. Davis was not sworn to prove that he said it, and no man is sworn to prove that even if he did say it the charges alleged were true, or that there was any military interference at that precinct; and that is the sort of hearsay evidence by which it is sought to unsettle me here.

Another case referred to by the gentleman from Indiana is a case where, as stated in the evidence, four men presented themselves at the polls and were not allowed to vote unless they would swear to uphold the Administration. There are gentlemen here who received the impression this had been required by some orders to that effect. Now, sir, there were no such orders civil or military in this case; it was merely the act of one judge, of one person, on one day, at one moment; nowhere else, at no other time; and by whom is it proved? It is proved by a secessionist, who swears that the men to whom it was done were secessionists. Page 16 of record:

"Was any Union man required to take the oaths you have referred to?"

Answer. Of those who are called Union men, there was not.

"What were the men whose votes you have spoken in politics, or what are they called?"

Answer. They are called southern rights."

And, sir, who was it who committed this irregularity which I regretted when I heard of it? An upright man, a good citizen, an impulsive man, a loyal man, a man who at that time carried in his face, yet carries, and will carry to his grave, a rebel bullet that was fired at him on his own threshold, in the presence of his own family, a few months before the act complained of. Is there no allowance to be made for the weakness of human nature? Is there no allowance for rebel outrage; no allowance for the torn, volcanic, unsettled, heated condition of society and of government in the border States? There are men in the world who expect the machinery of society, of government, and of the law to flow along as smoothly in time of civil war as in the times of peace. We know that it is impossible, and I am pained to say that men rise upon this floor and repeat and howl over the complaints of the men and the demons who have brought this great misery and woe on my State.

What else about some of these orders? In the order of events the Legislature of Kentucky prescribed a law disfranchising these men. Governor Robinson issued his proclamation enjoining the officers of the election to enforce that law. The witnesses called by the contestant in this case show that in Owensboro' there was a conspiracy to defeat that law by rebels and secessionists; that threats were made to set aside the law of Kentucky and the proclamation of the Governor, and to vote in despite and regardless of them. It was in connection with those threats that Colonel Foster was called to Owensboro'. It was in connection with those threats which he mentioned to me that I used the language in my answer, "Whatever action you take, let it be as mild as possible." I had no knowledge or information that he intended to issue an order.

What do these orders of Foster and Shackleford state? There are expressions in them which might have been omitted: What is their main purport? They declare that they were issued to enforce the laws of Kentucky. They declare that they were issued to protect Union men and to prevent rebel disturbances. "None but loyal citizens will act as officers of the election." The law of Kentucky formerly said that these officers of election should be divided among the two great parties of the State without calling them Whigs and Democrats. When the rebellion broke out an amendment was passed for the purpose of constraining that law, that those opposed to the Government and the Union and in favor of the rebellion should not for the purposes of the law be held and considered to be one of the political parties of the State. Therefore the practical operation was that Union men, loyal men, under the law of Kentucky were appointed as judges of the election. The military orders practically applied the law of Kentucky on the subject.

What else?

"No one will be allowed to offer himself as a candidate for office, or be voted for at said election, who is not in all things loyal to the State and Federal Governments, and in favor of a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion."

Be that right or wrong, upon whom did it operate? The contestant in this case and the minority report claim that it could not operate upon him. They both affirm that he stood upon the same principle I did; and though I deny that, yet, as they claim and affirm it, they are estopped from objecting to the order, for I am sure it could not apply to one of my position in that campaign.

"The judges of election will allow no one to vote at said election unless he is known to them to be an undoubtedly loyal citizen, or unless he shall first take the oath required by the laws of the State of Kentucky."

Do you hear that? Where there is no doubt of their loyalty the judges are to allow them to vote; but where there is doubt they shall vote by taking the oath prescribed by the law of Kentucky.

In regard to some of the things said here on last Friday by the contestant, and which I regretted, and which I had never intended to lug into this discussion, I desire to make a passing allusion. He said that in the spring of 1861 I corresponded with a committee of secessionists with a view of making the race for Congress. He bandied that thing all over the second congressional district, and I everywhere denied it, and the people responded with a majority for me of 5,224. What are the facts? I was requested to make the race for Congress by gentlemen who said they were Union men on the basis of the Crittenden compromise. They afterwards turned secessionists, and now to-day I am to be held responsible for their changes.

He read from a paper an extract setting forth my political principles in 1861, which he says I submitted to them, and in that paper the language occurs that I was opposed to a war of subjugation. I used that language, and this House used that language two months afterwards, in July, 1861. He said he did not have all that paper. He did not have it all because he did not want it. He could have procured it all as easily as he obtained the extract, and he read that part only which he thought would injure me in this House. Had he read all it would have turned out that at that early day I announced myself uncompromisingly opposed to secession. While I did use the language to which the gentleman refers, I also announced that I was for all the men and all the money necessary to defend the Government, to defend the public property, and execute the laws wherever the Government was in possession. The proof shows it. It shows my position was too strong for those who wanted me to run, and that I refused to run in any event.

But as the gentleman has undertaken to resurrect these things, and has thrown the wager of battle, he shall have it. He has alluded to a celebrated secession meeting held at Owensboro'. He will remember that when he attempted to introduce these things into the records of this case that I objected, and that the judge sustained the objection. I thereupon challenged him to amend his notice of contest; that I would amend my answer, and then we would bring in all this trash about the personal history of both men. He promptly declined the proposition. Had he accepted the challenge I should have alleged and proved that he acted as an officer of that secession meeting of which he spoke.

I read from our village paper of that day:

A Card from Captain McHenry.

SIR: I desire to say through your columns that the resolutions adopted at the mass-meeting of the citizens last week at the court-house, and of which meeting I was the secretary, do not altogether meet my approval, and, as a whole, I cannot indorse them. I expressed my disapproval of them at the time and did not vote on the passage of them.

As I was one of the officers of that meeting I take the liberty of making this announcement.

JOHN H. McHENRY, Jr.

Editor Southern Shield.

"MASS-MEETING IN OWENSBORO'.—At a large mass-meeting held in Owensboro' on Wednesday, the 17th instant, Thomas Pointer was called to the chair, and John H. McHenry, jr., appointed secretary."

The following are some of the resolutions adopted:

"Resolved, That Kentucky should dissolve her connection with the Government of the States known as the United States of America, and resume the powers delegated to that Government.

"Resolved, That Kentucky should unite herself with the confederate States of America.

"Resolved, That we instruct our representatives upon their assembling to immediately place this State upon war footing.

"Resolved, That the Legislature ought as soon as convened to order the calling of a convention.

"T. H. POINTER, Chairman.
"J. H. McHENRY, Jr., Secretary."

I would have alleged and given in evidence, also, that he made one of the most violent speeches at that meeting, offering the power of his right arm and the price of his blood to the cause of the revolution. I would have alleged and given in evidence that he afterwards helped to drill secession soldiers recruiting in our district; and after I had done these things I perhaps should have left a doubt upon the minds of some gentlemen in this House whether he was, under existing laws, eligible to a seat in this House.

Mr. McHENRY. I am glad the gentleman has had candor and fairness enough about him to read a card I published in a paper in connection with the proceedings of that convention. The gentleman knows, and all his friends and our constituents know, that I never entertained any such principles as those set forth in those resolutions. I disapproved of them at the time, and expressed my disapprobation, and the only thing left for me to do was to publish it in a card. The reason I did not vote against them was, I thought it not prudent to do so. There was only one person in that large assemblage of furious, fiery, and drunken men that dared to vote against them, and he was saved from injury for doing so only by his gray hairs.

In reference to the drilling of men who subsequently went South, the gentleman understands as well as I do that in the border slave States anybody who knew anything about military matters was drilling men all over the States. I drilled into the gentleman himself all the military knowledge he ever had, and I am sorry that he has converted that knowledge to no better purpose. And those men who did go South I had an opportunity to drill in a very different way a short time afterwards.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentleman whether he was the secretary of that meeting.

Mr. McHENRY. I acted in that capacity. I will state that that meeting was not called with a view of passing any such resolutions as those. When I took my seat at the secretary's table I understood that the meeting was called simply for the purpose of organizing a home-guard of the militia of the town and county. But the secessionists got control of the meeting and passed the resolutions. The strongest friends of the sitting member in that meeting, men who voted for him and made speeches for him, sustained those very resolutions in that meeting, and some of them are the strongest Union men in that section of the country.

Mr. YEAMAN. I was about to allude to the personnel of that meeting. Where are the men who officiated as officers and speakers at that meeting? One of them who had spoken only to allay excitement expressed himself to a friend as they walked out of the court-house, "My dear sir, we have committed a mistake here to-night, and we will regret it." A few months after that he joined a Union regiment and led it gallantly at the battle of Shiloh, where he was felled to the earth by a ball in his side, and returned to my town to resume his profession, and acted as clerk of the Union convention which gave me a unanimous nomination for Congress. One of them is assuming to be the second representative from my district in the bogus congress at Richmond; one is a confederate prisoner on Johnson's island, and one is here to-day contesting my seat.

The contestant undertook to volunteer the suggestion, when he alluded to that meeting, that if I had been there I too would have gone off to Dixie. Where was I on that day? Thirty miles away in a neighboring county, filling a previous appointment, and making a strong Union speech in reply to a strong secession speech from John W. Crockett, who a few months afterwards helped to organize the bogus provisional government of Kentucky, and a few months afterwards took his seat in the confederate congress! The contestant says that he made a speech early in the canvass, and that his position was misrepresented, and that he issued a circular to make a correction. I remained quiet until I thought it proper for me to speak, lest my silence might be improperly construed. I did speak, and I will read a few words from my circular to the people of the second congressional district of Kentucky, dated Owensboro', May 16, 1863:

"I make my statement upon my own knowledge and responsibility, and if any gentleman thinks he can enhance his political prospects by contradicting it, let him make the experiment. I challenge a contradiction, and will pay no attention to anything less in the form of suggestions or explanations.

"At Calhoun Colonel McHenry spoke first. He reviewed at length the secession conspiracy and the rebel movement, and condemned them, avowing himself for the Union and against the theory of secession as a political principle in government."

"In regard to himself he claimed that his election was necessary to indorse his conduct in the promulgation of his order, and to rebuke the Administration for his dismissal, and further urged his election upon the ground that he was acceptable to both parties, 'having the respect and esteem of both Union men and southern rights men.'

"He advocated the holding of a national convention, and then commented in an impressive manner upon the horrors of war and the blessings of peace. Peace upon honorable terms was very desirable, and asked the question: 'How can this be accomplished?' I can give not only the substance of his answer, but my memory and my notes will not vary materially from his own language: 'Let there be an armistice, a suspension of hostilities, and, if necessary, a withdrawal of the armies; let commissioners be appointed from the seceded States and from our own Government; let them meet and discuss this thing and arrange it if they can, and if they cannot agree they may call in the mediation of some foreign friendly Power, or refer it to this convention, or settle it in some other way.'

"I spoke next. I urged that though the proclamation and the abolition policy were wrong and a great calamity, the war against the rebellion must be prosecuted, nevertheless!"

"That military success was the first thing needed, for at present it was purely a military question. I alluded to an armistice, commissioners, mediators, &c., and made an earnest and distinct argument against them. This elicited no reply or explanation from Colonel McHenry at the time."

"Colonel McHenry was the first candidate, and, so far as I know, the first man in the district to demand or ask for a convention. He was present and consented to the calling of a convention. He told the editor of a Union paper in the district to announce him, subject to the convention, which was inadvertently omitted. He agreed to abide the decision of that convention. He sought the nomination of that convention. If several gentlemen are not sadly mistaken he very soon began to consider whether he should not bolt the convention; and now in a card, dated just one month in advance of its meeting and while professing to believe honestly that he is 'the choice of the Union men of the district,' he yet 'respectfully declines submitting to the action of the convention.' I did not demand a convention, I always consented it might be called, I agreed to abide by its decision, and I yet abide by that agreement."

With that challenge for contradiction outstanding, the contradiction never came, either on the stump or in printed form, and the only objection I ever heard to that circular of mine was among my own friends, who complained that I did not state the facts as strongly as they existed.

Allusion has been made to the vote of the soldiers. The proof shows that there were some fifty soldiers who voted in my congressional district. I verily believe that there were not over one hundred who voted. It is said that they voted for me. They did vote for me. I am proud of it, and I leave it to the House to say whether they had not good reason for so doing.

Allusion has been made by the contestant to the smile which he says illumined my countenance when he applied to me to get somebody's horse released from impressment. Sir, I do not remember the smile. I presume the smile was thrown in by way of ornament, or perhaps the contestant happened to approach me when I had just got my own horse free from impressment, not because of any political considerations, but because my wife and children loved old Charlie, and because he was too old and stiff to do cavalry service. That may have accounted for the smile, and it may be that he found me that day not in a mind to help him to save the horseflesh of his rebel friends who voted for him, as he has boasted on this floor, only five days after he had tried to stir up violence and hostile demonstrations against me in a rebel precinct in our own county, as is proved by one of the depositions in this case, by making inflammatory appeals to them, based on false statements of my conduct in helping to arm and organize the home-guards of the county to defend ourselves against the enemies of the Union, of the Government, and of all law. And he got his reward at that precinct, which is proved in the record to be largely secession, by beating me two to one there; and he got his reward in the neighboring precinct of Yelvington, the political Charleston of our county, by beating me four to one there.

Mr. Speaker, I now desire to read that which is the only thing I had intended to offer to the House in this case, some estimates, figures, and extracts from the record: the vote in August, 1863, was 11,398; of which I received 8,311, and McHenry received 3,087, making my majority 5,224. In 1861, before anybody had gone to the war on either side, the total vote in the counties now composing that district was 14,665. The district afterwards furnished 5,714 Union troops, according to the official account, and about 2,200 rebel troops according to the evidence. The whole number of men in the district who refused to vote on account of the oaths required, giving the largest effect to hearsay evidence, second-hand statements, and guesses, was 77; and the total number who are really proved by competent evidence to have refused to vote on account of oaths required was 17; and some of these refused to take the oath prescribed by the law of Kentucky. The precincts where any interference is attempted to be proved are Owensboro', Curds-ville, Oakford, Murray, Walnut Bottom, Henderson, Sacramento, Myers's Mill, Skylesville, Greenville, the Point. Strike out the vote of these precincts and it leaves me 7,024, and leaves the contestant, McHenry, 2,909, still leaving my majority in the district 4,115. Exchange the vote, give him mine and give me his at these precincts, and I have 7,212, and McHenry has 4,096, leaving my majority 3,016. Strike out the vote of the entire counties in which these precincts are and I have 6,178, and McHenry has 2,306, leaving my majority 3,872.

Decidedly the largest vote ever cast in the twelve counties composing the second district was in the triangular race for President between Bell, Douglas, and Breckinridge in 1860, when the whole number of votes cast was 15,236. Make that election the basis, and give me the votes I got in August, 1863, 8,311, and give contestant all the balance, 6,925, and my majority is 1,386.

At the election for delegates to the border State convention in the same counties in 1861 the vote was 13,328. Upon the same plan, giving me the vote I got in August, 1863, and contestant all the balance, and my majority is 2,294.

At the congressional election in June, 1861, the vote in the same counties was 14,665. My majority of this vote, estimated in the same way, would be 1,957.

In the second district in June, 1861, before nearly eight thousand men had gone out, the vote of James S. Jackson (Union candidate) was 9,281; the vote of J. T. Bunch (secesh) was 3,364, making a total of 5,917.

At the special election in October, 1862, to fill a vacancy, the entire vote for myself and E. R. Weir, as loyal a man as breathes the air of Kentucky, was 4,027. So that my majority in August, 1863, exceeded the entire vote of October, 1862, by 1,197.

The evidence shows in all about 7,916 soldiers to have gone out on both sides. These were not all voters. Deduct twenty-five per cent. for minors and it would leave as absent from the district 5,937 voters. Cast all the balance, as shown by any fair estimate, give me 8,311 and the contestant the remainder, and I beat him 3,172. But this is not a fair estimate. It is supposing all the votes to be polled, which never occurs, and is giving the contestant all the non-voters, which surely would not have occurred.

Professor Lieber, in a chapter based on a vast research of the statistics of elections in countries both of limited and of universal suffrage, and having special reference to the United States, says:

"If the number of qualified voters exceeds several thousand, one half of it is generally a fair number for the actual voters; two thirds shows an animated state of things, and three fourths an evidence of great excitement."

The history of this district shows that at the presidential election in 1860 twenty-five per cent. of the voters staid away from the polls; in May, 1861, for border State delegates, thirty-seven per cent.; for Congress, in June, 1861, thirty per cent. There are no figures for August, 1861, but we will say twenty-five per cent. This leaves out this contested case and the special election in October, 1862, when the vote was confessedly small.

Then at four elections, in times of high political excitement and while there was a full voting population at home, the average of non-voting citizens was twenty-nine per cent., nearly one third. Take the highest number of white male adults shown on the auditor's books for any one year, 21,170. Say that from alienage, recent removals, and other causes, 500 of these could not vote, an estimate conceded by contestant, leaving on auditor's books 20,670. For fear of under-estimating the number of minors among the volunteers and the number of discharged and returned soldiers, we will say there were absent from the district on election day only 3,000. That leaves in the district 17,670 as the voting population of the district on the day of election. Deduct from this, not the largest per cent. nor the average per cent., but the smallest per cent., one fourth, that ever staid away from the polls in that district, 4,417, and it leaves as the probable vote for August, 1863, 13,253; number really cast, 11,398; apparent deficit, 1,855.

How is this deficit accounted for? In the first place there are many rebels in that district who are too consistent and too honest to vote for anybody to come to this Congress, deeming themselves citizens of the confederacy. And then it is in proof that large numbers of them could not vote and did not offer to vote under the law of Kentucky and Governor Robinson's proclamation. But cast the whole vote, 13,253; give me what I got, 8,311, and the contestant all the balance, 4,942, and my majority is 3,367.

I desire to add another remark about two small precincts that were selected to give a false coloring to this whole case—Yanovers, where one man is said to have said certain things, and Curdsville, where four sympathizers were required to take an oath which their politics and the resentment of an intensely loyal man may have suggested as proper. The strict rule of law is to take from my vote, or add to the contestant's, that number. The widest rule is not to condemn the whole election, nor the poll of the whole county, but only of the precincts where irregularities occurred. Concerning the recent election in Maryland a minority report was made to the Legislature of that State by some of the members belonging to that political party supposed to have been wronged by certain orders, from which I take the following language:

"This act of illegal and violent interference with the election meets with the unqualified condemnation of the undersigned, as an act of gross usurpation and wrong; but they cannot understand why this closing of one precinct out of fifteen in the county should invalidate the whole election, unless it could be also shown that the closing of said polls defeated the choice of the voters of said county, which the testimony by no means sustains.

"At a majority of the other precincts there was more or less of military interference, appearing mainly to be designed to impair the vote of Mr. Crisfield and to promote the election of Mr. Creswell, opposing candidates for Congress, without aiming especially at any other candidate, except by one John W. Davis, provost marshal at Tyaskin precinct, who was willing that any voter should vote for whom he pleased, provided the voter would vote or promise to vote for him for sheriff. But he does not seem to have received many votes; nor does it appear that many, if any, voters were excluded from the polls at that precinct. At some of the precincts there was little or no interference."

"In the cases before you it is unquestionably true that no fraud, violence, or other illegalities were prompted, instigated, or practiced by the successful candidates, or by or through any of their friends, agencies, or means, or in any way intended to promote their election."

I would the same fairness and candor could be practiced here. Apply that rule, and you will have excluded from the count less than an aggregate of two hundred votes; still leaving me the county and leaving me the district by over five thousand votes. I will now ask the Clerk to read some extracts from the evidence.

The Clerk read, as follows:

A. L. Morton, clerk of court at Hartford, says, page 161 of printed record:

"I do not know of any military interference in the county. I think there was but one man's vote questioned; he refused to take the oath, consequently he did not vote at the time; but he afterwards voted, and voted for McHenry. This man was D. S. Stevens."

"Has he, or not, always been considered a secessionist?"

"Answer. He belongs to what is called the southern-rights party."

"Did, or not, every secessionist and rebel in this precinct vote without being required to take any oath?"

"Answer. Every one voted that wished to. I heard of no one that was required to take any oath except D. S. Stevens; and he voted without taking any oath, so I have been told."

"Did you ever know a fairer election in Ohio county than the last August election?"

"Answer. I never knew a fairer election than the August election in this county."

"How many soldiers voted at the Hartford precinct?"

"Answer. I do not know of more than five or six. I have examined the poll-books, and did not see any more that I knew. There may probably have been two or three that I did not know."

"How did the secessionists vote for Congressmen in Ohio county?"

"Answer. I do not know how all of them voted. I know of no one that voted but what voted for McHenry."

"Did you, or not, ride about a great deal over the county? and state whether or not any one was prevented from voting in Ohio county by any military order or military interference?"

"Answer. I was in several precincts in the county before the election, and was always of the opinion that Yeaman would carry the county. I know of no one that was prevented from voting by any military orders or military interference of any kind."

H. M. Woodruff says of Owensboro', page 8:

"Did not the election pass off very quietly, and was any person interrupted by the few soldiers who were present on the court square?"

"Answer. The election was a remarkably quiet one, and I saw or heard no interruptions of citizens by the soldiers."

"Was there any interruption of the voting by the soldiers?"

"Answer. None that I ever heard of or saw."

"Was there any restriction upon the voting that day?"

"Answer. None that I know of."

John A. Robertson says of Vanover's, page 18:

"Were there any soldiers present, and what regiment did they belong to?"

"Answer. There were soldiers present, and belonged to the third Kentucky cavalry, most of them."

"Were these soldiers guarding the polls, or were they on furlough?"

"Answer. They did not disturb the polls. Some of them said they were on furlough, and that they came there to vote."

A. C. Sutherland says of Murray's, page 19:

"Were there soldiers at the polls?"

"Answer. Two men came there in soldier's uniform with muskets, and voted and went away. They did not take any further part in the election."

"Was the Wickliffe ticket scratched off; was McHenry's name erased?"

"Answer. I do not know whether Wickliffe's name was scratched off or not. I know McHenry's was not."

J. C. Ashby says of Boston, page 20:

"Was there a full vote polled at your precinct?"

"Answer. Not a full vote, but as large as has been polled since the rebellion commenced."

"Was there a free and fair vote for Colonel McHenry?"

"Answer. I heard of no objections made to anybody voting for him."

Elijah Hocker, page 42:

"Where is your voting precinct? and state if any unfairness was carried on in that precinct by soldiers or any one else."

"Answer. My voting precinct is Hartford. There was none that I saw."

J. L. Render says of the same town and county, page 43:

"Was there or not a full vote given in Ohio county at the last August election?"

"Answer. I do not know what vote was cast."

"Was there any unfairness in conducting said election, by soldiers or any one else?"

"Answer. I saw no unfairness by soldiers or any one else; everybody was allowed to vote. I voted at the Hartford precinct."

Edmund Roach says of Adams Fork, page 52:

"Were all the McHenry men required to take the oath?"

"Answer. No, they were not. I voted for McHenry myself, and many others also voted for him, who were not required to take the oath."

"Was there a full vote taken at the Adams Fork precinct?"

"Answer. I do not know whether there was or not; but I think the voters were nearly all there, and nearly all voted."

"Did the soldiers interfere with the election?"

"Answer. Not that I saw or heard. The soldiers were more peaceable than the citizens. I saw some of them vote; they were all citizens of the precinct that I saw vote."

"Was there any person called a secessionist or southern rights man in that precinct who voted for Yeaman? State if they did not all vote for McHenry."

"Answer. I saw none called secessionists but what voted for McHenry. I know of none such who voted for Yeaman."

J. H. Reno says of Muhlenburg county, page 131:

"Judge Yeaman had written me about five days before the election, on the subject of how the vote would go in Muhlenburg county. In answer to this, and before the election, my memory is, I wrote Judge Yeaman he would receive a majority in this county of eight hundred. The majority was something over that, but not very considerable."

John O'Brien, clerk of county court, says of Owensboro', page 135:

"State how the election passed off on Monday, the 3d of August, 1863."

"Answer. So far as I know it seemed to be quiet; there was no disturbance or fuss. There were some troops about the court-house, armed."

"Did you see or hear of any interference by them with anybody?"

"Answer. I did not."

"Were you at Oakford, in this county, when we spoke there in July?"

"Answer. I was."

"Did you notice who applauded and who interrupted either of us? If so, state by whom it was done."

"Answer. I did not notice particularly who they were. There was a good deal of applause while he was speaking. I did not know who they were."

"Was it the rebel or the Union party?"

"Answer. There was not much Union party there; they were generally secessh."

"Who was interrupted, and by what party or persons?"

"Answer. Judge Yeaman was interrupted in the beginning of his speech; and you flashed your eyes so keen I thought I would get out, as there might be a row."

Major Calhoun, page 147:

"The Union party of McLean voted almost unanimously for Hon. G. H. Yeaman. The result was as most of the Union men of the county had expected; at least I had heard many of them express themselves before the election that such would be the result."

"McLean has been considerably infested by guerrillas since the rebellion first commenced. Owing to the countenance and comfort rendered to guerrillas, many of the citizens of McLean did not offer to vote."

"So far as I know, the election in the county was quiet and orderly."

Henry Griffith, late sheriff of McLean county, says, pages 150, 151:

"I was in McLean county on the 3d of August last, and at the voting precinct of said county in the town of Calhoun. The election was quiet and orderly, so far as my knowledge extends, save one instance, and that was when P. B. Hicks proposed to vote, Captain Smallhouse told him he was not entitled to a vote. If I am not mistaken, however, after some parleying Hicks did vote. I was at the polls frequently during the day of election, and saw no force used to prevent any one from voting."

"I know that the county of McLean has been much infested by bands of guerrillas since the rebellion began, and am satisfied that the guerrillas did receive voluntary aid from the rebel sympathizers in the county. A number of those that I consider rebel sympathizers did not go to the voting place, and I presume it was on account of Governor Robinson's proclamation of July 30, 1863, and the Kentucky act of March 11, 1862. I heard some one or two say that they would not take the oath prescribed by the Legislature of Kentucky."

"The Union party, as a general thing, voted for George H. Yeaman in the race between him and John H. McHenry, jr. The result of the election was about as I expected it would be for weeks prior to the election of August 3, 1863. So far as I know, the election was quiet throughout the county of McLean."

"I was in Rumsey on the day of the election, and there was no interference with the soldiers stationed in Rumsey at that time with the voting at the polls, and the election was quiet and orderly carried on, so far as I know, as any previous election was ever conducted in the county."

Wm. A. Layton says, page 156:

"I am a justice of the peace of McLean county, and was one of the judges of the election of August 3, referred to above."

"State whether or not the election in the precinct of Livermore was not quiet and orderly."

"Answer. It was."

"Do you or not know that no force or threats were used in your precinct to prevent persons from voting?"

"Answer. None that I saw or heard of."

"Was or not every person who offered to vote allowed to do so?"

"Answer. Every person who offered to vote did so except two, who refused to take the oath."

"So far as you know or are informed, was or not the election throughout the county of McLean, on the 3d of August last, as quiet and orderly as elections in this county usually are?"

"Answer. So far as my information extends it was."

"There were soldiers at the election, persons whose homes were in that voting precinct, and who came to the election to vote, and did vote. They did not control or in any way interfere with the voting. The election was entirely controlled by the officers appointed for that purpose by the McLean county court, who, in every instance, determined the qualifications of voters."

James B. Bennett says, page 162:

"I travel a great deal over the county. I had my notion about it. My opinion was that they stood for Yeaman before the election."

"Was there any military interference in Ohio county by soldiers or military orders to prevent any one from voting for McHenry?"

Answer. Not that I know of. I saw none here at the Hartford precinct, nor did I hear of any in this county. I was here all the day of the last August election, and the military did not interfere at all.

"Was any man prevented from voting for McHenry or any one else in the Hartford precinct?"

Answer. Not that I saw or heard of.

"Did you ever see an election conducted more fairly in Ohio county?"

Answer. As far as this precinct is concerned, I never did."

"How did the secessionists vote for Congressman in Ohio county, so far as you have learned?"

Answer. They voted for McHenry as far as I know. I have not heard of any voting for Yeaman."

J. B. Stevens says, page 163:

"I acted as sheriff at the election precinct at Hartford. There was no interference by the military or any one else; all were allowed to vote who made application, and no oath was required of any one."

T. Maddox says, page 140:

"I acted as sheriff of election at the Knottsville precinct, No. 4."

"How was the election conducted, and how did it go off?"

Answer. A more peaceable election we never have had there, and I have acted as sheriff a good many years.

"Was anybody disturbed or prevented from voting by soldiers or anybody else?"

Answer. There was not, sir.

"What was done in the way of swearing voters, or requiring oaths of them?"

Answer. There were but two required to be sworn.

"What oath was administered to those two?"

Answer. The one required by the proclamation of Governor Robinson, of July 20, 1863, and the act of the Kentucky Legislature, of March 11, 1863, and no other oaths."

Colonel James M. Holmes, page 142:

"Were you or not present at Knottsville on Saturday the 1st day of August, 1863, when I and Colonel McHenry spoke there?"

Answer. I was.

"In his speech that day was he much applauded; if so, by whom?"

Answer. He was applauded a good deal, and by the rebel party.

"Did he or not charge me with having said I would not receive rebel votes, and that if elected by them I would not serve; and said he would not get mad at anybody for voting for him, nor resign either?"

Answer. He did.

"Did I or not make such a statement in my speech on that day about rebel votes, as charged by him?"

Answer. You did.

"Do you remember any statements or charges or allusions made by him against me calculated to excite the rebel population against me?"

Answer. I remember he said something about your assuming command of the home guard here without authority, and sent out a party who shot a man in cold blood; and further that you had been instrumental in procuring assessments to be levied on the rebels because of guerrilla raids.

"Do you or not remember that he made a statement in language or substance to this effect: 'That Kentucky must take her position, and fight North and South, East and West, and roll back the tides of fanaticism from her?'"

Answer. I do.

"Do you or not remember he made a statement in that speech in language or substance as follows: 'Kentucky is my home and my native State, and I will follow her, and her position shall be mine wherever she goes?'"

Answer. Yes, sir.

"Did he or not object to me that I had not and would not endorse the sentiment?"

Answer. He did.

"Question by McHenry. Do you think there was any effort made by McHenry to excite any hostile demonstration against Mr. Yeaman there that day?"

Answer. I thought there was."

H. M. Woodruff, page 136, says:

"After his (Colonel McHenry's) refusal to submit his name to the Union convention of the district, whose support did he seek and receive, judging from his conduct, associations, and the conduct of the two political parties of this county and district?"

Answer. It is my opinion that Colonel McHenry sought the support of both parties, but that he received his suffrages chiefly from the party styling themselves 'southern rights men.'"

R. M. Hathaway, page 25, says:

"Since Colonel McHenry's dismissal from the Army, and his refusal to go into the Union convention, how has he been regarded by the Union party and loyal men generally?"

Answer. The Union men gradually lost confidence in Colonel McHenry from the time of his dismissal from the Army; and since he avowed himself opposed to furnishing any more money or men, taken in connection with his associations with the secesh party, I am convinced a very large majority of the Union party have lost all confidence in him as a Union man."

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have but one remark to make in reference to this testimony; that is, that a majority of the witnesses from whose evidence I have quoted were witnesses called on behalf of the contestant in this case. I carried every county in the district. In a contested election where the result is charged to military interference, it would seem my majorities ought to be largest where contestant has complained most; and surely, as a good manager, he would take his proof where he could make the most of it. Now, to the facts: just in the counties where most is alleged and where the proof was taken, my majorities were smallest; and just in the counties—more than half in the district—where nothing is alleged and no proof taken, my majorities are largest. This remark does not apply to Muhlenburg, where some proof was taken and nothing proved except that the people nearly all voted for me, because they were nearly all loyal.

I desire now to call the attention of the House to some of the principles involved in this case. In a contested election from the Territory of Michigan, Biddle and Richard vs. Wing, in 1826, this House held—

"An election is the act of selecting on the part of the electors a person for an office of trust."

Speaking of referring a case back to the people, it is said:

"This, however, ought not to be done when it is possible to ascertain what the true result has been. The elective privilege is a very important one, and ought to be held in the highest estimation."

"No doubts which are capable of being solved ought to be permitted to operate against them. Indeed, nothing short of the impossibility of ascertaining for whom a majority of votes have been given ought to vacate an election."

In another case coming from Virginia in 1793—Trigg vs. Preston—a company of soldiers under the command of Captain Preston, a brother of the sitting member, had a disturbance at the polls; a magistrate was knocked down, blood was spilled, the poll surrounded, and voters kept away. The sitting member had a majority in the whole district of 10 votes instead of 5,224. The committee on account of the disturbance reported against his right, but after a protracted discussion the House confirmed him in his seat.

None will doubt General Burnside's naked legal right and power to declare martial law in his department or any portion of it. The propriety of it or the sufficiency of the reasons that moved him are another question. His power as a military commander was undoubted. Does then martial law per se make void an election not controlled by it, when the result could not have been otherwise, and when the order specified it was to secure the enforcement instead of the suspension of the local law or elections? Admitting any given act or order to be illegal, is the sitting member to be held responsible for it unless he be shown to be particeps criminis? If any irregularity will make void an election, a candidate seeing his defeat sure might spoil the election by procuring the commission of an irregularity, and thus do by fraud and connivance what he could not do at the ballots. If any order by the military will vitiate an election, no matter what the vote, it is in the power of any Administration to perpetuate itself in power by secretly causing some subordinate to issue some order, and then, though it had no control over the election, though the sitting member got a clear majority of all the votes in the district, he must go out because of this order. So that the question in every case is, Has there been an election? Have the people spoken, and what have they said? And this House is the sole and supreme judge of that without any appeal.

Viewing this case in the light of these principles, what do we find? This contestant, in giving me the notice of contest, does not claim that he is entitled to a seat in this House. I submit, therefore, whether the statute was made for such a case. I submit whether he had the right to come here and trouble the House with his case, not claiming in his notice that he is the duly elected member. In the petition to this House he says in one sentence that the facts on which he claims his seat are set out in the notice; but in the notice he does not claim the seat. In the next sentence he says that the whole election was void, null, and unconstitutional; and then in the next he asks that the case be sent back to the people. A man cannot claim under the will and against the will. He must take either as heir or devisee. A man cannot go before the chancellor claiming the re-scission and the specific performance of the same stipulation. He must elect one or the other.

It would seem, then, that he comes here without knowing exactly what he is entitled to. It is a sort of experimental litigation which this House is under no obligation to encourage or listen to. The same kind of pleading is manifested in his notice. In one sentence he says that Burnside's proclamation was unauthorized and unconstitutional; in the next place he says it was issued without cause, and that the causes alleged were false, thus raising a question of veracity between him and the distinguished general; and in the next sentence he complains that the election was not carried on in accordance with Burnside's proclamation. That, sir, is remarkable pleading for a man to come into this body with.

Now, I suggest for the consideration of the House that in a case of this kind where any matter is complained of or relied upon by the contestant it must be alleged and must be shown that it went to the full length of changing the result; in point of fact, that my election must have been caused and his defeat must have been caused by the influences complained of, or else no case at all is shown. It is not like an action in law, where you can measure the damages in dollars and cents. Here is no case, here are no damages, unless the thing complained of goes to the whole length of changing the result. Because if the result is not changed the party complaining is not damaged. That is the point of law I make in this matter.

Here is a case of a gentleman working two saws; with one saw he wants to get into this House, and with the other he wants to get before the people again. With one saw he works against Burnside's proclamation, and with the other against the election, because it was not conducted in accordance with Burnside's proclamation.

In regard to this testimony, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing perfectly manifest, to which I desire for a moment to call the attention of the House. We in Kentucky—and it is a point material in the determination of this case—had not the same kind of political organizations which you gentlemen of the North have. We had not there Republicans, Abolitionists, War Democrats, and Peace Democrats. We had but two parties, Union men and secessionists; friends of the Government and friends of the rebellion. There is at present an unfortunate division grown up in the Union party, but at the time this contest was going on the evidence shows that the State was divided into these two parties.

I made plain sailing with these gentlemen. I told them I wanted no misunderstanding with them. I told them that if I was elected and came here I would go for granting all the material resources of the Government to overcome that rebellion with which their sympathies were in such active support. I told them more; I told them that if they wanted this Government overturned, that if their labors and their prayers were in active co-operation with the armed enemies of the country, if they were respectable or self-respecting men they would neither consent to hold office under a Government they desired to overturn nor would they vote for any man who would hold office under such a Government.

Sir, I went further with them. I told them that if they wanted my Government destroyed, that if their sympathies were in unison and harmony with armed rebellion, I did not expect their support, that I did not ask their support, and that if they persisted in voting for me, and I could trace enough of their names on the poll-books to control my election, I would not take my seat in this House. And, so help me God, I would not have done it. To whom did I thus address myself? A vast majority of the men who voted for the contestant. I will read an extract from page 132 of printed record:

"Do or do not the rebels, secessionists, and rebel sympathizers call themselves southern rights men?"

Answer. Yes, sir.

"Are they or not the same who in times past, since the commencement of the present civil war, and before they were prevented by military orders and the presence of military force, would openly and fiercely advocate the rebellion, secession, and Jeff. Davis, and denounce the Government, the Union, and Union men, and rejoice over every reverse of the Union arms?

"From your knowledge of the county, and conversation and expressed intentions of the secessionists and rebel sympathizers of this county and district since the beginning of the present civil war, state whether it would have been possible to preserve the peace, and the rights, lives, and property of loyal men, without the presence at times of a military force, and without the organization of home guards, composed of Union men, and armed with guns and ammunition from the Government.

"Answer. I do not think it would.

"Without that force is it not apparent that entire submission to them or emigration or expulsion from the county would have been imposed on loyal men?

"Answer. I think so."

"Answer. I concur in the answers of said Woodruff to those questions, and do now render the same answers myself. I believe it was their intention to carry into effect the Richmond ordinances of the rebel authorities, that all men should take the oath prescribed in forty days or leave the country, and if found in the country after the expiration of that time should be liable to be seized and treated by the military or civil authorities as traitors and spies.

"What is the reason such ordinances are not carried out in Kentucky now?

"Answer. My opinion is, it is from the protection given by the military power."

"Answer. I agree with him in the facts stated in answer to said questions, and do now answer them myself as he did, except as to No. 7, that I am thoroughly convinced the peace could not have been preserved and Union men protected without such force and assistance, and it was not always done with that assistance, but much outrage committed on them; and as to No. 8, I answer that such threats were openly made before any military force was posted here or organized among the citizens; such threats were made about me in person.

"No. 7. What is the reason such threats and schemes are not now carried out by the secession party of this district and State?

"Answer. I know of no other reason except they are afraid to do it and have not the power; it is not for the want of the will."

Mr. ANDERSON. With the consent of my colleague I desire to ask him whether he signed a letter addressed to the people of Kentucky, in which the Senators and Representatives advised cooperation with the Wickliffe party in the coming presidential election? I saw such a statement in a call for a Democratic convention, published in the Louisville papers, addressed to the people of Kentucky, stating that the two Senators and all the Representatives in the House, with the exception of three abolitionists, had advised the union of all parties in opposition to the present Administration, and advising the sending of delegates to the Chicago convention.

Mr. YEAMAN. I do not know what letter my colleague refers to; and I only state positively and in general terms that I have signed no letters to anybody in regard to calling any political convention in Kentucky. That is all I have to say about it.

Mr. MALLORY. With the permission of my colleague I wish to say a word. Any statement in any newspaper, any charge that the Senators and Representatives from the State of Kentucky have advised a union between the secessionists and their party, or any party in that State, is false. There is not one word of truth in it.

There has been a letter addressed to the people of Kentucky which I signed, and which the Senators and several members here signed. I do not know whether my colleague [Mr. YEAMAN] is among them. It calls upon the people of Kentucky, all who are entitled to vote under the laws of Kentucky, all freemen and citizens of that State who have the right to the elective franchise, to unite in opposition to the present administration of the Government, and to vote at the next presidential election for some candidate to displace it. That is the letter that was written. There was no invitation to the secessionists of Kentucky to vote with us, and I give any such statement the lie here in the House.

Mr. ANDERSON. My colleague will understand I only stated what I saw in the papers.

Mr. MALLORY. Of course I so understood it.

Mr. YEAMAN. I desire now to allude to another matter which I was about to omit. If there is any gentleman in the House who feels inclined to vote against my having my seat with a view of retaining his political consistency, and to put himself right on the record on all orders of military commanders in reference to elections, I tell him to be careful how he does it, for in the light of the past, and in the light of coming events which cast their shadows before them, he may be stating a case which will embarrass him. Let me read:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE POTOMAC,
WASHINGTON, October 29, 1861.

GENERAL: There is an apprehension among Union citizens in many parts of Maryland of an attempt at interference with their rights of suffrage by disunion citizens on the occasion of the election to take place on the 6th of November next.

In order to prevent this, the major general commanding directs that you send detachments of a sufficient number of men to the different points in your vicinity where the elections are to be held to protect the Union voters, and to see that no disunionists are allowed to intimidate them, or in any way to interfere with their rights.

He also desires you to arrest and hold in confinement till after the election all disunionists who are known to have returned from Virginia recently, and who show themselves at the polls, and to guard effectually against any invasion of the peace and order of the election. For the purpose of carrying out these instructions you are authorized to suspend the habeas corpus. General Stone has received similar instructions to these. You will please confer with him as to the particular points that each shall take the control of.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. B. MARCY, Chief of Staff.
Major General N. P. BANKS,
Commanding Division, Muddy Branch, Maryland.

Show me an order in regard to the election in Kentucky half so strong as that! Suspend the habeas corpus, send detachments of soldiers, arrest secessionists who show themselves at the polls, and confer with General Stone as to the points to be controlled.

Mr. PRICE. Who issued that order?

Mr. YEAMAN. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that when the political and military history of the struggle in the border States comes to be written, that order will appear as one of the brightest gems in the life and services of General George B. McClellan.

I would I had time to allude in fitting terms to the gallant officers who have been referred to in this case, and to the declamatory and superlative denunciation that has been heaped upon them by the contestant and the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] Some men have a talent for making up in words what they lack in ideas, and it is a prompt and instinctive resource with some natures to supply with coarseness what they lack in power.

Colonel Foster's services protected all that region of Kentucky, my home, the contestant's home, from rebel and guerrilla outrage and depredation. Without those services the courts could not have been held nor the laws administered in a large district of country. He afterwards led a brigade with brilliant success in East Tennessee. And the contestant will not forget that day on the banks of Green river, when he and I waged a bloodless war of words about politics in stone's throw of where Foster and his gallant Hoosiers stood in battle order, expecting John Morgan and his avalanche of cavalry, nor how they traveled all night in a different direction when it was learned Morgan was crossing into Indiana.

Colonel Maxwell issued no improper furloughs; he made no threats and issued no orders to influence soldiers to vote for me. A gallant gentleman, a learned lawyer, an orator by nature, from the beginning a Union man without "if" or condition, the conqueror of cruel difficulties in early life, he led his regiment on many a well-stricken field, and was attending to his business there while the contestant was trying to disorganize the Union party in my district, and during the six long months he has been staying here to defeat in this Hall the expressed will of the people.

A letter was read said to have been written by my constituent, General Shackleford, early in 1861, and his conduct has been the subject of severe comment. Why this ungenerous assault on him at this late day? Suppose he did write it. He afterwards led his regiment in the assault on Donelson; afterwards shed his blood in battle with the enemies of his country in cannon sound of where that letter was dated, performed that brilliant pursuit and capture of Morgan and his forces in Indiana and Ohio, and by his generalship and great victory at Cumberland Gap laid all East Tennessee in the power of Burnside's campaign.

General Burnside needs no defense at my hands. His services have become a part of the history of his country. And some will suspect that those services, illustrated by his modesty in victory and his frankness in defeat, have been more offensive to some men than his order about the election in Kentucky, especially to one of my colleagues in the north end of the Capitol, who has in his place in the Senate denounced him as "the ever-infamous Burnside." If the cause of the country is infamous, so is Burnside's career; if the cause of the rebellion is glorious, Burnside's career has been a crime.

Mr. Speaker, I know not what the result of this case may be; I only know what it ought to be. If I am in this seat improperly, there is to-day no de jure Governor in the State of Kentucky, for he was elected under the same order of things. If I am here to-day improperly, there is no de jure Legislature in Kentucky, for they were elected under the same order of things. If I am here improperly not a man on either side of this House from Kentucky is entitled to his seat.

Sir, it strikes not at me: It strikes at the loyal people of my district, at the loyal people of Kentucky, and our entire State organization. I know not what the effect would be to tell those people after what they have done that they shall not receive protection at the hands of the Government; to discourage, mortify, and disgust the loyal people of my district and the whole State by putting the seal of condemnation by this House upon that whole election, and thereby listen to the complaints of the enemies of the country and give them encouragement and moral sanction by which they would leap into the next contest with renewed life and energy and tenfold venom, malignity, and insolence.

I make no predictions as to what the effect of such a course upon these people might be. I only say if you want to increase the friends of the Union in Kentucky don't you do it. While I make no promises for others I can speak for myself. The contestant has said upon this floor, and repeatedly in the canvass, that Kentucky was his native State, that he loved Kentucky, and would follow her destinies wherever she went. Mr. Speaker, I, too, love Kentucky; profoundly, tenderly do I love her; land of my birth, home of my manhood. She gave me existence; she gave me position; she gave me her confidence, and she has my gratitude. All that I am, all that I can hope to be, I owe first to the name of America, and next to the name of Kentucky; and I will follow her course, accept her counsels, and abide her destiny so long as she doth walk proudly in the light of the stars that gleam from the flag of my country, and girdles her loins in the beauty and strength of its tricolored zones. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SMITHERS. I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The question being on the following resolution reported from the Committee of Elections—

Resolved, That George H. Yeaman is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the second congressional district of Kentucky in the Thirty-Eighth Congress—

Mr. ANDERSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Canson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Harding, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Anos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Otis, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radiator, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Sweat, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Wadsworth, Elihu D. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—96.

NAYS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Chanler, Cof-foth, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Benjamin G. Harris, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Knapp, Le Ross, Long, McDowell, Morrison, Pendleton, Pruyn, Rice, Stiles, Voorhees, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—26.

So the resolution was agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WEBSTER stated that he would have voted in the affirmative, but he was paired off with Mr. HARRIS, who had been called home in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa, stated that Mr. KASSON was sick and confined to his room, and that he would have voted in the affirmative if he had been here.

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleague, Mr. MILLER, would have voted in the negative had he not been paired off.

Mr. GRINNELL stated that Mr. JULIAN, who had gone to attend the funeral of Mr. Giddings, would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, stated that Mr. ARNOLD had been obliged to leave the House on account of sickness in his family.

The vote was then announced as above recorded. Mr. SMITHERS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REBEL SOLDIERS IN HOSPITALS, ETC.

Mr. COLE, of California, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire by what authority and under whose direction rebels were interspersed with the national soldiers throughout the various hospitals in this city, and as to the comparative treatment of the rebel and Union soldiers in the hospitals.

Resolved further, That the same committee be instructed to inquire whether or not persons lately in the rebel army are employed in places of trust and profit by the United States Government at Giesboro' Point, and if so by whose authority, how many, and in what capacity they are employed; and

Resolved further, That the same committee be instructed to inquire whether any disloyal persons are employed as clerks in any of the Departments of the Government; and if so, who are responsible for such employment; and that the committee have authority to send for persons and papers, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to report the facts to this House at any time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

THE WAR.

Mr. LAZEAR asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas the fratricidal war which has for the last three years filled every neighborhood of our once united and happy country with mourning, and has drenched a hundred battle-fields with the blood of our fellow citizens, and laid waste many of the fairest portions of the land, and yet has failed to restore the authority of the Federal Government in the seceded States; and whereas we believe a misapprehension exists in the minds of a large portion of the people of the South as to the feelings which actuate a large portion of the people of the free States, and which misapprehension we are called upon by every consideration of humanity and a sense of justice to correct and if possible remove, whether we regard in making this effort what we owe to ourselves, to our fellow-countrymen of the South, or to the world: Therefore,

Resolved, That no truly loyal citizen of the United States desires the application of any rule or law in determining the rights and privileges and the measure of responsibility of the people of any of the States but such as shall have been determined by the Supreme Court to be in accordance with and sanctioned by the Constitution and well-established usages of the country.

Resolved, That the President, in his capacity of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, be, and he is hereby, required to adopt such measures as he may think best, with a view to a suspension of hostilities between the armies of the North and the South for a period not exceeding — days; and that he be also authorized to adopt or agree upon some plan by which the decision of the great body of the people North and South may be secured upon the question of calling a convention composed of delegates from all the States, to which shall be referred the settlement of all questions now dividing the southern States from the rest of the Union, with a view to the restoration of the several States to the places they were intended to occupy in the Union, and the privileges intended to be granted to them by the framers of our national Constitution, who were in our opinion the most enlightened statesmen and purest patriots that ever lived, and than whom we cannot hope to find wiser or better counselors in the present exigency in our national affairs.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, and others objected.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. Mr. DAWSON. My colleague has not yet yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House. Objection was made.

Mr. LAZEAR. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Pending that motion, I move the House adjourn.

CHARTER OF WASHINGTON CITY.

Mr. DAWES. I ask my friend from Illinois to yield to me for a moment to enable me to move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of the Senate to amend the charter of the city of Washington was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered, and can be called up at any time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, May 31, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM ARKANSAS.

Mr. FOOT. I present the credentials of Hon. Elisha Baxter, a Senator-elect from the State of Arkansas. I move that the credentials be read, and that they lie on the table until the Senate shall have taken action on the credentials of Mr. Fishback, claiming to be a Senator from the same State.

The Secretary read the credentials, as follows:

State of Arkansas, to wit:

The General Assembly of this State, on the 3d day of May, 1864, having, in pursuance with the Constitution of the United States of America, chosen Elisha Baxter a Senator of the United States to fill the unexpired term of Charles B. Mitchell—

Therefore I, Isaac Murphy, Governor of the State of Arkansas, do hereby certify the same to the Senate of the United States.

Given under my hand and the seal of the State of Arkansas, this 7th day of May, 1864.

ISAAC MURPHY,
Governor of Arkansas.

By the Governor:

ROBERT J. T. WHITE, Secretary of State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unless otherwise ordered, they will lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I present the petition of citizens of Monmouth county, New Jersey, praying for increased railroad facilities between the cities of New York and Philadelphia. Inasmuch as there has been a report upon this subject from one committee, and another committee has it under examination, and will report in a very few hours, I move that this petition lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a memorial adopted at a public meeting of the Church Anti-Slavery Society, held in the city of New York, and signed by their committee, George B. Cheever, Henry A. Hartt, and Edward Gilbert. It is entitled "A memorial against the exclusion of the colored race from the right of representation." It is somewhat elaborate. I shall not read it; but I ask attention to a passage which explains the desires of the memorialists, as follows:

"The undersigned believe that the continuance of our oppression of the colored race is the cause of our disasters and defeats, and that it is impossible for us to succeed until we cease from our oppressions, and repent, and do justice. We are sure that the introduction of the color of the skin into our national legislation, as a ground of injurious discrimination, and of penalty and taint, as if for crime, is derivative of the Creator, and a violation of our Constitution, impious, cruel, barbarous, exposing us to the scorn of mankind and the anger of the Almighty."

The memorial afterwards proceeds:

"Believing the elevation of this race to be both a Christian duty and the wisest statesmanship, and that equality before the law is essential to such elevation, we implore the present Congress, standing as they do at the beginning of legislation on this subject, to put away and forbid such oppressive and injurious discrimination."

Again they say:

"As American citizens, we pray to be relieved from the burden of such disgrace and from the curse that must accompany such a wrong. We therefore implore your honorable body to remove from the bill providing for the States a republican form of government the clause imposing disability on account of color, and to secure its privileges to all classes alike."

As that bill is now pending before the Senate, I ask that this memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 25th instant, a partial report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, in relation to Mexican affairs; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 293) to empower the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland annual conference to hold property in the District of Columbia and to take a devise under the will of the late William Doughty, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred the following messages of the President of the United States, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A message communicating a report of the Secretary of State in compliance with the act to regulate the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States;

A message relative to a proposed treaty of reciprocity between the United States and the Sandwich Islands;

A message communicating a copy of the correspondence relative to a controversy between the republics of Chili and Bolivia; and

A message in relation to the establishment of monarchical Governments in Central and South America.

Mr. RICHARDSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 275) to prohibit cattle, horses, mules, and other domestic animals from running at large, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a petition of A. J. Campbell, praying for the payment to him of an amount of money alleged to be due his father, Scott Campbell, under a treaty with the Sioux Indians, made June 19, 1858, submitted an adverse report, which was ordered to be printed; and asked to be discharged from its further consideration, which was agreed to.

Mr. CARLILE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 241) granting to the State of Wisconsin a donation of public land to aid in the construction of a ship canal at the head of Sturgeon bay, in the county of Door in said State, to connect the waters of Green bay with Lake Michigan in said State, reported it with amendments.

CHARGES AGAINST GENERAL BUTLER.

Mr. DAVIS. I submit the following resolution, which I ask to have read and printed:

Whereas it has been frequently charged in the public prints and other modes that when the leaders of the present rebellion were engaged in plotting and maturing it, Benjamin F. Butler was cognizant of and privy to their treasonable purposes, and gave them his countenance, sympathy, and support; and that he, the said Butler, after some of the rebel States had published ordinances of secession, turned against the conspirators whom he had been sustaining, to get position and office under the Government of the United States to enable him to consummate his own personal and corrupt objects; and that after he was appointed to, and while he was acting in, the military service, he was, by himself and his accomplice, A. J. Butler, and many others, guilty of many acts of fraud, peculation, and embezzlement against the United States, and many acts of extortion, plunder, despoliation, oppression, and cruelty against individuals: Wherefore,

Be it resolved, That the President of the Senate appoint a committee of three to investigate all such charges against the said Butler; that said committee have power to sit during the recess of the Senate, to employ a clerk, to send for persons and papers; and that it report all the testimony and its proceedings to the next session of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I object to the consideration or printing of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the joint resolution of the Senate (No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (No. 469) extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan;

A bill (No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States; and

A joint resolution (No. 83) authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio to East Tennessee.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed on the 28th instant the following acts:

An act (H. R. No. 272) for the relief of Julia A. Ames;

An act (H. R. No. 407) authorizing the establishment of ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil; and

An act (H. R. No. 432) for the relief of the citizens of Denver, in the Territory of Colorado.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The President pro tempore appointed Mr. FESSENDEN, Mr. COWAN, and Mr. DAVIS the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1865.

NEWSBOYS' HOME.

Mr. GRIMES. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 484) to incorporate the newsboys' home, to report it back without amendment, and recommend its passage. I have been requested, inasmuch as it is very important that this bill should pass at once, in order to insure the property belonging to this company at an early day, to ask the Senate to consider it now.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to incorporate Joseph Henry, J. W. Forney, Henry Beard, Sayles J. Bowen, and A. M. Gangewer, their associates and successors, being members of the society by paying into its treasury the sum of two dollars annually, or life members by paying fifty dollars at one time, and make them a body-politic, by the name of "The Newsboys' Home of Washington city," for the purpose of providing lodgings, meals, and instruction to such homeless and indigent boys as may properly come under the charge of such association, to provide for them a suitable home, board, clothing, and instruction, and to bring them under Christian influence; and by that name they are to have perpetual succession, with power to use a common seal, to sue and be sued, to plead and be impleaded in any court of competent jurisdiction within the District of Columbia, to collect subscriptions, make by-laws, rules, and regulations needful for the government of the corporation not inconsistent with the laws of the United States; to have, hold, and receive real estate by purchase, gift, or devise; to use, sell, or convey the same for the purposes and benefit of the corporation, and to choose such officers and teachers as may be necessary, prescribe their duties, and fix the rate of their compensation. The officers of the association are to consist of a president, two vice presidents, secretary, treasurer, and a board of managers, to be composed of fifteen members, the whole to constitute an executive committee, whose duty it is to be to carry into effect the plans and purposes for which the association was formed, all of which officers are to be elected on the first Tuesday in February in each year at the annual meeting of the association, which is to be held on that day; their successors are to be elected and hold their offices for the term of one year, and until their successors shall be duly elected. And in case of a vacancy it is to be filled by the other members of the executive committee.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREDERICK A. BELEN.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili, have directed me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. As it only concerns a question of $166, I think perhaps the Senate had better act upon it now.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be no question or debate about it. It is only a question of $166.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili, the sum of $166 66, in full for difference in salary under the several acts of Congress on that subject while he acted as such secretary, before he was informed of such reduction, and until he had full time to return to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL JOSEPH BAILEY.

Mr. BOOLITTLE. I desire to call up for reference a joint resolution that I laid on the table on Saturday last.

The President pro tempore. Simply for reference?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call it up and have it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia; but previous to doing so I wish to make a statement in regard to it.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope it will not be done if we are going to have a statement.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. CONNESS. The only objection I have is the time it will consume in the morning hour. If the Senator will move its reference without discussion, I shall have no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose it is legitimate in the morning hour to refer a bill or joint resolution. I do not desire to occupy five minutes, not as long as the Senator will occupy in interrupting me.

The President pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress and for the presentation of a medal to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This resolution is one providing for a vote of thanks, and that a medal be presented to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey. This gentleman is from the State of Wisconsin, and is about thirty-five years of age. He was an engineer upon the La Crosse railroad. He built a dam across the Wisconsin river at a point where most engineers said such a thing was impossible. He enlisted in our fourth regiment, was appointed a captain, and came out in the fourth regiment to the State of Maryland. While there he built Fort Dix. Subsequently, he took charge of one of the most important fortifications about the city of Washington and constructed it. His regiment was then ordered to New Orleans to join the department of the Gulf, and took part in the capture of New Orleans. While there, he built one of the largest fortifications that have been built since the war commenced. He was assigned to the nineteenth Army corps, and became one of its chief engineers. But the crowning act performed by him, which develops a genius most remarkable, is that by which he saved the fleet of Admiral Porter lately upon the Red river. It was such an act as to draw from the Admiral himself, from General Banks, and from all who know the facts, the most decided testimonials of their approbation. I will close all I have to say by reading an extract from what Admiral Porter says on that subject. I read from his official report, dated Mississippi squadron, flagship Black Hawk, mouth of Red river, May 16:

"Sir: I have the honor to inform you that the vessels lately caught by low water above the falls at Alexandria have been released from their unpleasant position. The water had fallen so low that I had no hope or expectation of getting the vessels out this season; and as the Army had made arrangements to evacuate the country, I saw nothing before me but the destruction of the best part of the Mississippi squadron. There seems to have been an especial Providence looking out for us in providing a man equal to the emergency. Lieutenant Colonel Bailey, acting engineer of the nineteenth Army corps, proposed a plan of building a series of dams across the rocks at the falls, and raising the water high enough to let the vessels pass over. This proposition looked like madness, and the best engineers ridiculed it, but Colonel Bailey was so sanguine of success that I requested General Banks to have it done, and he entered heartily into the work. Provisions were short and forage was almost out, and the dam was promised to be finished in ten days, or the army would have to leave us. I was doubtful about the time, but had no doubt about the ultimate success if time would only permit. General Banks placed at the disposal of Colonel Bailey all the force he required, consisting of some three thousand men and two or three hundred wagons. All the neighboring steam mills were torn down for material, two or three regiments of Maine men were set to work felling trees, and on the second day after my arrival in Alexandria from Grand Ecore the work had fairly begun. Trees were falling with great rapidity; teams were moving in all directions bringing in brick and stone; quarries were opened; flat-boats were built to bring stone down from above; and every man seemed to be working with a vigor I have seldom seen equaled, while perhaps not one in fifty believed in the success of the undertaking. These falls are about a mile in length, filled with rugged rocks, over which, at the present stage of water, it seemed to be impossible to make a channel.

"The work was commenced by running out from the left bank of the river a tree dam, made of the bodies of very large trees, brush, brick, and stone, cross-tied with other heavy timber, and strengthened in every way which ingenuity could devise. This was run out about three hundred feet into the river; four large coal barges were then filled with brick and sunk at the end of it. From the right bank of the river cribs filled with stone were built out to meet the barges. All of which was successfully accomplished, notwithstanding there was a current running of nine miles an hour, which threatened to sweep everything before it. It will take too much time to enter into the details of this truly wonderful work. Suffice it to say that the dam had nearly reached completion in eight days' working time, and the water had risen sufficiently on the upper falls to allow the Fort Hindman, Osage, and Neosho to get down and be ready to pass the dam. In another day it would have been high enough to enable all the other vessels to pass the upper falls. Unfortunately, on the morning of the 9th instant, the pressure of water became so great that it swept away two of the stone barges, which swung in below the dam on one side. Seeing this unfortunate accident, I jumped on a horse and rode up to where the upper vessels were anchored and ordered the Lexington to pass the upper falls, if possible, and immediately attempt to go through the dam. I thought I might be able to save the four vessels below, not knowing whether the persons employed on the work would ever have the heart to renew their enterprise.

"The Lexington succeeded in getting over the upper falls just in time, the water rapidly falling as she was passing over. She then steered directly for the opening in the dam, through which the water was rushing so furiously that it seemed as if nothing but destruction awaited her. Thousands of beating hearts looked on anxious for the result. The silence was so great as the Lexington approached the dam that a pin might almost be heard to fall. She entered the gap with a full head of steam on, pitched down the roaring torrent, made two or three spasmodic rolls, hung for a moment on the rocks below, when she went into deep water by the current, and rounded to safely into the bank. Thirty thousand voices rose in one deafening cheer, and universal joy seemed to pervade the face of every man present. The Neosho followed next, all her hatches battened down, and every precaution taken against accident. She did not fare as well as the Lexington, her pilot having become frightened as he approached the abyss, and stopped her engine, when I particularly ordered a full head of steam to be carried; the result was that for a moment her hull disappeared from sight under the water. Every one thought she was lost. She rose, however, swept along over the rocks with the current, and fortunately escaped with only one hole in her bottom, which was stopped in the course of an hour. The Hindman and Osage both came through beautifully, without touching a thing; and I thought if I was only fortunate enough to get my large vessels as well over the falls, my fleet once more would do good service on the Mississippi. The accident to the dam, instead of disheartening Colonel Bailey, only induced him to renew his exertions after he had seen the success of getting four vessels through."

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the further reading of that paper will be dispensed with. The morning hour is of great value to us and should not be consumed in this way.

The President pro tempore. The reading having been objected to, the Chair will put the question to the Senate whether the reading shall proceed.

Mr. CONNESS. We have business of great importance to transact in the morning hour, and I hope the Senator will desist from the further reading.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is not much left, and besides I adopt it as a part of my speech on the question of reference.

Mr. CONNESS. If this is only a part of it I object.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The report continues:

"The noble-hearted soldiers, seeing their labor of the last eight days swept away in a moment, cheerfully went to work to repair damages, being confident how that all the gunboats would be finally brought over. These men had been working eight days and nights up to their necks in water in the boiling sun, cutting trees and wheeling bricks, and nothing but good humor prevailed among them. On the whole, it was very fortunate the dam was carried away, as the two barges that were swept away from the center swung around against some rocks on the left and made a fine cushion for the vessels, and prevented them, as it afterwards appeared, from running on certain destruction.

"The force of the water and the current being too great to construct a continuous dam at six hundred feet across the river in so short a time, Colonel Bailey determined to leave a gap of fifty-five feet in the dam and build a series of wing dams on the upper falls. This was accomplished in three days' time, and on the 11th instant the Mound City, Carondelet, and Pittsburg came over the upper falls, a good deal of labor having been expended in hauling them through, the channel being very crooked, scarcely wide enough for them. Next day the Ozark, Louisville, Chillicothe, and two tugs, also succeeded in passing the upper falls. Immediately afterwards the Mound City, Carondelet, and Pittsburg started in succession to pass the dam, all their hatches battened down, and every precaution taken to prevent accident. The passage of these vessels was a most beautiful sight, only to be realized when seen. They passed over without an accident, except the unshipping of one or two rudders. This was witnessed by all the troops, and the vessels were heartily cheered as they passed over. Next morning at ten o'clock the Louisville, Chillicothe, Ozark, and two tugs passed over without any accident except the loss of a man, who was swept off the deck of one of the tugs. By three o'clock that afternoon the vessels were all coaled, ammunition replaced, and all steamed down the river, with the convoy of transports in company. A good deal of difficulty was anticipated in getting over the bars in lower Red river; depth of water reported only five feet; gunboats were drawing six. Providentially we had a rise from the back-water of the Mississippi, that river being very high at that time, the back-water extending to Alexandria, one hundred and fifty miles distant, enabling us to pass all the bars and obstructions with safety.

"Words are inadequate to express the admiration I feel for the abilities of Lieutenant Colonel Bailey. This is without doubt the best engineering feat ever performed. Under the best circumstances a private company would not have completed this work under one year, and to an ordinary mind the whole thing would have appeared an utter impossibility. Leaving out his abilities as an engineer, the credit he has conferred upon the country, he has saved to the Union a valuable fleet worth nearly two million dollars. More, he has deprived the enemy of a triumph which would have emboldened them to carry on this war a year or two longer, for the intended departure of the army was a fixed fact, and there was nothing left for me to do in case that event occurred but destroying every part of the vessels, so that the rebels could make nothing of them. The highest honors the Government can bestow on Colonel Bailey can never repay him for the service he has rendered the country."

I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

REMITTANCES TO INDIANS OF KANSAS.

Mr. POMEROY. I ask the Senate now to take up and pass a resolution of inquiry that I introduced on Friday last, and which went over on the objection of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis.] It is merely a resolution calling on one of the Departments for a report in reference to the funds in the hands of the Government belonging to certain Indian tribes, which will be passed without opposition.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish the Senate an account current between the United States and the united band of Wea, Peoria, Kaskaskia, and Piankeshaw Indians of Kansas, since date of their last treaty, (30th of May, 1854,) showing the amount and date of each remittance to said Indians under said treaty, and on what account each remittance was made; also showing the date of each investment of the proceeds of the lands of said Indians in State stocks, and amount of interest, if any, on said stocks, the date of investment, and the time during which interest was paid by the States respectively owing said stocks, and what balance, if any, is now in arrear and due said Indians either on account of interest on stocks or otherwise.

Resolved further, That a similar account be furnished between the United States and Western Miamis of Kansas.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would be as well to let that resolution go to the Committee on Military Affairs. These investigations are very laborious, and sometimes occupy the time of clerks for years. We have had some such papers before the committee during this session that have occupied clerks in the office for a year and a half last past. Unless there is some necessity for the imposition of such immense labor on the Department I would oppose the passage of the resolution.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no particular objection to the reference. What this resolution calls for would not take two hours' time; but still I have no particular objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Indian Affairs if the Senator desires it to go there.

Mr. HARLAN. If the Senator agrees to the suggestion I will move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF DISTRICT LAWS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the joint resolution (S. No. 59) to provide for the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia. It will not occupy five minutes. It only contains one simple provision.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

As the revised code of the District of Columbia, prepared under the authority of Congress, entitled "An act to improve the laws of the District of Columbia, and to codify the same," approved March 3, 1855, and which was published by order of Congress in the year 1857, is believed to have been a comprehensive, complete, and accurate compilation of the laws of the District at the period of its execution, and measures should be taken to have the work brought down to the present time and perfected, the bill therefore instructs the Committees on the District of Columbia of the two Houses of Congress, respectively, to cause the code to be so revised, amended, and corrected, and also the laws of Congress for the District passed since that compilation, as shall adapt them to the present condition of the laws; and they may employ not more than two suitable persons on the preparation of the work at a compensation of ten dollars per day for the time employed. The code so prepared is to be printed by direction of the committees in a neat and convenient form for the use of the committees and Congress; and the committees are to report it to their respective Houses at the next session of Congress for adoption.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 421) to pay, in part, for publishing the debates of Congress, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which directs the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives to purchase from the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in the present and each succeeding Congress, who has not heretofore received the same, one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix.

The second section provides that there shall be paid to the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the contingent funds of the two Houses, according to the number of copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix taken by each, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand pages for a long session, or fifteen hundred pages for a short session, including the indexes and the laws of the United States for this and each future Congress.

The third section appropriates the sum of $98,544 for the purposes named in the bill for the present Congress; $30,424 of which is to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate, and the remainder by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The fourth section repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith; and the above provisions are made upon the express condition that they may be abrogated by either Congress or the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix at any time after giving two years' notice for that purpose.

Mr. HALE. If I remember aright, the first section of this bill is in direct contravention of an existing law, and one that has been pretty scrupulously observed ever since it has been passed. I do not know whether this bill would repeal that law or not. That law was passed a few years ago, when the printing or purchasing of books for the use of Congress had got to be a great abuse. The whole subject was considered in connection with the increased compensation of members of Congress, giving them an annual salary instead of a per diem. I have not that law before me, and can only speak from recollection, but my recollection is that there was a condition in that law that any books hereafter purchased by Congress for distribution among its members should be deducted from their pay; and I think that is the law to-day. I do not know whether the Committee on Printing mean to repeal that law or not; but my own impression is that that is a wise law. It has been adhered to hitherto very strictly, and I think it had better be adhered to hereafter.

A friend has just handed me a copy of the bill, and I observe that the fourth section provides—

That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONNESS. Do not discuss it.

Mr. HALE. I see that my friend from California is impatient. I am opposed to this bill; I think it has not been considered as it ought to be; and I therefore move to postpone its further consideration until to-morrow.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection to its being postponed if it is postponed and made the special order for to-morrow. I should like to have it disposed of. It is a thing that so nearly concerns the business of the Senate as to rise almost to the importance of a privileged question. The committee are quite indifferent whether the bill passes or not; but they desire to have the action and the decision of the Senate upon it, because, unless Congress make some further compensation for the publication of the Congressional Globe, it must cease. Every person who is conversant with the expenses of printing must know that this must be the case, unless the contract has been hitherto enormously profitable. As I explained at considerable length the other day, it has been sustained up to the present time, more than from any other cause, by the pride which the late proprietor, Mr. Rives, had in the publication. He desired to have it as the monument of his life, and he always felt a confidence that Congress would at some future and not very remote time raise the compensation to a living business. If it is not the disposition of Congress to do that, let the publication cease. I will not object to the postponement; but I should like to have it made the special order for half past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to making any special orders in the morning hour. I hope it will not be done. If it must be done, let it be done by the Senate regularly.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, sir, I am not going to press this bill against the desire of the Senate. I have no more interest in it than any other Senator, and if it is the pleasure of the Senate to postpone it and let it go by, I shall not trouble myself about it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let us act upon it now.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; that is what I would prefer to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I had not the slightest wish to have the bill postponed except that I saw some of my friends were a little impatient and I did not want to take up time; but I am as ready to act upon it now as I shall be at any other period.

I am opposed to this bill on several accounts. In the first place, it is indefinite; and, Mr. President, I appeal to you, not only as Presiding Officer of the Senate, but as a member of the Senate on that point. If there is any subject on which I have been enlightened since I have been in the Senate, it has been by remarks made by yourself upon the indefiniteness of appropriations. You have contended with a force, an energy, and a distinctness which has impressed itself on my mind against the propriety of making indefinite appropriations, the amount of which we do not know.

Now, sir, one cent is a very small sum indeed; it is the smallest coin known to the law now; but if there is any truth in arithmetic it may be multiplied so many times as to count up to a very large sum. Let us see what this one cent, that harmless cent, amounts to in this second section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid to the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, out of the contingent funds of the two Houses, according to the number of copies of the Congressional Globe and Appendix taken by each, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand pages for a long session, or fifteen hundred pages for a short session, including the indexes and the laws of the United States for this and each future Congress.

Now, I should like to know from the chairman of the committee if the committee have made an estimate of what that will amount to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; right here.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator would listen to the very few remarks that I make with as much attention as I do to the much more extended and better ones that he makes, he would have known that I explained this whole matter when I reported the bill. I did not wish the Senate to vote blindly. Of course it is impossible to tell precisely what this one cent for every five pages will amount to; for it is not within the power of mortal comprehension to conceive how long it may suit members to speak, and as the Congressional Globe reports everything that is said, and every Senator says as much as he pleases, it is impossible to tell in the beginning how long the Globe may be spun out. It is very proper, therefore, that, fixing the price of the Globe at a certain sum, it should be for a certain number of pages, and then if the debates shall extend to a larger number of pages that there shall be some additional compensation. It is very proper that that compensation should be in proportion to the number of pages printed. Taking the last Congress as the average, the excess of one cent for every five pages will amount to $42,000, as I stated when I introduced the bill. There were three sessions during that Congress, and they were pretty long ones. I think the Congressional Globe for the last Congress is larger than it ever was before; I am not able to say about that; but according to that average it will make $42,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think the whole thing is injudicious. I think it has a tendency to encourage talk, and that does not need any encouragement. I wonder that the sagacity of our Committee on Finance in seeking for some subject of taxation has not led them to tax this eternal gabble that is practiced in all the branches of the Government. I think we could get a very handsome revenue out of a tax levied on every speech exceeding fifteen minutes over an hour. I see that my friend from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] looks rather pale at such a proposition, [laughter;] but still I think it would be a judicious one.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is on your account. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Committee on Finance will introduce no such measure. If they do it will bankrupt the Senator from New Hampshire, and we do not want to see that. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. That remark of the Senator is based rather upon a supposition of my poverty than an experience of my talk. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. President, this practice of setting down everything that is said here is unwise and injudicious. I remember the first time that I was in the State of Ohio. I was something of a lion at that time, [laughter;] and the late Joshua R. Giddings, of whose death we have heard with so much sorrow lately, acted as my trumpeter on that occasion. I was called upon by radicals of all ages, sexes, and conditions, and among the rest there came to me a strong-minded woman, with her heart full of sympathy for the laboring classes. In her benevolence she had drawn out a plan for their amelioration and elevation; and what do you suppose it was? Why, that there should be a newspaper printed at the seat of the national Government every day which should contain every word that was said in both Houses of Congress that day. [Laughter.] She thought that would be a remedy that would cure all the social evils that afflicted society. I looked at her with a little astonishment. I asked her if she had ever seen the New York Courier and Inquirer. She said she never had. I told her it was about the size of a small bed-quilt, and if it was printed all over in small type it would not contain everything that was said in both Houses of Congress during a day. [Laughter.] She wanted to put this paper into the hands of every laboring man in the community; so I asked her this question: "Do you not think if you were to put that paper into the hands of the laboring men of the country and tell them that they must read it through that day, it would be the hardest day's work they ever did? Again," said I, "suppose the laboring class have time to read so much, do you not think it barely possible that they might find some more profitable reading?" [Laughter.] The woman had the sense to sit still and did not answer, and that question never has been answered to this day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order of the day.

Mr. HALE. Well, sir, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senate is ready to take a vote on this bill I should like to have it disposed of now.

Mr. HALE. I have not got through with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope, then, that the Committee on Finance will introduce the tax that the Senator from New Hampshire suggests. I should like to have it while this bill is under consideration. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume the consideration of the tax bill.

Mr. POWELL. I move that the tax bill be temporarily passed over to enable us to take a vote on this bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from New Hampshire says he has not got through with his remarks.

Mr. POWELL. Well, we can allow the Senator to conclude.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I prefer to go on with the tax bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the special order is before the Senate.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. SHERMAN to strike out the one hundred and ninth section of the bill and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

BANKS AND BANKING.

SEC. 109. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month upon the average amount of the deposits of money, subject to payment by check or draft, with any person, bank, association, or corporation engaged in the business of banking, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved February 25, 1863; and a duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month, as aforesaid, upon the average amount of capital stock invested in such business, beyond the amount invested in United States bonds. And on the first Monday of every month of each year a true and accurate return of the amount of deposits and of capital, as aforesaid, shall be made and rendered to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, by all such persons, banks, associations, or corporations, with a declaration annexed thereto, and the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of capital and deposits, as aforesaid; and shall also deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district, and shall, within each and every month, pay to said collector the duty of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the amount of deposits, and of one twenty-fourth of one per cent. on the capital so returned. And for any neglect to make or render such return and payment, as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation shall be subject to and pay a penalty of $1,000, besides the additions, penalties, and forfeitures in other cases provided; and the amount of deposits and capital shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor upon the best information he can obtain, and every such penalty, together with the duties as aforesaid, may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction. And every person, and every bank, association, or corporation, other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of "An act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States stocks, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," approved —, issuing notes, bills, or obligations calculated or intended to circulate as money, shall pay a duty of one sixth of one per cent. each month on the average amount of such notes, bills, or other obligations in circulation during the preceding month, or which, having been issued, shall remain in circulation; and shall, on the first Monday of each and every month, make and deliver to the assessor of the district in which such bank, association, or corporation may be located, or in which such person may reside, a true and accurate return of the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations so issued, whether in circulation or in its vaults, or elsewhere, in possession or on deposit, and shall annex to every such return a declaration, with the oath or affirmation of such person, or of the president or cashier of such bank, association, or corporation, in such form and manner as may be directed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that the same contains a true and faithful statement of the amount of circulation as aforesaid; and shall deliver a copy of said return to the collector of the district in which said person resides, or in which the said bank, association, or corporation is located; and shall, within ten days from the first Monday in each and every month, pay to said collector the said duty of one sixth of one per cent. on the average amount of its circulation as aforesaid, not including that in vault or on deposit for the said bank. And for any neglect to render or make such return and payment as aforesaid, every such person, bank, association, or corporation shall pay a penalty of one per cent. on the amount of notes, bills, or other obligations issued as aforesaid, which amount shall, in default of the proper return, be estimated by the assessor upon the best information he can obtain; and every such penalty may be recovered for the use of the United States in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That all banks, associations, corporations or individuals, issuing notes or bills for circulation as currency, shall be liable to and pay the additional duty of one third of one per cent. each month, upon the average amount of such currency, not including that in vault or on deposit for the said bank, issued beyond the amount of ninety per cent. of its capital stock paid in. In the case of banks with branches, the duty herein provided for shall be imposed upon the circulation of each branch, severally, and the amount of capital of each branch shall be considered to be the amount allotted to or used by such branch. And the additional duty herein provided for shall be collected and paid at the times and in the manner hereinbefore specified. And so much of an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863, as imposes any tax on banks, their circulation, capital, or deposits other than is herein provided, is hereby repealed.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio and also to the provision of the bill that he proposes to amend. The people of the State I in part represent have not any great pecuniary interest in the question of the taxation of the circulation of banking institutions. The circulation of California is a circulation of gold and silver coin, and is not to be affected by this bill as it stands in the original text or as it is proposed to be amended by the Senator from Ohio; but there are considerations in which the people of this whole country are concerned as a matter of policy if the views indicated by the Senator from Ohio are to be carried into legislation. I may say for myself here that I have always been and am now opposed upon principle to all banks of circulation. We have found practically in that portion of the country from which I come that banks which confine themselves to the office of transacting the business between merchants and citizens can do that business as well without a paper circulation as with it, and even much better. While the system of banks without circulation is quite as convenient, it is much more for the health of the business of the country. The truth of this general proposition has been demonstrated by all those who have written on this subject for the last century. The experience of the world proves it. Nevertheless, banks of circulation have existed throughout the older States for a long period and have become a substantial feature of the system of business in all those States. I suppose there is not a State among the old States of the Union that has not banks of circulation; and in New England particularly every city and every town and every considerable village has its bank for the local accommodation of the people. The young mechanic is dependent upon the bank in his neighborhood for his first facilities in engaging in business, and the young trader having a reputation for integrity and character is dependent upon the local bank for his first facilities in carrying on trade. They are a part of the established system of the country. It is now proposed openly by the Senator from Ohio, and substantially by the bill itself, to make a destructive war upon all these institutions, to uproot and destroy them.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to ask him what war the bill proposes to make upon these banks?

Mr. McDUGALL. The bill itself in its taxation, independent of the amendment, makes that war, although the amendment is much more radical than the bill itself.

Mr. HOWE. The bill itself proposes no rate of taxation upon the State banks that it does not upon national banks.

Mr. McDUGALL. Indeed it does. It taxes all their business except what is based upon the circulation furnished by the Federal Government, and makes a distinction all the way through. It is not wise at any time suddenly to uproot long-established institutions and long-established business relations. I will take New England as an illustration. I suppose there is not a village of any considerable size or a manufacturing town in New England without its bank that has done for many years and is now doing the business of the neighborhood. It is now proposed that the Federal power shall legislate them all out of existence, with all their relations, their place to be supplied by organizations to be framed under the authority of the Federal Government without any basis except the basis of bonds, those bonds irredeemable, and the currency issued by the Government and furnished by it to the banks irredeemable.

It would be well to consider for what all this change is to be made, for what cause all the relations of business, of money to industry, of money to trade throughout the greater part of this country are to be changed in this way. Why is this war to be made? And let me say that I think this war made upon $170,000,000 of bank circulation may prove quite as mischievous a war as that which is now waged upon us from the South, for this is to be a war of the North upon the North, and a moneyed war is sometimes as disastrous as the war of arms. It is a war made in order that a banking system organized under the auspices of the Secretary of the Treasury may be established throughout all parts of this Union, a banking system to radiate from this center, to commence with $300,000,000 of capital, capable of indefinite expansion. It can be extended just as our legal-tender notes have been extended. When the first application for legal-tender notes was made to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was said that what was then required would be all that would be required, that more could not be safely placed in circulation and more would not be demanded; but since then that sum has been quadrupled, and $300,000,000 are now asked to organize a system of national banks. They say they want facilities for the Government. Next year, wanting more, they may ask for $600,000,000 of bank facilities, and the next year after that we shall look fearlessly upon a circulation of $1,200,000,000.

The greatest mischief of this war upon the local circulation of the State banks is the character of the substitution. It was thought, and I think it was wisely thought by one of our former Presidents, a man of infinite sagacity, that a bank of $30,000,000—not a mere Government bank, but having capital of its own and to which the Government was a party—that that single bank of $30,000,000, with its branches in the various States, was dangerous to the integrity of the Union—was dangerous at least to the proper administration of a free republican Government; and why dangerous? Among other things, for the reason that in every State they were able to secure by employment the young growing talent of the States and bind it to the interests of the $30,000,000 mammoth institution. The first talent of the North and the East and the South and the West became allied to the institution with $30,000,000 of capital, and that alarmed a sagacious President, and alarmed the American people. Here we propose at the outset to multiply the thirty by ten, and not making a regular banking institution as the old institution was, embracing a majority of private capital, but a system of banks located in every town and village throughout the country, distributing from this center to them $300,000,000 of circulation, and every one of these banks under the power of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency. I should like to ask Senators if they have looked carefully to see the power that is vested here with the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Permit me to suggest to the Senator that all those questions were proper to be answered perhaps upon the bill for establishing these banks, but this is a mere provision for taxing State banks.

Mr. McDUGALL. I understand that quite well, if the Senator pleases; but I suppose I have the right to reason that the cause for this change suggested by the Senator from Ohio is that the State banks are to be driven out of existence that their place may be supplied by national banks.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was not interfering with the Senator's reasoning. He was asking a question of Senators.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask them whether they are advised of the power that has been conferred on the Comptroller of the Currency. I am inquiring into the character of these institutions for which, and on account of which, the State banks are to be driven out of existence. I do not profess myself to favor either of them as an original question. If we had no banks of circulation in the country I should oppose them everywhere. I trust it will never be a necessity on my part to oppose banks of circulation in California, for I think the time will never come when they will be supposed to be needed there. I choose now to remark on the character of the system which is to take the place of the State banks. The Comptroller of the Currency at Washington has the authority of a chancellor, one of the highest judges of our courts, and may by his ipse dixit close up any one or all these banks. He may require them at any time by his own word or order to file additional bonds. He may appoint a receiver and take charge of all their assets. He has perfect power here at Washington to pull the strings upon every moneyed interest. This system is to aggregate all the active capital of the country, and it is to be held here at one man's power. I say that under this system, which has been devised by the Secretary of the Treasury, and has received the sanction of Congress, when it shall be inaugurated and in full force, if it is permitted to be thus organized and put into full force, it will possess a power that will relieve Senators from the responsibility of office, and it will relieve members of the House of Representatives from the responsibility of canvass. We shall then have members of Congress and Senators and Presidents made by a moneyocracy more potent than the word or ukase of the czar. These things have not been sufficiently looked to. Of all powers that can be made the governing powers of a country, there is nothing like the concentrated moneyed interest of a country. Before them will have to yield our manufacturing interest; before them will have to yield our agricultural interest; before them will have to yield and bend our commercial interest. Legislation will be controlled by them as their interest may dictate. That this is true is as patent as the words I see before me in the bill that lies upon my desk.

How many banks will spring up under this system, suppose they go along as the Secretary of the Treasury anticipates? A thousand, perchance; there will be four or five banks for every member of Congress, and twenty-five or thirty for every Senator. Their business belongs here by virtue of your law, and they will be appealing to the legislation of the Federal Government to change the law to promote their interests, to favor them in the machinery of their operation, the extension of their business, the regulation of the rates of interest. There will be a thousand other things before Congress affecting them pro and con, as they may relate to merchandise, trade, and manufactures, or to commerce abroad.

I would, if I had been in my seat, have urged all these reasons primarily against the bill which we have already passed establishing this banking system; but the argument is as pertinent here against this centralizing power. Your bill designs to centralize all power in the Government here at Washington and in the Treasury Department of that Government; and now, in aid of that centralization it is proposed to drive out of existence all the institutions in the United States established by State authority that furnish banking facilities, so that these new banks may have the field alone. That is one of the means to extinguish the States. There is a strong disposition, I know, on the part of many Senators to extinguish all the boundaries of the States and to establish here a central Government. Every one who has read history and has profited by the teachings of her greatest masters of political science, knows and understands that a single consolidated republic cannot exist over such an immense area. It was never attempted in ancient or modern times. Montesquieu, who is one of the ablest writers on the subject of free Government, and a friend of free Government, lays it down as a rule that republican institutions cannot be maintained over a vast extent of country except by the combination, the concentration, and affiliation of, to a certain extent, independent Governments; that only in that way can they maintain sufficient vitality at their centers and sufficient strength to unite and continue the Government of a largely extended territory. All history has taught this lesson. Our fathers understood it when they established the Constitution under which we now pretend to live. This is a movement to obliterate the boundaries and destroy the vitality of the States, which, on the other hand, should be cultivated.

There is not vital force enough in this country by honest and free means and the free expression of a free people, to handle all the intricacies of trade, commerce, business, exchanges, currency from here to the extremest parts of the country. What here do you know about the region in which I live? I am compelled to say that the Senate and House of Representatives, with very few marked exceptions, are profoundly ignorant about every one of our particular and general necessities; and when measures involving our interests come before Congress, what is affirmed by the representatives of our coast has to be taken on trust, or otherwise it is ignored, and what they ask for, and ask for justly, is often denied them.

Sir, while we are laboring under our great calamities and while making a united struggle to put down hostile arms in rebellion, we must not forget that yet under our system, a necessary and a politic system, we must have States, and States within their spheres independent, just as well as the national Government within its sphere is independent. This attempt here to go out beyond the legitimate sphere of Government to control the money business of every neighborhood throughout the whole Republic is in violation of the fundamental idea of our system, and it is in violation of fundamental law. It never was affirmed in the days of the old United States Bank that the Government had the right to create a bank except as it was necessary as a fiscal agency to carry on the business of the Government itself. This system is not framed for the purpose of furnishing a fiscal agency for the Government. It is to usurp the money business of the country, to control and handle the exchanges of the country and its entire currency. Not only that; the Federal Government not only undertakes to go out of the line of its jurisdiction by creating this system to be handled here at the central point of power, but it undertakes to make war upon institutions existing in almost every State of the Union with which the business of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people is immediately concerned. The stockholder, the lender, the borrower, persons who have furnished facilities and persons who have sought facilities, the mechanic, the trader, the merchant, the manufacturer are all dependent on these institutions upon which war is to be made by the Federal Congress. Has the Federal Congress any office which justifies it in making such war? I say it is a usurpation of power, and an unjust war upon the States and upon institutions established by the various States, and upon established relations between debtor and creditor, borrower and lender, the man of money and the man of trade and the man of labor.

It seems to me strange that such a proposition as has been made by the Senator from Ohio should be boldly announced as designed to drive out of existence by unequal taxation the State banks, to drive out what has been recognized as a legitimate business and has been followed since the commencement of the Government, to drive out of business by unequal taxation a large body of men, men of retired capital, engaged in banking, and then to drive out of the way of convenient facilities another large class of men, and to make out of the whole banking system of the country a political machine. Now, a bank is a business institution looking solely to the returns monthly, quarterly, or yearly of its business to be divided among the persons who engage in that kind of transaction; and it makes a very little difference to them who a man is, they do not inquire what his particular persuasion may be, or what his alliances with A, B, and C; but is he an honest man, can he be trusted, has he got the credit due to character, or has he got the credit due to capital? If he has, his business is done." This system, on the other hand, is to organize a set of banks where the strings can be pulled here by the party in power. If they find that a bank has loaned $50,000 to A, A being an obnoxious person to the individual in authority, the Comptroller of the Currency may write immediately, "Why did you accommodate A with that $50,000? He is not a solvent man; you will ruin yourself, and the Comptroller of the Currency may be compelled to put you in liquidation and appoint a receiver for you; that kind of business will not do." They will soon find out that they have got to consult the head of the system here in Washington, and they, like all moneyed institutions, will consult their own interests, and not put themselves in the way of a power that may despoil them at any time and close up their business. The system makes every one of this multitudinous set of banks the agent of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Secretary of the Treasury, the central power at Washington, to do their behests. If they cannot compel a discount, they can at least prevent one, and the business is to be conducted as they will. Money is always subservient to interest. It is in the very nature of the moneyed business.

If you aggregate all these interests, so that they are to be controlled at one place, there will be no further use for Legislatures in your several States, no further use for a House of Representatives here or a Senate here, unless those Legislatures shall be appointed by the village banks, your Representatives by the district banks, and your Senators by the banking influence in the States; they will come here to represent that interest; but an interest as large as that will swallow up all minor interests. Money has been always potential in securing office in this country, and it may be said that this is true of all countries. If the United States Bank, with its $30,000,000 and its few branches, could threaten to control, and did control, to a large extent, for some time, the legislation of the Federal Congress, and did control the young talent of the country, what will a thousand branches and $300,000,000, or, perchance, shortly $600,000,000 do? They will control everything. It will be a farce for men to come here who can represent an independent community. I represent a community that probably never will be troubled with the incubus of bank paper circulation; that probably will be true of the coast which I represent; but what will be the use of persons coming here from my coast, representing an independent interest, when all around them they find persons who represent the great moneyocracy of the Republic?

It is proposed to drive out all the circulation of the State banks, to drive out all competition. As between business men engaged in business in the same place, it would be considered as outrageous if the one of largest capital should try to drive out all the small capitalists; for instance, if Alexander Stewart should try to drive out everybody else in New York engaged in his department of business, that he might monopolize it, would it not be regarded as a commercial outrage? Now, if we, with the power of the Federal Government used with a lavish and reckless hand, organize a system of banks, armed to make war on the smaller institutions with the intent to force out of existence the business of a body of men engaged in a lawful business, deprive all the persons connected with them in their business relations of the facilities they have received, and establish a new set of relations under political authority throughout the country, can any just man attempt to justify it? Can any prudent man justify himself in promoting it? It is a thing to be protested against. An individual who would undertake to do it because he had the power as against another individual, would be looked upon as guilty of an outrage as a business man and an outrage as an honorable man; and the Government with its power can claim no exemption from its particular want of individuality. The amount which the banks have of the Government currency, and the amount which they do business upon on Government account, is not to be taxed by the same ratio; but all the private capital that goes into this business is to be taxed. The Government is going to take, then, a higher ground, a safer place, a better business position than the individual capitalist. What right has the Government to do this? It has no such right. It is an outrage on the rights of the private citizen.

The effort has often been made on the part of the Federal Congress to interfere with the private business of the country; but here is a giant stride toward the control of all the private business of the country. It may be permitted for a day, it may be suffered for a day, because unfortunately in these times of great trial, when Senators should be alive to any question of public interest, when they should weigh every movement, when they should consider with great care every public question, they are on the other hand found rushing recklessly forward in the indorsement of any scheme that is offered by those at the head of the Administration. Their measures are not canvassed, they are not examined, they are not considered; but the time for consideration will come, and it will come before long, for after all the people of this country are the persons who will first feel and then see these great evils that are to be thrust upon them; and then those who have invented them, those who have organized them, those who have put them in motion, will be hurled from their places of power, and if not forgotten will only be remembered to be execrated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the one hundred and ninth section of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Pomerooy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Colamer, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harris, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Powell, Richardson, Van Winkle, and Wiley—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Harding, Henderson, Howe, Morrill, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wright—13.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to have a vote on the proviso to this one hundred and ninth section, and I do not know whether it is necessary to move to strike out the proviso as it is reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow the committee to go on with their amendments?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think we ought to dispose of this subject. The proviso imposes a tax upon the issues of the State banks of three per cent. per annum over and above ninety per cent. upon their capital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator state his amendment?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The proposition is to strike out the proviso to the one hundred and ninth section, if it be necessary; but as that proviso was reported by the Committee on Finance as an amendment to the bill, I suppose the question will be upon its adoption. I wish to say just one word upon that question.

The State Bank of Indiana, by her charter, is allowed to issue beyond her capital in view of the safety that is secured by the other features of the charter to the bill-holders; and I do not think it is right for Congress in a tax bill to discriminate against these banks at all. The purpose of a tax bill ought to be to tax with a view to revenue alone, and not to drive from the field of circulation any portion of the circulation of the State or other banks. Inasmuch as this is the only discrimination left in the bill against the State banks and in favor of the national currency, I desire a vote upon this, and on that question I will call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON. What do you propose to strike out?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The whole proviso. The whole proviso relates to that subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say that this is merely retaining a provision that existed in the law passed two years ago with reference to the same subject. There can be no objection to our laying a tax on the banks, and we may impose it in such a manner as we see fit. A circulation of ninety per cent. on their capital is deemed to be within the limit of safety, and that is the limit imposed on the national banks. There being no discrimination in point of fact as to the amount of circulation that can be issued, this tax on circulation beyond the ninety per cent. will have this effect: it will prevent this undue expansion, which is so injurious to the public interests; it will place the State and national banks upon precisely the same level, while it will have the effect to restrain the issue beyond ninety per cent., because the national banks are limited to a circulation of ninety per cent., and it would not do to leave it as it stood in the bill. This proviso in its terms is not confined to the State banks, but covers the whole. I have no doubt not only of the value but of the imperative necessity of such a provision.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to say in reply to the Senator that this does not place them upon terms of equality with the national institutions, for the reason that the basis of the banking of the national institutions is the bonds of the Government which pay six per cent. in coin, equal now to nearly twelve per cent. of interest upon the investment. The national banks buy these bonds with the Treasury notes. A thousand dollars of Treasury notes will pay for a $1,000 bond. Upon that investment of $1,000, the national banks secure from the national Treasury what is equivalent in currency to nearly twelve per cent. Then upon that the issues are made.

But the State banks are required, according to their charters, to keep in their vaults enough money, gold and silver, and under the present legislation of Congress perhaps Treasury notes, to meet the demands of the bill-holders, whatever those demands may be. Our charters require a dead capital as security for the bill-holders in the vaults, while the national bank system requires a capital that pays nearly twelve per cent. interest. In order to make a State banking system profitable they must issue more than ninety per cent. of their capital. At ninety per cent. alone, they could make no profits, while the national system could make large profits in view of the interest that is paid to them upon their bonds in gold and silver.

I think the committee is right in the main in saying that there ought to be no distinctions. When you come to tax the circulation, whether the circulation is by a State bank or a national bank, let the tax be equally imposed, and put it upon everybody, and then it is fair, and leave these institutions to struggle for the field as they may. That institution which gets the best credit will have the field. Do that, and if the national bank system is best, it will by force of its better credit drive this other currency out of the field; but if it is not the best it cannot do it; and then by arbitrary legislation we ought not to do it. I appeal to the Senator to let this principle of equality of taxation apply throughout the whole bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the amendment proposed by him is not strictly in order. The Senate having agreed to this proviso in Committee of the Whole it is hardly proper while the bill is in committee to move to strike it out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not know a vote had been taken upon it. Has it been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been agreed to in Committee of the Whole, and it cannot be stricken out while we are in Committee of the Whole, but it can be reached when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is so; but I will answer now what the Senator has said, and it will save both of us the necessity of explanation hereafter.

The Senator carries my language further than I intended it should go. When I said we meant to place them on an equality I meant an equality with reference to the tax we imposed. So far as other things are concerned, I for one, and I take it the majority of the committee would desire that the distinction that arises from the different position of the banks under the bank bill should be such as would induce the State banks to come into the national system entirely. They can avail themselves at any time by that bill of all the advantages of which the Senator has spoken if they choose to come into the national system; and I for one am glad that the national system has the advantages spoken of, for I hope it will have that effect.

I will go further and say that while I was opposed at present to imposing these heavy duties or any very heavy discriminating tax upon the State banks, my view of it with reference to that matter was only temporary. I wish to give them time, without being unduly burdened, to exercise their privilege of winding up without affecting the business of the community by withdrawing their circulation too rapidly, or being forced to do it before these national banks can get into operation, and thus give them the opportunity, having an understanding that they should do so, to come into the national system. If they do not choose to do it or to take any steps with reference to it, but are disposed to hold on to their present system, the time may come when I might be willing to impose discriminating taxes upon them if the public good required it.

My view of it, therefore, is confined and limited by the circumstances of the time and the necessities of the time, and treating them fairly and giving them time within which to act. In that, however, I speak simply for myself. If I am in a position to give a vote on the subject, unless I change my views with reference to it, which all men may do, if this national bank system works well, if it approves itself to the community, I shall be prepared to say that within a reasonable time that shall be the only currency of the country in the shape of bank paper.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I differ from the honorable member from Maine, I rise—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion before the Senate at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON. The whole bill, I suppose, is before the Senate. As I differ from the honorable member from Maine, it is proper that I should state very succinctly the grounds of that difference.

The taxing power of the United States cannot be questioned, but it is a power given exclusively for the purpose of raising revenue, except so far as it relates to the use which may be made of the power for the protection of domestic manufactures; and even as to that, as the Senate are aware, there has existed, and still exists, very contradictory opinions. Some have supposed, and I concur in that view, that under the taxing power, the power to lay imposts and duties, it may be exerted for the very purpose of protecting manufactures, and if the protection cannot be accomplished except by prohibiting the importation of similar articles from abroad, it may be laid with that view. Others have supposed that although it may be used for the purpose of protecting domestic manufactures, that result is to be affected only incidentally; the object still must be in the imposition of the tax to collect revenue. But with the exception of that use of the taxing power I had supposed the true construction of the Constitution in that particular was that the power must be exerted for the purpose of raising revenue alone.

It is true that the motive which may influence Congress in passing a law of this description cannot be inquired into in any judicial proceeding, and if in a judicial proceeding the court should be of opinion that the limitation upon the power is a limitation which confines Congress to its exercise for the purpose of revenue, the court would conclude that that was the purpose in any and every case in which Congress might think proper to impose the tax, unless it thought proper in the law imposing the tax to state its real purpose. I understand my friend from Maine (for whose opinions on questions of this description, particularly such of them as are constitutional, I have the greatest possible respect) to say that so far as he is concerned he would be willing, unless the banks should proceed hereafter to adopt such a course as he thinks is for the benefit of the country at large, to force them by taxation into the adoption of that course; and he says that the discrimination which the bill proposes as against the State banks in taxing their surplus of circulation beyond ninety per cent. is made for the very purpose of forcing them to reduce their circulation to ninety per cent.

In my view—and that of course the argument assumes to be a correct statement of the fact—if the charter of a State bank authorizes the bank to issue more than ninety per cent. Congress has no authority to interfere with it, because to the extent of any interference which reduces the authority to issue beyond the ninety per cent. and up to the whole extent of the limitation of the charter, Congress is virtually changing the charter. My friend sees that and he thinks that the interest which these banks will have in adopting the national bank system will be such that they will come into that system; but his purpose is, if they fail from a motive of interest to adopt the national system, to compel them to do it or to go out of existence so far as he can accomplish the purpose by the taxing power, or by going even further than the taxing power, if I understand him correctly, by denying them the right to issue any circulation at all. I may be mistaken, but I do not see under what power Congress can go to that extent, provided it be true that the States have the authority to establish banking institutions with the power to issue a banking circulation.

The opposite of that opinion stated by my friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] in the speech to which we listened yesterday is not, as I think, to be considered an open question. It is true that in the beginning of the Government doubts were entertained whether the States possessed the power to establish banks of circulation so as to make that circulation money; but that doubt arose, not, as my friend from Ohio supposes, from the existence of the power in Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof, but because of the prohibition upon the States to issue bills of credit. It was supposed by very well-judging men, men of large experience and great ability, that a bank note issued under the authority of a State by a company chartered by a State was virtually a bill of credit, and fell therefore within the prohibition; but that idea has long been surrendered as a tenable one.

The Supreme Court of the United States—I speak from recollection, but I know that I am right—in the case of Craig vs. Missouri, reported in 4 Peters, held that in that particular case what was done by Missouri was in violation of the prohibition upon Missouri to issue bills of credit only because of the particular circumstances and what the suitor proposed to do in that case. But in the case of Briscoe vs. The State Bank of Kentucky, reported in 11 Peters, the court decided that it was in the power of Kentucky to establish a bank literally belonging to the State, having a capital altogether belonging to the State, and to authorize it to issue bank bills. They decided that those bills were not bills of credit, and consequently that they did not fall within the restriction. Mr. Justice Story expressed a dissenting opinion. The case was first argued before the Supreme Court during the lifetime of Chief Justice Marshall, and held under advisement. It was argued again when the decision was pronounced, after the Chief Justice ceased to adorn that tribunal and shed luster upon our country. Mr. Justice Story in pronouncing his opinion said that in that opinion he had the concurrence of Chief Justice Marshall. But from that day to this the question is supposed to have been settled as to the meaning of the words "bills of credit" as used in the Constitution, and as not prohibiting a State to issue in a bank of its own, setting aside funds for the purpose of meeting the notes to be used in the community as money; but simply—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state that the case from Kentucky to which he refers was the case of Briscoe against the Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky; that that bank was established wholly upon the credit of the State, and never pretended to redeem its notes in specie, and was not redeeming its notes in specie at the time at which the controversy originated to which he has referred.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know; and that made it a stronger case. Even in relation to a bank of that description owned by the State of Kentucky, and whose notes were not redeemable in specie, the majority of the court held that the prohibition did not extend to notes issued under such an authority. If my friend from Ohio, if he has not had occasion recently to recur to it, will turn to the first volume of Story's Commentaries upon the Constitution of the United States he will find a note stating that although the learned commentator was inclined to believe that Mr. Justice

Story was right when the question was a new one, yet in his judgment the question was put at rest by the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Briscoe and the Commonwealth of Kentucky. In Story's Commentaries on the Constitution he again repeats his doubt whether, as a new question, the State could have had a right or had a right to authorize paper to be issued at all for the purpose of being used as money, and appealed to the authority of a speech made by Mr. Webster in this body not many years ago, before the Commentaries were written, and to a communication made by Mr. Webster when he was in the Administration. But Chancellor Kent says that the authority against such a proposition was much greater than the authorities relied upon by the commentator, being the authority of Hamilton, who, as he showed, recognized the right and authority of the States notwithstanding the Constitution of the United States to authorize the issue of State bank paper.

If it be true that the power exists in the States to establish State banks and to give to those banks the power to establish a currency, then that power is just as much out of the sphere of congressional power as any other power which the States may have reserved to them or not surrendered by the Constitution. I think, therefore, certainly with very sincere respect, that the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance is mistaken in his constitutional law. Whether we should have the power is not a question to be considered when we are called upon to decide whether we have the power. If it be really doubtful whether the power exists—doubtful as an original question, doubtful as a question at this day, notwithstanding the judicial decisions which have been pronounced on the subject—then the policy of the power, the necessity of the power would go a great way, or rather, as I think, should go a great way, in causing us to solve the doubt so as to enable us to subserve the public interests. But in the view which I take there is no doubt; and if there is no doubt, then the Congress of the United States have no authority to interfere on this question.

Mr. President, the propriety of this banking system is not now before us. The question, as stated by the chairman in his interruption for a moment of the honorable Senator from California, was perfectly correct. The propriety of that system is not a question involved in this debate. The system was adopted before, and so far as the Senate have thought it should be altered, the Senate have altered it. Some of their amendments and alterations have been assented to by the House of Representatives; some have been rejected; and the subject is now before a committee of conference. One of the amendments suggested by the Senate was, that the States should have the right of taxing these national banks. I hope that that may be the final result.

Mr. COLLAMER. Taxing the shares?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir. But if it should not be the result, as it seems to me the opposite decision will have a very material bearing upon a proper decision of the question which is now before us: shall the State banks be taxed, and if they shall be taxed to what extent shall they be taxed? If taxation with reference to both systems of banking is to go on pari passu, or, in other words, if the United States is to have the right, as she certainly has, of taxing the State banks, and the States are to have the right of taxing the United States banks, or the shares in the United States banks, then the taxation may be made equal, as it is in this instance with the exception which has been spoken of. But if you deny to the States the right to tax the national banks, it may become a very important question whether you will exercise your right to tax the State banks. That question cannot arise until we know what may be the determination of Congress upon the particular question which is now in abeyance.

One word more, and I shall have done. I have heard upon more occasions than one in debate some doubt expressed whether the country will be able to meet the debt which it is incurring; even whether it will be able to meet the existing debt, the one incurred; and still greater doubt whether it will be able to meet any increase of that debt. I have heard, therefore, repudiation spoken of, not in clear terms, but ambiguously given out. With all deference to those who may have such apprehensions, I submit whether it is proper at this time to announce them. The announcement of our inability to pay the national debt strikes at the credit of the Government more fatally than any other one thing of which I can conceive. The moment it is supposed to be probable, and it may be supposed probable when Senators or members of the other House express a belief that the end will come, that the Government will not be able to meet its engagements, you inflict a wound that will tell at once, and tell more fatally from hour to hour and from day to day, as that doubt may be made to fasten itself upon the public judgment.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 163.

Sir, I entertain no such doubt. Be the war on our part successful or unsuccessful, terminate it now or terminate it a year hence, and this debt, of a magnitude almost appalling looked at by itself, may still be met, the public honor preserved, the name of the nation saved, and not only its name and honor preserved and saved, but made to be higher by the ability which it will exhibit and may exhibit that it is capable to meet even the gigantic expenses necessary to carry on the gigantic war in which we are engaged for the purpose of saving the life of the nation. Looked at by itself, considered only arithmetically, it is a burden hard to be borne; but look away from it, look at the resources of the nation, look at the enterprise of our people, look at our magnificent domain, look at the invention and the patriotism of our people, see what we are now doing and how we are now apparently prospering, and I submit there is no well grounded fear but that the nation will be able to emerge from this war, whether it succeeds in restoring the Union, as I doubt not it will, or whether it fail, greater even than it was before the attempt to dissolve it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not mean to enter into a discussion of constitutional principles, or to cite cases. I think it is a little too late to do anything of that sort, especially on a bill of this kind. The Senator misunderstood me entirely. He must have misunderstood me, for he never misrepresents anybody. He says just what I said: Congress has an undoubted right to tax State banks just as it pleases and as much as it pleases. That he assumes. That is true; I said that myself; and I said that for myself I would exercise that power if it became necessary to accomplish a great national purpose. The Senator admits further, (what every lawyer knows,) that when we exercise a constitutional power our motives may be what they please; the courts never look into them; and therefore they do not affect the question. That is all I want. The question of constitutionality does not arise either directly or indirectly, or even remotely in any shape or form, and therefore all such discussions are out of place.

What I meant to say was—and I repeat it for fear of being misunderstood—that at present I see no occasion to exercise the discriminating power, and at present I think it would be unwise to do it to any considerable extent, because I think too great stringency would affect injuriously the business of the country. I will say moreover that I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio that these two systems cannot long exist together; one must yield to the other for the good of the community and the good of the currency of the country; but you cannot make violent changes. At present the national bank system has hardly gone into operation; the capital is very small; we must give some time for the community to accommodate itself to it. I would give the time necessary; and if it shall be found after giving that time that the national bank system, as it is called, is a success, succeeds well, if it be found to be good and strong and that it has fastened itself upon the confidence of the community, then will be the time to act with reference to the other question, and we shall not have acted hastily.

How I should act in such an emergency one year hence or two years hence or three years hence would depend upon the state of things at that time. When the time comes we act according to the necessities of the case as they present themselves. If it shall then be found that here is a national system which is beneficial and useful in itself and ought to go into operation for the benefit of the currency of the country, and the State banks stand in its way after having had ample notice and time to accommodate their business to it, then will be the time for more stringent measures, and if the good of the country shall require it I shall not hesitate to apply those measures either in the shape of increased taxation, or, if that will not accomplish the purpose, in the shape of prohibition. Whether that time will come or not, whether events will illustrate the necessity of that we must wait to see. I trust all of us who shall have the privilege or the burden of acting upon such questions will be wise enough at that time to act according to the necessities of the case as it presents itself.

This, sir, is what I meant to say before.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator has certainly stated me incorrectly. I did say that the motive of Congress or of an individual member of Congress in passing a law for exerting a power which they have a right to exert is a matter which cannot be questioned; but it is a very different matter when we are here ourselves to decide what is the limitation upon our power. We are as much bound to adhere to the Constitution as the courts, and we are just as much violating the Constitution of the United States if we do, in the execution of the particular power, what the power was not granted to accomplish, as the courts would do if they sanctioned it. What I said was this: that if the purpose stated by the Senator from Maine was placed in the preamble to the bill, that that would raise the question whether the Congress had the power of taxing to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If I drafted the bill I should not put it there.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; of course you would not put it there. Then if that purpose is not to be put there because that purpose would, in the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, be unconstitutional, do we not violate the Constitution if we act upon the purpose?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is arguing a case of individual conscience, not of law.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I mean the conscience of every member of the Senate, the conscience of Congress. That is what I mean. I cannot make it plainer, it seems to me. If we have not the power, under the taxing power, of putting an end to State banks, then we ought not to exert it. We do not get clear of the difficulty by failing to state that we do exert it with that view.

Mr. CLARK. I offered last evening an amendment in regard to tobacco. I will withdraw that amendment now if the Senate pleases, because there are some parties who are desirous to converse with me further about it before it is offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the bill—

Mr. DAVIS. I will ask the courtesy of the Senator from New Hampshire. I propose to amend the section that is under consideration.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator had better let the committee go on with their amendments. He can offer his amendment afterwards.

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly; but I did not know that the Senator was acting in that capacity at this time.

Mr. CLARK. I am moving amendments for the committee. The amendments which I shall offer may be considered as amendments that have been agreed upon by the committee, and I offer them in behalf of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to make this suggestion: I do not want to forfeit my right to offer an amendment to the section that has been under consideration. If I have it at any time it will suit me just as well to offer it hereafter as now.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will have just as much right to offer it in the future as now. I do not desire that he should forfeit that right. If he fears that he is in danger of forfeiting it, I will give way; but I do not understand that there is any such danger.

Mr. DAVIS. I merely wanted to preserve my right.

Mr. CLARK. On page 226, I move to strike out the proviso in lines sixty-seven, sixty-eight, sixty-nine, and seventy, and to insert what I shall send to the Chair instead of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to this change.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes, sir; I have my eye on it.

The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That so far as this act relates to friction or lucifer matches made in part of wood, or to cigar lights or wax tapers, the same shall not take effect until the 1st day of August, 1864.

And to insert:

Provided, That the stamp duties herein provided for on friction or lucifer matches made in part of wood, or on cigar lights or wax tapers, shall not be imposed until the 1st day of September, 1864; but until that time the tax shall be assessed and collected as heretofore; and on and after said 1st day of September every package or parcel sold by any person, firm, company, or corporation shall be stamped as herein required.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know what is the reason of that postponement.

Mr. CLARK. The reason is this: that it requires some time for the parties to dispose of the stock that is on hand. It could not be disposed of under the provision which the committee reported originally, because a great many of the matches are packed and cannot be stamped unless they are repacked, and many of them have been sold. The committee have concluded to give them until the 1st of September to dispose of the stock on hand and to get their machinery ready for the new preparation. Then, after that time, on whatever package is made by any person, no matter whom, the stamp will be required.

Mr. HOWARD. I will ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether he will not also consent to exempt the manufactured stock which is on hand then; that is, on the 1st of September?

Mr. CLARK. No; that would not do, I will state to the Senator from Michigan, because if we did that they would go on from this time until then manufacturing them; they would employ the three or four months to come in manufacturing a stock to have on hand at that time which would be sold under the old law. We give them this time simply to enable them to get rid of what they have on hand, and we require them, if they manufacture and have on hand anything at that time, to place the stamp upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. That I understand to be an amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. CLARK. This is an amendment of the committee on consideration of the various objections that were made to the other provision.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the honorable Senator from Michigan that it relieves them of all the difficulties that they urged, while at the same time it prevents them from accumulating a large stock at the time this tax goes into operation.

Mr. HOWARD. I see the effect.

Mr. CLARK. We found great difficulty in fixing it so that they should not continue to manufacture and escape the tax and at the same time relieve the matter of the objections that were made to it.

Mr. HOWARD. I think I should have concurred with the committee if I had been on the committee in regard to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill on page 135, section ninety-three, line two hundred and nineteen, by inserting after the word "books" the words "and on photographs so small in size that a stamp cannot be affixed, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem."

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest whether it would not be a simpler tax to amend that clause so as to read, "On photographs or any other sun picture, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem," striking out the intermediate words, "being copies of engravings or works of art, or used for the illustration of books." That, of course, would require the striking out of the provision on page 226. It seems to me that there is an unnecessary complication here in connection with rather a small matter. If the committee have considered this matter and its details, I should not set my knowledge of the subject or the conversations I have had with persons interested in it against their conclusions; but I was led to believe that in this case, as in most others, the preferable tax was that which was the simplest in form; and I doubt the expediency of the exceptional tax here on a particular kind of photograph. I should suggest, therefore, as I said in the beginning, one single tax on all photographs, not going into any question of detail. But when I make the suggestion that is all I propose to do.

Mr. CLARK. The committee have given their attention, and a good deal of attention, to this matter. As the bill came to us from the House of Representatives, photographs were taxed by stamps; and that is probably the simplest way in which they can be taxed. But then it was represented to the committee, and the committee provided for the case, that there were photographs, or sun pictures, as they are sometimes called, which are copies of engravings and works of art, that are sold as low as three and one half cents a card, and to impose a tax on them like other card photographs would be onerous upon them. We then made the provision which stands in lines two hundred and seventeen, two hundred and eighteen, and two hundred and nineteen, to exempt that class of cases. Then it was again represented to us that there are photographs made so small as memorials and mementoes, to put into lockets, that you cannot put a stamp upon them. We have concluded to exempt those also, and put them under the ad valorem clause. But, let me say to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, this is not a small matter in the way of revenue. By the stamp we can get a great deal of revenue without its being onerous. I desire to have the amendment which I have now moved adopted, and then I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate struck out the stamp duty the other day, so as to leave the stamp duty as it stood. The committee, on more mature consideration, think it should remain.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I now move to reconsider the vote of the Senate, by which the clause commencing at line seventy-one and ending at line seventy-nine, on page 226, was stricken out. We struck out all the stamp duty on photographs. I desire to have it restored.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I now move to amend that clause in the seventy-second line, by striking out the words "copies of engravings and works of art," and inserting the words "as hereinbefore provided;" so that it will read:

Photographs, ambrotypes, daguerrotypes, or any sun pictures, except as hereinbefore provided, upon each and every picture of which the retail price shall not exceed twenty-five cents, two cents; exceeding the retail price of twenty-five cents, and not exceeding the sum of fifty cents, three cents; exceeding the retail price of fifty cents, and not exceeding one dollar, five cents; exceeding the retail price of one dollar, for every additional dollar or fractional part thereof, five cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. Before we pass from that subject, allow me to ask the Senator if it does not leave copies of engravings or works of art with the smallest tax?

Mr. CLARK. It leaves them with the ad valorem tax of five per cent.

Mr. SUMNER. I was going to observe that some of the most valuable photographs would fall under that clause as "copies of engravings or works of art."

Mr. CLARK. That may be very true; but they are sold generally very cheap, and there is no other way of distinguishing them. You can buy them at the rate of three and a half cents. The committee found it necessary to make that amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. CLARK. On page 22, section twenty-two, lines two and three, I move to strike out the words "from the date of their appointment;" so that it will read:

That there shall be allowed and paid to the several assessors a salary of $1,500 per annum, &c.

It is necessary to strike out these words on account of the amendment made last night allowing them to have their appointments under the old law, otherwise they would get the increased salary from the date of their appointment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 59, section fifty-four, line fourteen, after the word "gallon," I move to insert these words:

And all spirits which may be in the possession of the distiller on either the 1st day of June, October, or January aforesaid, no duty having been paid thereon, shall be held and treated as if distilled on each of those days respectively.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the effect of that amendment?

Mr. CLARK. The effect of it is to prevent their evading the tax on all that portion of liquor which they may have on hand and distilled, but which they have not sold or removed for consumption and sale. As the bill now stands that would not fall under either class; it will be distilled but not removed, so that it cannot be taxed without this provision.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand this amendment does not interfere with the decision of the Senate not to tax liquor on hand.

Mr. CLARK. Not at all.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the amendment by adding the words "if the tax has not been paid thereon."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course if the tax has been paid, it has been removed. They do not pay the tax until they remove or sell it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the words he proposes to insert are already in the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. The object of my amendment is only to guard against an evasion of the law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator whether, if the distiller desires to pay the tax the day before on all the stock that is in his establishment, he may do so, and thereby avoid the increase on those days?

Mr. CLARK. He may, and it would not fall within this provision, because the duty would have been paid.

Mr. COWAN. This is to supply a *casus omis*sis in the law.

Mr. CLARK. That is all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 65, section fifty-nine, line six, I move to insert after the word "prescribe" the words "and such warehouse;" so that it will read:

That the owner or owners of any distillery or oil refinery may provide, at his or their own expense, a warehouse established in conformity with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and such warehouse, when approved by the collector, is hereby declared a bonded warehouse, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 86, section seventy-six, line twenty-eight, the committee desire to strike out the words "at auction," in the amendment reported from the committee which has been adopted. They should not be in there, in the opinion of the committee, and they desire to have them stricken out. I suppose by unanimous consent that amendment can be made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. On page 98, section seventy-eight, line two hundred and seventy-nine, after the word "auctioneers," I move to insert the words "whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000, shall pay ten dollars for each license; auctioneers whose annual sales exceed $10,000;" so that the clause will read:

Auctioneers whose annual sales do not exceed $10,000 shall pay ten dollars for each license; auctioneers whose annual sales exceed $10,000 shall pay twenty dollars for each license.

This amendment divides the auctioneers into two classes, according to the amount of their sales. It is thought that we may obtain more revenue by allowing the auctioneers to pay a smaller license in case their sales were small; that there would be more of them in some of the small towns.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 125, section ninety-one, line five, after the word "paid" I move to insert the words "with the knowledge thereof;" so that it will read:

That if any person other than the manufacturer shall sell, or consign, or remove for sale, or part with the possession of any manufactured tobacco, stemmed tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which the duties imposed by law have not been paid, with the knowledge thereof, such person shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 146, section ninety-three, line four hundred and eighty-one, in the amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance and adopted by the Senate, the committee desire to strike out the word "paid." It now reads, "and the tax paid thereon, with the name of the manufacturer." The tax may be paid or it may not. That amendment may be made by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. On the same page, line four hundred and ninety-four, I desire to make the same amendment, to strike out the word "paid."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made.

Mr. CLARK. On page 149, at the end of section ninety-six, I move to insert the following:

That all manufactures and productions on which a duty was imposed by either of the acts repealed by this act which shall be in the possession of the manufacturer or producer, or of his agent or agents at the place of manufacture on the day when this act takes effect, the duty imposed by said former act not having been paid shall be held and deemed to have been manufactured or produced after said date; and whenever, by the terms of this act, a duty is imposed upon any articles, goods, wares, or merchandise manufactured or produced, upon which no duty was paid by either of said former acts, it shall apply only to such as are manufactured or produced on or after the day when this act takes effect, and to such as are manufactured or produced and not removed from the place of manufacture or production prior to that act.

This amendment relates to manufactures, and it provides that manufactures which have been manufactured, but on which no duty has been paid and that have not been removed on the day this act takes effect, shall be taxed by this act, but up to the time of its passage they shall not; so that they shall not escape the tax in the same way in which the whisky escaped it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 151, section ninety-eight, line nineteen, after the word "any" I move to insert the words "merchandise, produce, or," so as to make it correspond with the amendment made by the committee in the fourth line of that section. The proviso will then read:

That any person, firm, or company licensed as a broker or banker who shall sell or offer to sell any merchandise, produce, or gold or silver bullion, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 13, section fourteen, line thirty-seven, I move to strike out the word "reside" and to insert the words "have taxable property;" so that it will read:

It shall be the duty of the assessor or assistant assessor of the district within which such persons shall have taxable property to enter into and upon the premises, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Those are all the amendments that I propose at the present time in behalf of the committee.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend the bill on page 127, section ninety-three, line fourteen, by inserting after the words "dust coal" the words "and coal mined and used exclusively for the distillation of coal oil." The bill as it now stands taxes the coal out of which this coal oil is made; the oil also is taxed. That should not be. It was the intention of the committee of the House of Representatives, as I understand, to exempt it, but somehow it was omitted. The clause now reads:

On mineral coals, except such as are known in the trade as pea coal and dust coal, a duty of five cents per ton.

I desire to make an exception of the coal that is used for the manufacture of this oil. It is evidently proper that it should be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope that amendment will not be made. We have already made a distinction of five cents between the oil that is made from coal and the oil that is made from petroleum. That is distinction enough, and is really more than enough, and the amount of that was fixed larger than it otherwise would have been to accommodate the gentlemen in Kentucky and West Virginia that the Senator represents in relation to this manufacture. There is no duty on the coal unless it is sold. If they choose to mine their coal and turn it into oil, it is all for their benefit. I trust therefore that there will be no distinction of this kind made.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I have another amendment to propose. It is on page 129, section ninety-three, line seventy, to strike out the word "fifteen" and insert "twelve." That clause now reads as follows:

Provided, That such oil, refined and produced by the distillation of coal, asphaltum or shale, exclusively, shall be subject to pay a duty of fifteen cents per gallon, anything to the contrary notwithstanding.

I desire to have "fifteen" stricken out and "twelve" inserted. When this bill was before the House of Representatives the Committee of Ways and Means reported in favor of a duty of fifteen cents a gallon upon oil produced from coal, and twenty cents upon that produced from petroleum. The House of Representatives raised the tax on that produced from petroleum to thirty cents, and this other to fifteen cents. They afterwards struck out thirty cents and inserted twenty cents, but neglected to reduce the other duty of fifteen cents to twelve cents. It is evidently proper that the reduction should be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope it will not be made. When the committee of the House of Representatives reported that duty of twelve cents on the oil produced from coal they reported a duty of fifteen cents on the other, making a difference of three cents. In the course of the arrangement that was made in the House of Representatives it was left with a distinction of five cents in favor of the manufacturers of oil from coal, thus increasing the difference between the two to five cents instead of three cents. That was done, as I have stated, at the express and particular wish of the gentlemen from Kentucky, as I understand it, who represented that the distinction should be greater than it was. I suppose the difference of three cents would have been satisfactory, if nothing better could be got, to all the other manufacturers of oil in the country; that is to say, those who manufacture in the eastern States; but it was finally allowed to stand as it is. The manufacturers of petroleum have been very anxious to put it back to the old difference of three cents a gallon; but the Committee on Finance concluded from the statements made to them that on the whole it was better to leave it as it was, and have no further discussion about it, to let the duty stand at twenty cents and fifteen cents. The articles will bear those rates, and a distinction of five cents is ample between the two. I trust the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I do not understand the facts in regard to this tax as the Senator does. I have been informed that the Committee of Ways and Means reported a tax of twenty cents and twelve cents respectively on this oil. The House of Representatives raised the tax on the oil produced from petroleum from twenty to thirty cents and raised this other tax to fifteen cents. Subsequently it reduced the tax on petroleum oil from thirty to twenty cents, but in reducing the one it did not reduce the other.

Mr. FESSENDEN. None of them asked of us more than a difference of five cents.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator is a little mistaken in that. My colleague in the House of Representatives who represents this district asked me to have it reduced from fifteen to twelve cents.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I speak of what the gentleman who came before the committee with the Senator asked for.

Mr. POWELL. I think this amendment ought to be made. I think it was the intention of the committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance think not. The committee think the distinction is as great as it ought to be between the two.

Mr. COWAN. I will further remark that the discrimination is now more favorable to those who distill oil from coal than it was under the old law. Under the old law there was a tax of eight cents upon coal oil, and ten cents upon petroleum. That was twenty-five per cent. in favor of the coal oil. Now it is fifteen cents upon coal oil, and twenty cents upon petroleum, making a discrimination of thirty-three and one third per cent. That, we thought, was sufficient for their protection, considering the difficulties in the manufacture of coal oil.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWELL. I have been a little unfortunate in my amendments; but I will propose another, which I hope will meet the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Finance. It is to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1864, all acts and parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels employed in the Bank or other cod fisheries, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us have the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There ought at least to be an amendment to that amendment before it is acted upon. If there is any probability of its being adopted, there should at any rate be a drawback allowed on the salt that is used in the curing of the fish, as it was originally. These bounties took the place of the drawback. In process of time there came to be no duty on salt. The duty is now replaced, not in this bill, but in the tariff bill. I forget what it is, but it is very large; and if these bounties are to be repealed there should at any rate be a drawback allowed on the salt used in the curing of the fish.

Mr. COWAN. That question is before the Committee on Commerce now.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They should provide a drawback on this as well as on other articles.

Mr. POWELL. After we get the bounty laws repealed we can adjust the salt duty.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all very true, but it should be a part of the proposition.

Mr. POWELL. We had better see whether we can repeal the bounties first.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps the Senator will consent to let it go over until we get through with other amendments.

Mr. POWELL. I prefer to have it acted upon to-day.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator insists upon it, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to discuss this proposition. When the subject was before the Senate on a previous occasion the question was asked me as to the amount of these duties. I have now before me a table, from the office of the Register of the Treasury, showing the amount paid for these bounties for the last four or five years, which I will read for the information of the Senate.

L. E. CHITTENDEN, Register of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, REGISTER'S OFFICE, May 24, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, there are some reasons why I feel called upon to say a few words on this question. I submit to the honorable Senator who offers this amendment that as the proposition is one to reverse the settled and uniform policy of the Government from the earliest period of our history it would have been as well if he had given to the Senate at least some reasons for it at the present time. From the persistency with which the honorable Senator presents this question now and has done so heretofore, I have no doubt he has made up his mind that the bounties ought to be repealed; that the earlier policy of the Government ought to be changed—that policy which was coeval with the establishment of the Constitution, which originated in the first Congress of the United States under the Constitution, and which has been uniformly continued from that day to the present, to cherish and foster the fisheries not only as a branch of national industry, but as an interest of peculiar importance to the naval power of this Government and the commercial marine of the country. I submit, sir, that it would have been quite decorous at least in that Senator to give some intimation to the Senate of the grounds upon which he proceeds and upon which he expects the Senate now to reverse this early, uniform, and established policy of the Government.

I am afraid I shall be obliged to trespass upon the patience of the Senate much more than I ought to do in considering this question. I am not disposed to allow it to be taken for granted that this policy is to be reversed, and I will state the reasons as I advance why I am not disposed to allow it to go by default.

If I am to understand that an appeal is made to New England at this time for a sacrifice, I do not stand here to oppose it. If it is necessary to change this uniform, established policy of the Government toward this great national industry; if the times demand it; if the necessities of the Government are such that this bounty is to be given up by New England—for it seems to be assumed by the honorable Senator offering this amendment that this is exclusively a New England interest—if I am to understand that this is a national demand upon the generosity of New England, then I am not here to dissent from it. If it is a demand in favor of the necessities of the nation as against an interest in New England, I am not here to interpose any opposition to it. But, sir, if it is an individual whim, if it is the caprice of any man or set of men whatever, I am here to say that I am not ready to yield to it to-day, and I shall not be to-morrow or next week—never. Sir, New England—for that seems to be the sense in which this measure is pursued so far as the honorable mover of it is concerned—never surrenders on such grounds—never.

Therefore, sir, taking the view I do of this subject, that it is one of national concern, that it is one that concerns the country at large, that, although in some sense it is peculiar to New England, it is a great American interest, a great American industry, I shall be obliged to travel a little outside of the proposition as proposed by the honorable Senator from Kentucky, and look at the history of this subject and see whether it is local or whether it is national, and consider the opinions of those who hold the other side of this question.

I understood the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] to state the other day, when this question was up, that he too was in favor of the repeal of the fishing bounties, and I will do him the honor to say that on that as on all occasions he was entirely frank. I understood him to say that as a matter of principle he was in favor of the fishing bounties and always had been; that he recognized in that policy a sound policy; he recognized in it the wisdom of the founders of the Government who instituted the policy. He did not understand that it was against the Constitution; he did not understand that it was against a wise and sound political economy, even. He thought it judicious, prudent, wise, just. He knows enough of the history of the country to know that the fisheries from the foundation of the Government down to the present time have been an American interest to be cherished as a great industry, to be cherished, moreover, as a national necessity, as a necessity to your naval power and your commercial marine; and therefore, in the spirit of wise statesmanship, the honorable Senator told the Senate that he had always been in favor of this policy. I am sorry to say that he notifies the Senate now of his purpose to vote for the repeal. Why? On the ground of public necessity? No. On the ground that we cannot afford to pay the bounties? No. On the ground that now, when you desire to strengthen your naval power, when the nations of the earth are frowning upon you, that you can afford to relax your hold on the fisheries? No. What then? Why, sir, the honorable Senator says that New England has become fanatical on the subject of the negro, and therefore, for that reason, he will repeal the fishing bounties! With all the respect I feel for the honorable Senator, he must allow me to say that I think he could have assigned a great deal better motive for what he proposes to do than that.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator by what right he presumes to discuss my motives.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose, with great respect to the honorable Senator from Kentucky, that whenever he chooses on a measure to assign his motives, they are common stock.

Mr. DAVIS. The honorable Senator has only assigned one of the motives which I gave for my vote. I said distinctly in the speech that I made that those bounties were allowed in the infancy of our marine, and that then there was a necessity for them; but that our marine, both commercial and military, had now grown to such a degree that there was no longer any necessity for that fostering legislation.

Mr. MORRILL. I will venture to say, although I know my honorable friend would not say anything on this subject that he did not suppose he had said on the occasion referred to, yet if he will turn to the report of his remarks he will find no such thing. But if he thinks he did, if he asserts it here—

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the honorable Senator—

Mr. MORRILL. I think the honorable Senator had better allow me to go on.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator if he wishes to make a question of veracity with me here on the Senate floor?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not particularly, unless the honorable Senator chooses to raise it himself.

Mr. DAVIS. I am disposed to meet any that the honorable Senator may raise. I will inquire of him whether he wants to raise a question of veracity here with me or not?

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir. The Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. I was saying that I was sorry the honorable Senator assigned for the vote he proposes to give on this subject the reason or the motive which he did assign. I think a better one could have been assigned. I take no especial pleasure in alluding to it, but it becomes necessary in the consideration of this question. I do not intend that a stab shall be made at New England, whether the motives are assigned or not, and especially if they are assigned. I do not intend that the action of the Senate shall be influenced by them until they have been properly noticed, if it were possible to suppose that it could be so influenced. Why, sir, it is not two years since that honorable Senator seemed quite in love with New England, quite enamored of her character.

He spoke of it in terms of eulogy which would be hardly fitting for me, perhaps, to repeat; which would be considered fulsome. He was enamored with the lofty elements of her character, her marvelous industry, her matchless commerce, her distinguished love of letters and science and the arts. But all at once "a change comes o'er the spirit of his dream," and you find him, with his great research and his wonderful capacity, searching in the dark chambers of her history and dragging out to light whatever is exceptional in her history, as if he had not lived long enough to know that no individual or national character is without its imperfections, just as the sun in its mid-day glories has its spots, but which in nowise whatever touch the honor or the glory of the nation. Day after day has that Senator stood here to arraign New England and to bring forward from the recesses of the dark chambers of her history whatever could tell against her. I will not characterize the measure introduced here by him in the same direction. I leave him to explain, and other Senators to draw their own inferences, when he brings in here a measure to put New England "out in the cold," to divide New England into two States, denominating them East and West New England, and then he tells us that he is to vote against the continuation of this policy of the Government in regard to this interest.

I have no unkindness in the allusion to the honorable Senator; but inasmuch as when this question was up incidentally he took occasion to make that remark, it seemed necessary in the outset of this argument that I should look around for the reasons for this measure, in the absence of any stated by the honorable Senator from Kentucky who moved it.

With the Senator from Kentucky on this side of the Chamber [Mr. POWELL] the case is quite otherwise, I admit. He has no love for New England; he never had. If I am to understand him, he hates New England; he despises New England character.

Mr. POWELL. I do not know upon what ground the Senator from Maine says that I despise New England.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will only be patient, I will tell him why. I do not mean to say anything here that I am not prepared to prove. I repeat that the honorable Senator has no love for New England. Those who have paid the slightest attention to his remarks during the last two years know that he has lost no opportunity to let the country so understand; and I have not been an inattentive observer and listener. In the speech he had the honor to submit to the Senate a few days ago, fresh in the recollection of us all, he expressed himself in terms which leave no doubt upon the mind of the most incredulous of the feelings and sentiments the honorable Senator entertains for New England, as a matter of friendship and in regard to New England character. Let me read a little from the speech of the honorable Senator:

"I do not stand here to denounce our Yankee brethren of the North!"

I suppose the "denunciation" would not be quite parliamentary or decorous in a body like this—"but everybody knows that cupidity and love of gain is their strongest characteristic."

The honorable Senator will hardly claim that he is very much in love with a country whose characteristics are cupidity and love of gain, or that he entertains a very high respect for that country that he will stand in the high court of the nation and denounce as influenced by such unworthy sentiments. He adds:

"That is known the world over and acknowledged by themselves."

Mr. President, does the history of the country—the history of New England—authorize this assumption of the Senator? Is there anything in either or both that authorizes that Senator in the high court of the nation to so characterize New England and declare that her ruling characteristic is cupidity and love of gain? Is there any student of American history who has so read the history of New England?

But, sir, these opinions are not new or peculiar to the honorable Senator from Kentucky. New England from the earliest dawn of her history has had—I do not say her traducers, because I do not intend to apply that epithet to the honorable Senator—but there have been those from the earliest dawn of her history who did not believe in her. Why, sir, if you go back to the days of the Pilgrims, the court of Great Britain, the high Church and the high State party, did not believe in the Pilgrims. They did not believe in their pilgrimage across the waters. They did not believe in their grand effort to establish civil and religious liberty on this side of the water. They believed it "fanatical" altogether. They believed them to be "fanatics in religion and republicans in politics." The history of that era is full of it.

Coming down to the time of our Revolution we find that there were those who held the same opinion then. There were those then, as there are now, who were jealous of New England, those who did not like New England character. If you look into the Tory papers of that period you will find them full of just such epithets as are repeated here, and have been for the last two years in both branches of Congress, against New England, against New England fanaticism, against New England republicanism, and all that.

As the honorable Senator seems to be so oblivious to the character of New England, perhaps I shall be pardoned by the Senate in referring to a standard authority or two upon this subject for opinions in contradistinction to the opinions which are put forth by the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I will read some of the good opinions of New England and of New England character in the time that was said to try men's souls. Let us take the opinion of Jefferson, who was supposed to know something of his country and all parts of his country, who was supposed to know something of human liberty and human rights, and have some just appreciation of them. What did he say? In 1775, when the great storm of the Revolution was coming on, speaking of New England, and vindicating New England against the loyalists, he spoke—and the historian says these people regarded it with amazement that he should have said it—of "the adventurous genius and intrepidity of the New Englanders." In the convention held in South Carolina a short time afterwards, when those who were opposed to the Revolution, the loyalists, those adhering to the party of the king as against the party of the country, denounced New England, and, in the language of the historian, an "unhappy jealousy of New England" broke forth, and a member "insinuated distrust of its people as artful and designing men, altogether pursuing selfish purposes," Mr. Gadsden, of South Carolina, said in their defense:

"I only wish we would imitate, instead of abusing, them. I thank God we have such a systematic body of men, as an asylum that honest men may resort to in the time of their last distress, if driven out of their own States. So far from being under any apprehensions, I bless God that there is such a people in America."

Let us look a little further into this subject, particularly touching the characteristics of the New England people, and learn what the great American historian says in regard to the New England character, as contradistinguished from the character given her by the honorable Senator from Kentucky:

"Lovers of speculative truth, struggling earnestly to solve the problem of the universe, in an age of materialists, they cherished habitually a firm faith in the subjection of all created things to the rule of divine justice, and their distinguishing career was one of action; the vigor of their will was never paralyzed by doubt; they were cheered by confidence in the amelioration of the race, and embraced in their affections the world of mankind. This wonderful people set the example of public schools for all their children, with a degree of perfection which the ancient mother country yet vainly strives to rival; and in their town governments they revealed the secret of republics. None knew better than they how to combine the minute discharge of the every-day offices of life with large and ready and generous sympathies; sometimes soaring high and far in the daring of their enterprise, and sometimes following with painful assiduity even the humblest calling that promised lawful and honest gain; but always the advocates of disinterested benevolence as the true creed of a nation."

Against this assault of the honorable Senator upon the character of New England I set this opinion of the great American historian, Bancroft.

The honorable Senator, in this connection, said another thing which I must notice. He spoke of the loyalty of New England as extremely questionable. He said:

"Suppose you were to propose to pass an amendment to the Constitution laying your hand on the property interests in New England, I will not say equal, but one half equal to the property interests of the southern States which you now propose to strike down: does any man believe that all New England would not be in revolution to-morrow?"

That is a speculation, perhaps, with which it is a little difficult to deal; but allow me to ask the honorable Senator whether New England is not making sacrifices to-day, whether she is not pouring out her money and her treasure, and whether she has not sent her first-born to this war under circumstances which show that she has not departed from the old Abrahamic faith, that she believes in God and liberty to-day? I say to that honorable Senator that when New England is pouring out her treasure and sending her first-born down to defend his own State against her own traitorous children, it does not become him to stand here and arraign New England, and to see if by possibility she is not vulnerable at some point at which he can reach her.

Mr. President, it seemed to be necessary to say this much, as the honorable Senator did not condescend to tell the Senate upon what ground he proceeded, by way of preface to what I shall have to say upon the merits of this question.

I oppose the repeal of the fishing bounties upon the ground that the fisheries are a great national industry which you cannot afford to cripple, which you cannot afford to embarrass; but more especially do I oppose it as affecting a great element of national strength, which is indispensably necessary to your naval power, which now by all the means within your reach you should strengthen and not cripple. Without such fisheries no nation, in modern times at least, has ever succeeded in her naval or commercial marine.

I trust I need not stand here to argue in the Senate of the United States in the year 1864 that this interest is essential to the naval power and the commercial marine of the nation. I should certainly not presume to speak upon such a theme if it had not been for the fact that on my right hand and certainly on my left on many occasions this interest with which we are attempting to deal was said to be only a local affair, that it only concerned New England, that it was exclusively confined to New England, that the nation at large had no interest whatever in it. Senators tell us, you may strike it down to-day and the nation trembles not throughout any department of industry and any department of commerce or navigation. The idea is that you may strike it down with impunity. Is that so? Sir, if it is a local interest I abandon it this moment. Senators, I crave your attention on that point. If I do not demonstrate to you in the argument and upon the proof that it is national, national in the highest sense of nationality, so intensely and peculiarly national that you cannot surrender it unless you are willing to surrender your independence upon the seas, unless you are willing to surrender your commerce—if I do not prove that, I invite you to vote against me; but if I do, I trust that you will not; nay, I trust, as you hold the good of the nation, you dare not.

Now, does any man in this broad land, any man least acquainted with American history, need to be told that this interest is national? How shall we settle the question? The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] says it is local; he has no doubt about it; he does not want to bestow a second thought on the subject; he does not want to speak of the thing twice; he is ready the moment he introduces his amendment, without explanation or proof, to demand the action of the Senate, upon the ground that this is a local interest, that nobody is concerned but New England, and of course he is ready to strike it down. How shall we settle the question? When questions are found difficult and proof is not at hand, there is always a ready way to settle all these questions of a public character, by an appeal to the intelligence especially of such a body as this; and that is all that is necessary.

I appeal to your recollections of history. How have the civilized nations of the earth held this question? How have the commercial and naval and maritime Powers of the earth held this question? What did they say upon the great subject of the fisheries? Why, sir, the history of Holland will tell you that Amsterdam was said to be "built on herring-bones," and owes the success of her naval and commercial power almost wholly to her fisheries. Look at her history; look at the declarations of her statesmen and diplomats. They cherished it as a thing essential to both those interests. How is it with England and France? England and France for two hundred years have struggled alternately for the possession of the Newfoundland fisheries. Many of the wars between those two countries have grown out of their struggle for those fisheries. Is any Senator here so ignorant of the history of those two countries, of their naval power and their commercial supremacy, as not to know that both these Powers attribute their success mainly to the fisheries?

Sir, I maintain the proposition that these fisheries are of prime necessity to the naval power of the nation and its commercial marine. The Navy is always recruited from the fisheries. That has been so for one hundred and fifty years with every maritime and naval Power on the globe, and it is so to-day. Each of these naval Powers has during all that time and does to-day precisely what this Government has done from the start and is doing to-day; that is, they encourage and stimulate and foster the fishing interest by bounties, to the end that out of it they may sustain their naval power and their commercial marine. They hold the fisheries to be "a nursery for seamen." Without seamen educated, "born upon the sea," you can have no efficient navy. That is the general judgment of the commercial and naval Powers of the earth in regard to this great subject.

You get some idea of the estimated importance of the fisheries and of the deeds of daring and enterprise of those engaged in them in the famous speech of Mr. Burke on American affairs, in 1774. He said:

"As to the wealth which the colonies have drawn from the sea by their fisheries, you had all that matter fully opened at your bar. You surely thought these acquisitions of value, for they seemed to excite your envy; and yet the spirit by which that enterprising employment has been exercised ought rather, in my opinion, to have raised esteem and admiration. And pray, sir, what in the world is equal to it? Pass by the other parts, and look at the manner in which the people of New England carry on the whale-fishery. While we follow them among the trembling mountains of ice, and behold them penetrating into the deepest frozen recesses of Hudson's bay and Davis straits; while we are looking for them beneath the Arctic circle, we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold; that they are at the antipodes and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South. Falkland Island, which seemed too remote and too romantic an object for the grasp of national ambition, is but a stage and resting place for their victorious industry. Nor is the equinoctial heat more discouraging to them than the accumulated winter of both poles. We learn that while some of them draw the line or stick the harpoon on the coast of Africa, others run the longitude and pursue their gigantic game along the coast of Brazil. No sea but what is vexed with their fisheries; no climate that is not witness of their toils. Neither the perseverance of Holland, nor the activity of France, nor the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise, ever carried this most perilous mode of hardy industry to the extent to which it has been pursued by this recent people; a people who are still in the gristle, and not hardened into manhood."

Just in accordance with this general judgment of the civilized nations of the earth is the judgment of this nation. Let us look at it. We are now in the midst of a civil war calling for the exercise of all our resources, and placing our destiny in peril; apprehensive of danger from abroad, we are doing whatever seems wise and practicable to strengthen the naval power of the Government. We would like to call into our service every skilled man upon the sea; and now at this moment, when from menaces abroad you are obliged to look into the future and see that this great arm of the nation must be strengthened to its utmost capacity and utmost tension, the honorable Senator from Kentucky comes in with this proposition as if it were an ordinary affair, as if nobody had any interest in this subject but New England, about whom nobody cares, and assumes that you can afford to strike down this long-cherished interest. Where do you get your sailors from? From Kentucky? Are you to go to the tobacco plantations of Kentucky to get the sailors to man your ships of war? Is that the experience of the world? No, the experience of the world is that practiced seamen, men born upon the waves, are the men required. They are the men who have carried your banner triumphantly and gloriously through all the wars in which this country has been engaged, and upon them you must rely in the future, if you intend that in the future the renown of the country shall be what it has been in the past.

What is the history of this subject, so far as our own Government is concerned? I have shown you the estimate that the naval and commercial Powers of the globe place upon it. I have shown you that they cherish and sustain and stand by it as the right arm of the Navy. They say, if you have a Navy and commerce you must sustain it; and how? You must have "nurseries" for your sailors; and therefore, as the fishing business is a small business, generally a losing business, always a precarious business, it must be encouraged; for the experience is that unless it is encouraged it declines; and hence the policy of all modern nations upon that subject. What has been our own history? One would think we had no history on this subject; one would think from the readiness with which the Senator from Kentucky undertakes to overthrow the bounties that they have always been a stigma. I cannot but reflect that a man whose name I will not take upon my lips at this moment, for the last ten years he was permitted to linger about this Capitol, before he went off to make piratical warfare upon the sea on the commerce of the nation, made a systematic effort here in this Senate to do precisely what the Senator has now undertaken to do since his predecessor has gone and left the Senate.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky thought it extremely indecorous—I do not know that that is the phrase—but exceedingly out of place that he had not been able to get a favorable report from the Committee on Commerce on his proposition to repeal these fishing bounties. He thought the Committee on Commerce had nothing else to do but consider this question, and if they had they ought to have nothing else to do than consider it. He seemed to think that the Committee on Commerce should address itself to this subject at once and persistently until they had brought in a bill for the repeal of these fishing bounties; and he made it a matter of complaint. I say to that honorable Senator that the person to whom I refer persistently pursued this same question for ten consecutive years, while his party was in power, and had the responsibility of administering this Government, and had the commerce and the Navy of the nation in charge, and they did not dare lay their fingers on it; not one of them; they could not do it. But that Senator, now that he is in a minority, arraigns this body for not doing it the first forty-eight hours after it is his pleasure to see the thing done.

Now, sir, let me read a little of the history of this country on the subject, not for the enlightenment of anybody except the Senator, but because it seems necessary, as it is so often assumed here, whenever this question comes up, that it is simply a local affair which nobody cares anything about except New England, and nobody has any interest in it except New England. It seems to be the idea that somehow in some evil moment New England got possession of the Congress of the country, and got this policy inaugurated. What is the fact? Why, sir, during the revolutionary struggle the "fisheries" were considered a matter of great moment. As soon as the Government was organized under the Constitution of the United States this question came up. What is our legislative history on this subject? I read from a document submitted to the Treasury Department in 1852:

"Whoever examines the records of Congress will find that between February and August, 1779, the various questions connected with the fisheries were matters of the most earnest and continued debates, and of the most anxious solicitude."

Wherefore? Who were anxious? New England. Anybody else? Yes, sir; the nation at large. No statesman of that day was so narrow-minded as not to comprehend their importance; no statesman of that day who did not consider the fisheries an American interest; an interest identified with the nation and the nation's prosperity; an interest essential to the naval power of the country and to its commercial importance. All the history of that time shows that both in Congress, in the Cabinet and out of it, and by the nation at large, the possession and encouragement of the fisheries was a question of the first moment and the first importance. Let me read another extract from the document:

"During the discussions upon a proposition to open a negotiation for peace, Mr. Gerry introduced the following resolutions: first: 'That it is essential to the welfare of these United States that the inhabitants thereof, at the expiration of the war, should continue to enjoy the free and undisturbed exercise of their common right to fish on the banks of Newfoundland.'"

Washington, in 1790, in his speech to Congress, remarked that:

"Our fisheries and transportation of our produce off-rus abundant means for guarding ourselves against the evil of depending upon foreign vessels."

In the address of the Senate to the President is the following:

"The navigation and fisheries of the United States are objects too interesting not to inspire a disposition to promote them by all means which shall appear to us consistent with their natural progress and permanent prosperity."

This document, which contains the history of the fisheries, is full of the opinions of the statesmen of that day on the subject. Jefferson recommended the encouragement of the fisheries as "nurseries" for the Navy. The founders of the Government and all the early statesmen of the country held that this interest was not only a national industry, but one essential to the commercial marine and the naval power of the nation, and so they inaugurated this policy, the precise policy which by the amendment of the honorable Senator from Kentucky we are now asked to repeal, to reverse, as if this were the time to do it.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another phase of this question. It is said this is a question of bounty to the fishermen, and there is no reason why they should have a bounty; that bounties to industry are not expedient. Is this the only thing upon which you pay bounty? Is this the only interest that you seek to stimulate by your favor? What is the principle that lies at the bottom of these bounties? I have already said it is because the fisheries are essential to your commerce. You must have a commerce, and in order to have commerce you must have sailors. Sailors come from their employment. What is their employment? The fisheries. So of the Navy.

In order to support the Navy it is said that you must have skilled officers. Where are they educated? Why, sir, annually as the time comes around for appropriations you find I do not know how many thousands, perhaps $100,000, more or less, appropriated for the support of the Naval Academy. For what? Tell me, Senators who stickle on this question as a constitutional question, by what authority you ask me to vote $100,000 for the support of fifty or one hundred or two hundred boys for the Navy? Under what power of your Constitution is it done? Is there any express provision on the subject? None whatever. I suppose the framers of the Constitution and those who inaugurated this policy did not find it difficult, however, under the power to provide for the general defense, for the defense of the nation and the general welfare, to educate one hundred boys at the expense of $100,000; for what? You must have a Navy, and you must have skilled men for officers of the Navy. It is necessary, therefore, to your Navy and to your naval power, and so you make the appropriation for the Naval School. But Senators who scruple not to make that appropriation, when asked to pay $250,000 to educate thirty thousand seamen, without whom your Navy is nothing and your educated officers nothing, then have scruples, then they talk about bounties, then they talk about fostering an interest peculiar to a section.

It will be seen that the principle underlying the bill is the same, precisely the same. The authority for making an appropriation for the Navy is identical with the authority for making an appropriation to encourage and educate the sailor boy on board your fishing-smacks; and the necessity, allow me to tell the Senator from Kentucky, is the same. If you can afford to spare anybody, you can the officer. You had better withdraw your support from the Naval Academy to-day than to refuse this appropriation.

Then, sir, in regard to the Academy at West Point, on what principle do you maintain it? Is not the principle the same? Where in the Constitution can you show me the authority for an appropriation of $250,000 to educate a few boys at West Point? It is said we must have an army. What has this to do with an army? It is to educate the officers. Very well. I have always voted for it; I am not arguing against it now; but the principle which authorizes you to make that appropriation to educate those young men is the principle which lies at the foundation of this policy of bounties precisely, and, I repeat again, the necessity for the one is the necessity for the other.

So, Mr. President, to whatever department of the Government you look, you find that the principle upon which these bounties were inaugurated in the early period of the Government, and have been uniformly and persistently maintained ever since, prevails in regard to the subjects I have mentioned; and the reason applies in this case, and the same necessity exists.

But, sir, I feel obliged to notice another fact, which I cannot but observe here in the Senate, and which I attribute not to any disposition or willingness to injure this great national interest, but I have sometimes thought that it was not unfair to attribute it to a want of attention to this subject: I find Senators here declaring their purpose to vote against these fishing bounties, as they are a bounty to a local industry or a local interest, who feel no compunctions in voting millions upon millions for interests that are entirely and exclusively local. What is our history on this subject? Let us see; let us state an account current to-day, if you please, with the Senators who vote for local appropriations, and who shrink from voting an appropriation for these bounties. I take it for granted that there are some subjects in this country to be encouraged. I take it for granted there are certain subjects that it is the interest and the duty of the nation to encourage. What are they? Let us see. How many million dollars have we voted for railroads in the West? It is very seldom that I see any of my western brethren wince on a question of that kind, and I have the honor of informing them that among those who have been foremost on this subject, I have been neck and neck with them. I have always voted for those grants. Do Senators know the amount of appropriations that have gone out from the Government of the United States to build roads that are entirely local—no pretense of nationality whatever except in a sense I will mention by and by? Within the last fifty years more than fifty-five million acres of lands have been given to the States for local railroads, roads beginning in the State and ending in the State. On what grounds do we justify that? Will not some Senator who has conscientious scruples about this question be kind enough to put his finger on that clause of the Constitution which authorizes this Government to vote away its lands, give its lands to an enterprise that is entirely local, to build a railroad in a State over which the Congress of the United States is to have no jurisdiction and no control whatever? It is explainable, I do not deny, to my own satisfaction at least, and I have always voted for it accordingly.

It is on the ground that we have a right to do what is conceived to be for the general welfare, to contribute to the general well-being; and these railroads contribute to the general welfare in two particulars. In the first place, they serve to enhance the value of our own lands, and so contribute to the general welfare. Inasmuch as they are enhanced, to that extent the interest of the country is advanced. That is one particular. The other is that they stimulate industry and promote the settlement of those local States. "Well," says the objector, "what has that to do with nationality? What has the growth of Wisconsin or Minnesota to do with the great nation? Let Minnesota and Wisconsin take care of themselves; the nation has enough to do to take care of itself." But what is the nation, sir? The nation is made up of these communities and the like; and just as these communities are prosperous and successful so is the nation grand, great, and glorious; and in that sense we vote these bills for railroads; in that sense in the last few years we have voted fifty-five million acres to these communities of the West, who send their representatives here; and some of them, I am very sorry to say, when a question of this kind comes up, when the fisheries are mentioned, turn up their faces as if they were really afraid to encounter it, as if it was not purely national, as if it were of a section—sectional and not national.

There are some other subjects upon which I touch only by way of illustration, and only by way of showing that there is an undue sensitiveness on this question. In my country one of the prime objects of government, one of the first duties of the State is the education of the children. I will not stand here to say—certainly in no sense invidiously—that the system is peculiar to New England, but it prevails in New England, and it prevailed at an early day; the State educated the child; but look through the length and breadth of the Constitution, and you will find no obligation on the national Government to educate children; it is left to the States entirely; and the New England system of education rests on the States, not the nation. Yet what do you find? You will find that within the last fifty years this Government has donated to the new States more than one hundred million acres of land—for what? To endow schools, to found your systems of common schools. My honorable friend from Minnesota—I wish he was here—[Mr. WILKINSON] the other day expressed his willingness to vote down these bounties; forgetting that by the bounty of this Government—I speak it in no offensive sense; I am proud of it—Minnesota to-day is so endowed that she can educate every child in the State on the bounty of the Government. It is a wise provision; I would not wish it otherwise; I rejoice that it is so; but when they are called upon to vote a little penny bounty to stimulate a great national industry in which at least thirty thousand men are engaged and $12,000,000 worth of shipping employed, men reaping a somewhat precarious livelihood, I beg Senators who occupy such positions toward the Government, and who are sharing of its bounty in that way, not to look with a sour aspect on this long-cherished interest of the country, even though in some sense it is of New England.

There are other points on which I might touch, in the same direction, illustrating this whole question, showing that this bounty to this New England interest is not peculiar to New England; that while the nation has been wise in providing for this great national interest, it has not been laggard in looking after the local interests of other sections of the country; and I think if honorable Senators will look at this question in that light they will see that there is little occasion to complain of New England that she is sharing a bounty from the fisheries. I do not deny that it is the interest of New England; I do not deny that I feel the deepest solicitude on this subject, as it is somewhat peculiar to New England; but I rest the argument, as I address it to Senators, on the fact that while it is peculiar to New England, it is national in the highest sense, and it is upon that aspect of the case that I ask your judgments and your votes.

As I am obliged, Mr. President, in no invidious sense I beg to be believed, to make these statements, to look at these current events in American history by way of vindicating New England from what I understood to be the position in which she was attempted to be placed, you must bear with me while I run the comparison one step further; and I ask Senators if they can afford to do what is proposed just at this time. I ask Senators who mean to prosecute this war with vigor and to the end, I ask Senators who want all our resources and want to stimulate all the energies of the country to the utmost tension, if they can afford to do this. If you look, Senators, to the burdens which New England bears to-day, I am inclined to think you will agree with me that she ought not to be an object of your envy. Looking to the revenue bill under which we have been collecting the revenues of the last year, I find that New England with a population of a fraction over three millions, and a territory which could all be crowded into Virginia, pays a fraction over eight million dollars under that revenue bill. I find by running the comparison that eight western and northwestern and two Pacific States, making ten, and six Territories, paid only a fraction more. I do not complain of it. But when you are collecting revenues of New England, when her property is so situated and her industry is so situated that it becomes necessary that she should pay in that proportion, I ask Senators if this is the time to strike at interests which she thinks vital and which thus contribute to the national burden, and she thinks vital not only to herself but to the nation at large.

And now, for the benefit of the Senator from Kentucky, who takes so deep a solicitude on this question, I would like to run a comparison between Massachusetts and Kentucky as to what they are doing in sustaining the nation in this great struggle. I do it in no spirit of hostility to that State. Massachusetts has a population in the aggregate of 1,232,000 according to the last census; Kentucky, 1,065,000. Massachusetts has assessed on her, to be paid into the Treasury of the United States to carry on this war, $7,370,000;

Kentucky, $1,730,000; and the honorable Senator from Kentucky thinks this is the time to strike Massachusetts in the face! Massachusetts on her income paid $1,628,000; Kentucky paid $408,845. While Massachusetts is thus giving of her treasure to defend the nation, the honorable Senator from Kentucky thinks it an opportune moment to strike at this interest so cherished and so long one of her material and essential interests. New England was assessed for property $16,412,988, and she has paid pretty much the whole of it; and the ten other States and six Territories to which I have referred were assessed $19,326,246. When it is recollected that the latter have a population of some ten millions, and New England a population of a fraction over three millions, and all crowded into a little sterile patch of earth, I submit whether this is the time and the occasion for crippling her in her interests and rendering her less able to perform her duty to the Union. Massachusetts has paid into the Treasury of the United States $10,048,592; Kentucky, $2,416,523, leaving the balance against Kentucky $7,622,069; and with that balance against the Senator, with a population nearly equal, with a territory three times as large, he thinks it is worth while to stand here in the Senate and badger New England, and talk about New England interests as if they were entirely separate and apart from the national interests.

I have some statistics here in regard to the commerce of these States, in regard to the commerce of the country, and the navigation of the country. Of this great commerce, which is the glory of the nation, does the honorable Senator from Kentucky ever stop to reflect how large a portion of it belongs to New England? Of all the ships built in this nation, the little State I have the honor in part to represent builds one half of them annually; and when Senators reflect upon that and what proportion of her people are engaged in the fisheries, they will see at once how sensitive her people must be on this question. And if it really had not the national importance which I attribute to it, I submit whether Senators would not, especially if they will run down the parallels which I have instituted here to-day, be a little chary in times like these of prosecuting a measure which must be so detrimental to this great interest. But, sir, I am persuaded that the Senate is so well informed on this question of the comparative importance of the commerce of the country that I do not feel justified in trespassing longer on its patience. Therefore I take my seat.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, there is only a single feature of the remarks just made by the Senator from Maine to which I feel called upon to reply. I have not had the pleasure of hearing the whole scope of his argument, and I am inclined to feel as if I wished I had heard the part I did not hear, and had not heard the part which I did hear. So far as the Senator from Maine or any other Senator is able to defend the payment of this bounty which I understand is under discussion, upon the ground of national necessity or upon any other principle whatever, I am disposed to listen and to conform to his views. That it may not be defended upon such grounds, I am not here to deny. I have always voted for the fishing bounties; I am not prepared to say that I shall not always continue to vote for them. I believe New England has enjoyed them for over forty years; and that certainly bars an ejection, and I believe it also bars a writ of right. It is going to be, I concede, a difficult matter to dispossess her.

Mr. DAVIS. She took an annual lease of them.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, it may have been renewed from year to year; but repeatedly since I have had the honor of a seat on this floor, whenever a draft was intended on the Treasury for any specific purpose which the friends of the measure felt they could not defend upon principle, it has been my misfortune to hear the West arraigned as being indebted to the East, as having something to pay, and bound to go for it, principle or no principle, upon the score of personal or local obligation; and it is to that part of the Senator's remarks that I beg leave to submit a few words of reply.

Now, sir, I deny the indebtedness altogether; I plead the general issue; we do not owe you a dime.

Mr. MORRILL. The honorable Senator did not understand me to put the question in that way, I hope.

Mr. HOWE. I did understand the Senator to put it in that way exactly.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg to disclaim intending any such thing. I did not intend any such thing; the furthest from it possible.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator might have been entirely unconscious that he was trying to make out a case of indebtedness; but after all he did state the account so specifically, and went into the items so fully, that I thought I must either repudiate or acknowledge the indebtedness. He calls to mind the millions of acres of land Congress has granted for local purposes in building up the Northwest; and that is one item, and one very considerable item, in the account which he states against us. I admit that you have granted a great many acres of land to build railroads, but you have done it upon two grounds: first, because you wanted to improve your own lands, and therefore you have provided for building the most popular of all known highways through them, taking care, however, that the exact value of the lands you gave away you assessed upon the lands you retained. When you gave away an acre of land worth ten shillings you put upon the adjoining quarter section of land twenty shillings.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my friend give way for a moment to me to make a motion?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that at half past four o'clock to-day the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

Mr. SUMNER. Had we not better go on a couple of hours?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have been consulted with in several directions, and it seems to be the opinion that we should have a session this evening.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. Then, Mr. President, when the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] undertakes to say you have been giving the lands to the Northwest he is under a mistake. You have been selling them; you have been appropriating them to the building of these highways, one half of them that you might get the other half improved; and you have been governed by another consideration. You are manufacturing in the East very largely, and you must get the bread to feed your operatives somewhere. We are raising that bread for you; but we found it difficult to get to market with it, and it came to you charged with pretty high prices, and you wanted to enable us to get to market cheaper, to get our products at a lower price, and so you felt an interest in the building of every one of those roads, and every one of those roads is but a highway to your own markets and to your own doors, over which we bring the bread and the meat that you consume yearly. That is another reason which has governed the Congress of the United States in making these grants. Thus I dispose of that charge against the Northwest with these two reflections.

The Senator charges us also with the amount of lands that the Congress of the United States has donated to the several western Territories for the purposes of education, and that is another item of the indebtedness. If it is a debt at all, unquestionably it is a very considerable one; but how is the fact? When you had untold millions and unsurveyed millions there, you felt that you were in the position of a man who had an elephant. You had property which you did not know what to do with, and you wanted men to go out and cultivate it. You found that you had something to do to encourage them to go. You proposed to give one section in each township for educational purposes. With that poor encouragement, the emigration of the East and the emigration of the world has gone out there; and what have you got to-day in return for it? You have got an empire in return for these donations. You think this is a display of great liberality. Mr. President, building towns is a very common business out there in the Northwest, and no proprietor ever undertook to build up a town on any harbor there, or at the confluence of any two rivers, that did not exhibit more liberality toward the early settlers on his town-plot than the Government of the United States has exhibited to build up those great States which now nestle about the lakes; and he never thought that he was out of pocket in doing so; he found his account in it. If you are not satisfied, let me say to the Senate, with the returns you have got for this donation of a section of land out of every township, if you are not satisfied with the return that is made, if you would rather depopulate those States and get back your sixteenth section in every township, I think you would make a mistake; but if you really think the balance of trade is still against us, I wish to have the account settled, and, as I said here once before, I believe we are prepared to pay the balance in money. I do not want to be twitted with it every time these questions come up.

Another item of the indebtedness is that New England is paying a much larger share of the revenues required now by the necessities of the Government than the northwestern States. I suppose I know how the Senator procured his figures. I suppose he procured them by looking at the returns from the different States and ascertaining how much was collected within those States; and he assumes that whatever is collected in Massachusetts is paid by the people of Massachusetts, and whatever is collected in Wisconsin is paid by the people of Wisconsin. That is a very unjust way of stating the account. Setting aside the amount of tax you pay on incomes, as a rule we in Wisconsin pay what is collected in Massachusetts, and as a rule you will allow me to say that you in Massachusetts pay what is collected in Wisconsin. Why? Because we assess upon you a percentage on your manufactures, which we buy and pay to you, and pay a large commission, and thus we pay eventually what is collected in Massachusetts, and you pay in Massachusetts what is collected in Wisconsin; and why? Because it is collected from the distillers in Wisconsin, the distillers of whisky; that is about the only article we make to sell to the East, and as we do not drink that out there ourselves, it is consumed, I suppose, in Massachusetts or elsewhere in the East. Thus it is charged over upon the eastern States. So the Senator's method of stating this account is not a just one.

Now, I want to say once more that we have no complaint to make of the policy of the General Government as it bears on the States of the Northwest. Whenever we have asked for any legislation, we have asked for it upon national and upon public grounds, and I am very certain that whenever it has been obtained by us it has been granted upon those grounds; and I would not have said a word in this debate but for the fact that, repeated I think as many as a dozen times during this very session, I have heard these obligations supposed to exist on our part urged here in defense of some legislation which it was supposed we were otherwise hostile to. I do not want to hear it again. As I said before, I do not believe in the obligation, I do not believe in the indebtedness. Whenever you have legislated in reference to us, you have adopted such legislation as you supposed the public interests demanded and warranted, and no other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By a vote of the Senate, the Senate will now take a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

PETITION.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition from women employed as clerks in the dead letter office at the Post Office asking for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 469) extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan—to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (No. 487) to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations, respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

A joint resolution (No. 83) authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio to East Tennessee—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

VETO POWER IN WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. WADE. I wish to make an explanation. When Senate bill No. 285, to regulate the veto power in the Territory of Washington was under consideration, I was asked by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] whether the people of the Territory requested that the Governor should be clothed with this veto power. I informed him that by a telegraphic dispatch the Governor and several of the executive officers of the Territory had asked for it. I am also reported as using this language:

"The Delegate from that Territory says so. He says that a great many transient people get into the Legislature without much responsibility, and that they are burdening the people there with taxation, and he thinks the Governor should have this power to counteract their influence."

I believe I made use of language like that. It was under these circumstances: the gentleman who handed me the papers stated at the time that he wished I would present the bill and the papers in the Senate, because the House committee requested him to hand them over to me, telling him they wished the bill to be passed, and that they could not introduce it so well as we could in this body. I therefore took the papers and inquired of him the reasons why the people wanted the veto power conferred upon the Governor, not being very much in favor of that power myself, and he informed me about the same as I stated in the language I have read, as near as I can recollect. He stated there were transient persons coming into the Territory and going out, and they got into the Legislature, and they had but little responsibility, and they passed laws without much consideration and burdened the people with taxation, and therefore it was necessary that the Governor should have this power. I supposed that gentleman to be the Delegate from Washington Territory; but it seems I was mistaken. The Delegate has written to me saying that he is not the person; that he did not utter these sentiments, and therefore I am bound to believe that it was not the Delegate that came to us. I do not know him personally. I did not ask the person who came to me who he was; but I took it for granted that he was the Delegate. I do not really know who he was; but the gentleman who handed me the papers made these remarks. In justice to the Delegate I make this statement, because he would not like to have these remarks put into his mouth. He says, in a communication to me, that he is opposed to the granting of this veto power.

WILLIAM WHEELER HUBBELL.

Mr. RAMSEY. Will it be in order to move to take up a bill or joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not without postponing the tax bill, which is the business regularly before the Senate, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GRIMES. What is the bill?

Mr. RAMSEY. It is a joint resolution which has passed the House of Representatives unanimously, and been unanimously reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate; it is a small matter. It is House joint resolution No. 51, relative to the claim and letters patent of William Wheeler Hubbell.

Mr. GRIMES. I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being interposed, the motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. RAMSEY subsequently said: I move to postpone all previous orders, and proceed to the consideration of the resolution I indicated before. The Senator from Iowa, after looking at the resolution, withdraws his opposition to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 51) relative to the claim and letters patent of William Wheeler Hubbell. William Wheeler Hubbell claims compensation for the use of his patent for the thunderbolt shell and fuse, which he claims were patented by him, and have been used by the Government, under a verbal contract, as he alleges, between him and the late George Bomford, colonel of ordnance of the United States, and for the use of his patent percussion apparatus for exploding shells, the letters patent for which are dated January 22, 1856, reissued January 19, 1858, for fourteen years for the shell, January 7, 1862, for seventeen years for the fuse, and January 24, 1860, for fourteen years for the percussion device. As the testimony in support of the claim submitted with the patents, and especially with regard to its validity and the verbal contract mentioned, is very voluminous, and the shells and fuses in the service, which Hubbell claims, are made and used in great numbers by the Government, and the committee feel that they have neither the time nor means for procuring witnesses and giving the case the careful legal investigation which its importance demands, the resolution therefore proposes to refer the claim to the Court of Claims, which is vested with jurisdiction, and whose duty it is to investigate and determine, first, is William Wheeler Hubbell the original inventor of the shell and fuse and percussion device aforesaid, or either of them, and has he a just and equitable right to compensation for the same; and second, what amount of compensation is he entitled to receive for the use of his inventions and patents, as claimed, up to the time of adjudication, and for a full and entire transfer of his patents to the United States. Either party may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States within ninety days, and the Court of Claims is to certify any judgment that may be rendered in favor of Hubbell, his heirs, or legal representatives in the same manner, and when presented to the Secretary of the Treasury it is to have the same effect as now provided by law, and be paid out of any general appropriation in relation to judgments of the court, or for private claims; but the sum hereby authorized to be paid is not to exceed $100,000, which sum the claimant agrees to accept in full of all claims whatever by virtue of his patents and contract against the Government. And the payment of such judgment is to vest the full and absolute right to the patents in the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IDA HOFFMAN.

Mr. FOSTER. I have a little bill from the Committee on Pensions in favor of the widow of a man who was killed in attempting to arrest a deserter, that I believe would not be objected to. I will move, at all events, to take it up. It is Senate bill No. 289, for the relief of Ida Hoffman.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Ida Hoffman, widow of the late Solomon Hoffman, of Carroll county, Indiana, who was shot and instantly killed on the 14th of March, 1863, while engaged in the performance of the duties of deputy provost marshal, on the roll of pensioners, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence from the 14th of March, 1863, and to continue during her widowhood.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RHODA WOLCOTT.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There is another little pension bill on the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Pensions, which I move to take up. It is House bill No. 290, for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to issue to Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, deceased, who was a private in the company of "New York United States detached militia," of the regiment commanded by Colonel Thomas B. Benedict, a certificate of pension, which shall grant to the said Rhoda Wolcott a pension of four dollars per month, commencing on the 24th day of December, 1812, the time of the decease of said Henry Wolcott, and to continue during the natural life of the said Rhoda Wolcott: Provided, however, That in the event of the marriage or death of the said Rhoda Wolcott, the said pension shall cease: Also provided, That all pledges or mortgages of the said pension shall be void, and that the said pension shall inure solely to the use and benefit of the said Rhoda Wolcott.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, who was a private in a company of New York United States detached militia, of the regiment commanded by Colonel Thomas B. Benedict, in the war of 1812, on the pension roll, at the rate of four dollars per month, said pension to begin on the 1st day of January, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Pennsylvania why the committee recommend that this pension shall date back to 1861. That is contrary to the practice of the Senate hitherto, or what used to be the practice when I was a member of that committee.

Mr. BUCKALEW. It is because the proof of the case in the Pension Office was made complete on that day.

Mr. GRIMES. But it seems to me that there is no proof, or else there would not be any necessity of appealing to Congress. If they could appeal to the Commissioner of Pensions and submit the proper proof to him, the pension would date from the time the proof was completed; but it seems that—

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Senator is mistaken. The law has been changed within a few years, so that a pension commences now from the time the proof is filed, whether it is complete or not. That is the law passed a few years ago.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not know when that change was made; but our rule in the last Congress, or the last Congress but one when I served on the Committee on Pensions, was that the pension should only commence from the time the papers were filed here and the proof was completed. That was the rule upon which the Senate always acted.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have not the papers here, but the case is not a doubtful one.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

FRIENDLESS WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senate do not wish to act on the tax bill at this moment, I should like to call up a small bill that will not take more than five minutes. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 383.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 883) to incorporate the Home for Friendless Women and Children.

The Committee on the District of Columbia reported the bill with various amendments. The first amendment was to strike out from the list of incorporators the following persons: Jane Ashton Alexander, Anne E. Husted, Susan Schiemer, Malvina Tolson, Mary E. French, Elmira White, Myra Grace Ruggles, Elizabeth E. Holmead, Eliza Dorsey, Hannah Holmead, Sallic E. Cooper, Ellie R. Cooper, Margaret F. Calvert, Anna H. Eastman, Mary Thomas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the third section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a board of fifteen female managers, to be selected from the various religious denominations of the city of Washington, or District of Columbia, to conduct the business of the corporation, for the purposes aforesaid, in such manner as shall be prescribed by its constitution or by-laws, as the same may be adopted or altered from time to time: Provided, That nothing in said constitution or by-laws shall be inconsistent with any law of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section four, lines four, five, and six, to strike out the following words: "and six other ladies to be selected from the members of such association by the ladies named;" so that it will read:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That Mary T. Hay, Eliza M. Morris, Eliza Wade Fitzgerald, Georgiana Sparks, Emily B. Ruggles, Indiana Plant, Jane F. James, Mary Graham, Maria Virginia Brown, shall constitute the board of managers, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section six, line sixteen, after the word "Columbia" to strike out the words "and the board of counselors created by this act;" so that the clause will read:

The said board of managers may, in their discretion, place such child to service with some proper person under articles of indenture, to be executed in due form of law, with such provisions for maintenance and education as shall be approved by one of the judges of the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert at the end of section seven the following proviso:

Provided, That no surrender of any such child shall be made under the provisions of this section, unless such surrender shall, on examination, be approved by one of the judges of the supreme court of said District.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section eight, in the following words:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That there shall be a board of counselors for said corporation, consisting of seven gentlemen, citizens or residents of the District of Columbia, four of whom shall, on and after the first Monday of May, A. D. 1865, be elected annually at the meeting of the associates for the election of managers; and that the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the mayor of the city of Washington shall, ex officio, be managers of such board from and after the passage of this act; and the managers of the board shall, as early as practicable after their organization, elect by ballot four gentlemen as members of said board, to hold office until the first Monday of May, A. D. 1865, and till their successors shall be chosen. It shall be the duty of this board of commissioners to advise the board of managers, from time to time, in regard to the interests of the association, and for the promotion of the objects thereof. Four members of the board of counselors shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business; and no purchase of real estate shall be made, and no lease, sale, or mortgage of real estate shall be executed by or to said corporation without the approval of a majority of the board of counselors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section nine, line four, to strike out the words "the board of counselors;" after the word "treasurer;" so that it will read:

That the board of managers may elect from their own number a president, vice president, and secretary; and they may further elect a treasurer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out section ten, as follows:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That no manager nor member of the board of counselors shall receive or charge any compensation for any services rendered to the institution or corporation by virtue of her or his office in either board: Provided, however, That the treasurer of the corporation may receive such reasonable salary or compensation for assuming and discharging the duties of the office as shall be determined by the concurrent resolution of the board of managers and the board of counselors to be just.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read the third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. DAVIS. I will inquire of the Senator who reported the bill if the corporators are all white persons.

Mr. GRIMES. I can inform the Senator that they are white; at least they were when last heard from. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. That satisfies me.

The bill was passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. POMEROY. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. POWELL to repeal the fishing bounties.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, I had no idea when I offered the amendment to this bill, the object of which is to repeal the bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the cod and other Bank fisheries, that I should throw the very able Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] into such a rage. The Senator has exhibited wonderful temper. He discussed the question with a hot and earnest zeal that in my judgment but little comports with that steady and cool temper that characterizes the people of the section from which he comes. In my reply to the honorable Senator I shall not follow him in his hot zeal. I will take the matter very coolly, and state to the Senate very calmly the reasons I have for striving to repeal the law indicated in the amendment that I propose.

The Senator very adroitly tries to avoid the true issue. He takes a tilt at creation generally. He runs a tilt at me and at my colleague, and then at the whole Northwest. He vindicates New England with great zeal from charges that have never been made against that people. He charges some with having changed their notions about New England; he charges others with having hatred to New England all the while. The Senator will get me off on none of those issues. It is not my purpose to say anything specially against New England or anybody else in this discussion. I have no hatred toward New England or any part of her people—none at all.

He quotes from a speech that I made in which I spoke of New England, attributing to them a characteristic that I did not think the honorable Senator would deny: that they were fond of thrift and gain. I made that charge in no ill-temper, although I confess when I made it I was somewhat excited, for my State had been heavily assailed by three honorable Senators from New England; but if I wanted any evidence to establish the fact beyond doubt that our New England friends were fond of thrift and gain, I should want nothing more to prove it than the Senator's zeal to save to his people these little fishing bounties.

The zeal of the honorable Senator establishes the fact that our New England brethren are very tenacious, and hold with a death-like grasp to any little advantages that legislation may give any of their interests.

The Senator runs a parallel between Massachusetts and Kentucky. I am not going to take up that parallel. He says that Massachusetts pays very great taxes to the Government, and Kentucky and other western States pay very little. He says that the little New England States upon a barren soil pay more than ten other great States in the West. I dare say all that is true. I will merely say in passing to my friend that had Kentucky and the great West the bounties that his people have upon vessels engaged in this fishing business, upon their pigs, their cattle, their potatoes, their corn, and all their products, they would have untold wealth. If the people of the great valley of the Mississippi were fostered and protected in their industrial pursuits as New England is by the present tariff system, they would have untold millions of wealth. But, sir, we are the recipients of no such favors from the Government; and I do not intend, so far as I am concerned, to allow New England to be the recipient of this little bounty, as the Senator calls it, on fishing, any longer if I can possibly avoid it.

The Senator tells us that New England never surrenders. I concur with the Senator in that. New England never will surrender any privileges that odious and unjust laws take from the other people of the country and put into the coffers of her citizens if her Senators can possibly prevent it. They will never surrender any odious discrimination made by the laws in favor of their industrial pursuits. They were never known to surrender such a thing as that. But, sir, I hope that this Senate will decree that the great States of Maine and Massachusetts may be compelled to let go of these fishing bounties.

The Senator speaks of the constitutionality of this law. He speaks of the bounties that have been conferred upon the western people by railroad grants. All that has been sufficiently met by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] I am not going to enter into any of these collateral issues. The Senator, however adroit he may be, will not lead me off into any argument of that kind.

He says that the antiquity of these fishing bounties ought to shield and protect them. Why, sir, if the Senator and his constituents were less tenacious of gain, having enjoyed this immunity and privilege so long, it strikes me, in this day of trial when our people are taxed in such a manner as they can scarcely bear, they would be willing to yield it for a time, at least.

But, sir, what were the reasons for the establishment of this policy? The Senator has stated the argument, the one that I have heard stated over and over again in this Chamber whenever there is an effort made to repeal these bounties, that it is to foster the fisheries as a nursery for seamen. I think it probable at the beginning of the Government that might have been the case when we had no merchantmen afloat, or if any very few, and our mercantile marine was small. Then it might be necessary to encourage this fishing business by bounty as a nursery for the training of sailors and making expert seamen. But, sir, even before this war commenced I believe we had the largest mercantile marine in the world. That is a sufficient nursery for our seamen. You cannot navigate ships without men trained to the art and mystery of navigation. What more nursery do you want than to have the largest quantity of ships of any country in the world engaged in commerce on the ocean? Certainly you can want no more.

But, Mr. President, I believe that the principles upon which these bounties were given were wrong. I do not think a bounty should be given to any portion of the people, and those bounties be paid by taxes gathered from the other portions of the people, to encourage any branch of industry or promote any branch of industry. All the protection that I would ever give would be the incidental protection arising under our revenue laws. I would give no more.

There have been paid from the beginning of this Government something like fourteen or fifteen million dollars to the persons engaged in the fishing business as bounty. The State the honorable Senator represents so ably, and which he represented so zealously to-day, receives the larger portion of these bounties. According to my recollection of the tables I think Maine and Massachusetts receive about four fifths of them, and I think that Maine receives more than Massachusetts. That, however, is an immaterial question. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has submitted a table on the subject which exhibits the bounties that have been paid recently. I have not looked into this question since the war commenced until I glanced over the table shown me by the Senator from Ohio, but before that time I got the tables and examined them very closely; and I examined very closely the reports made on the subject. Mr. Guthrie, during the Administration of President Pierce, made a report on this subject, in which he said that about one half the money obtained was by fraud. He said he thought it more a nursery for perjury than for seamen. I think, at this time, when the country is pressed for money at every point, we should not pay something like half a million dollars annually in bounties to Massachusetts and Maine, or to the people in any part of the country.

It is not because these bounties are paid to the people of Massachusetts or Maine that I desire their repeal. If they were paid to the people of California or to the people of the West, North, or South, I would go for their repeal, because I think the principle is wrong, and the reason, if any valid reason ever did exist why those bounties should be paid, has long since ceased.

If New England has the millions of wealth of which the Senator boasts, she might well give up this little matter. While the people there are enjoying such wealth and able to pay such enormous taxes as the Senator has indicated to-day that section of the country pays, while he shows that other regions of the country are poor, I do not think, in an hour like this, wealthy as they are, it is magnanimous on their part to exact from those who are so much poorer than themselves, this tribute. But, sir, I never knew a miser to cry that he had enough. These money-sharks and money-hoarders and money-lovers grow more avaricious every day. I suppose if, through the instrumentality of high protective tariffs and high bounties upon fishing interests and protection to every other pursuit of New England, they were to quadruple their wealth, still they would be unwilling to give up any little tribute which they wrung by taxes from the hard earnings of the people of the less favored regions of the country. The very exhibition of the wealth of that region of country is an argument against the Senator, why they should be compelled, if they have not the magnanimity to do it willingly, to yield this tribute which they take from the taxes wrung from other portions of the people; yes, sir, wrung from the hand of poverty and toil.

But, Mr. President, the Senator has utterly failed to show any valid reason why the law authorizing these fishing bounties should not be repealed. The only argument that he has presented that has validity, is one that does not now exist, and that is that the fisheries are a nursery for seamen.

Sir, for the reason I have stated, that in our merchant service we employ men enough to train our sailors, that consideration if it ever did exist has no validity now; but in this our day of trial and war, judging from the tabular statement that my friend from Ohio has exhibited here, I do not think the persons engaged in this fishing business have diverted much of their labor from that pursuit. They receive now since this war about as much money from the bounties as they did before. That indicates very clearly that the people in that line of business are still engaged in it, so that these are bounties actually paid to keep men out of the Navy. The Government is giving these people a bounty absolutely to hire them to go into other pursuits, and that of itself keeps them out of the Navy; and the proof from the record is that these people have not gone much into the Navy; and why? Because you take the money of the people to hire them to stay in this business of fishing. The bounty does not tend to bring them into your Navy. By the Government giving the bounty, they are hired to go into the fishing business, and they find it more profitable in consequence of the bounty to stay out of the Navy, and they do stay out. So the whole argument of the Senator about this matter of bounties being necessary for seamen is an utter fallacy; there is nothing in it.

There is no more reason why you should pay bounties to those who are engaged in the fisheries than why you should pay the miners on the Pacific coast a bounty for digging the gold from the bowels of the earth; and indeed if I were driven to pay one a bounty and neglect the other, I would give it to the miners who are delving in the mountain sides, because we want the precious metals as a circulating medium. There is no more reason why we should pay these men bounties than why we should pay the farmers of the West bounties for raising their pigs, their sheep, or their cattle. The thing cannot be justified upon any principle. It is absolutely giving up the money of the people to foster a particular interest, without receiving any adequate return, and the astonishment to me has been that this law has so long remained upon the statute-book.

But the Senator said it was not repealed when those were in power with whom I act politically. I can tell the Senator that a bill for the repeal of the law, I think, passed the Senate more than once, but it was lost in a conflict between the two Houses; but if we get it through here now I do not think it will be lost; we shall get it in perhaps the very best place in the world to insure its final passage, and that is on this enormous tax bill. Many Senators differ from me about the tax bill. They say the people want to be taxed, that their patriotic hearts are calling for taxation everywhere. That may be, but I do not think my people want to be taxed. If we get this provision on this bill I think it will be certain to become a law, and then we shall be clear of this system of bounties forever.

It was not my intention to make a speech of any length on the subject, and I have really said about all that I intended to say. The Senator cannot get me into any controversy about monopolies or favors shown to the West in regard to their railroads. I can very easily show that it was no detriment to the public to give those western States land to make railroads, because we gave them alternate sections, and the Government got double price for the sections not appropriated to the railways; yet I have not been a special advocate of those railway grants. And then, as the Senator from Wisconsin very well observed, everybody knows that the people of New England, a manufacturing people, do not raise enough to eat up there. From the statistics I saw a year ago made by a very learned gentleman by the name of Ruggles, it is very clear that New England consumes in three months all the wheat she raises in a year. She has to have railways and water communications to carry the grain from other parts of the Union to feed her people. It is to her interest as well as the interest of the farmers of the West to have those communications made. There can be no doubt about that.

But, Mr. President, I should like very much if Senators when they enter into this argument would meet the question as it is, that they would show the real benefits to result to the country from the imposition of this annual burden upon the people, that they would give us some good reason for it, that they would tell us something else than that it has been sanctified by time. Having enjoyed this immunity and drawn this money from the hard earnings of the people pretty nearly from the organization of the Government, they are now loth to let it go. They have grown rich by means of these and other bounties and privileges that they have received by the sanction of the law, and they ought to be contented when they have grown rich and can flaunt their wealth in the faces of other States to let this "pittance" alone, and perhaps after a while, if you take away the protection and the bounties you bestow on their labor, other portions of the country may grow as rich as they. We do not envy New England her wealth, but we do desire that her wealth shall not be increased by an imposition of an unjust tax upon the rest of the people. That is the point we make. This is a benefit that is conferred upon New England alone. The Senator from Maine says it is national, and he speaks with wonderful vehemence and volubility about its nationality. There is no nationality about it. We want no such nurseries for seamen. Having floated more ships in the merchant service than any other nation on the earth, independent of the Navy that we have in the public service, that is a nursery sufficient. And, sir, if you give this tribute and these bounties to men to stay in the fishing business you will have to give very high bounties to lure them into your naval service. There is no good or valid reason why the people should be taxed to support this interest any longer.

I know that when persons enjoy a privilege of this kind for a long time they begin to think and they imagine it is absolutely right, and they make a great noise when you take it away from them. It is so with all animals. Every old farmer knows that when you attempt to wean a calf that is allowed to suck till he is a year and a half or two years old he makes a great deal of fuss; you can hear him bellow all over the plantation—not that I am comparing any of these gentlemen to an animal of that kind. I do not do that; but they have had it so long that if you wean them from it now they make a terrible noise over it. They have had it so long that they think they are absolutely entitled to it. In my judgment they never were entitled to it. If there ever was a reason for it, as I before stated, that reason has long since ceased. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate in discussing this question any further. I think I have stated reasons sufficient why the amendment I have proposed should prevail; and I hope it may be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to say a very few words, Mr. President, on this subject, because it becomes my duty from the relation which I bear to the section of country the interests of some of whose people are affected by the amendment now before the Senate. I shall not follow or attempt to follow the Senator from Kentucky in what he has said in regard to the prosperity of New England having been fostered by legislation. A very small part, comparatively, of the prosperity of New England depends upon the fisheries; and in regard to its other prosperity, I suppose everybody knows pretty well that up to the breaking out of this war the prosperity of New England could in no manner be imputed to any protection that her manufactures or any part of her industry had received for a long series of years, for the legislation of Congress had been directed entirely the other way, and had been carried to the extent of reducing the duties on imports down to the very lowest possible point consistent with paying the expenses of Government. Certain gentlemen who were afraid that a tariff would encourage manufactures, actually reduced the duties, so as to bring the receipts below the expenditures of the Government, and they were compelled in a time of profound peace to borrow money and run the country in debt some twenty or thirty million dollars on Treasury notes in a single year. That was the policy of the section of country a part of which the honorable Senator from Kentucky now represents. Although our expenses were then at the lowest possible point the tariff was reduced so low (we depending entirely upon customs) that under the two Administrations which preceded this the revenue was found entirely insufficient in a time of profound peace to pay even the moderate expenses of the Government at that period.

So, sir, the Senator is entirely mistaken in imputing the prosperity of New England or of the North, so to call it, in any degree to the legislation of the country. It was prosperous in spite of the legislation of the country; and while it continues to be what it is, and the men there continue to be what they are, it will prosper in spite of the legislation of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was prosperous commercially before the tariff system.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir, before the tariff system was introduced, New England was prosperous. She protested against that system; it was introduced against her wishes; she conformed to it and prospered; and then the policy of the Government was changed, and an effort was made to run her down. The legislation of the country was directed first against her commerce, and when she turned her attention to manufactures then against her manufactures. It failed both times and always will; the legislation of the country will fail in any ordinary time to do any such thing. Why? Because we have intelligence; we have the power to labor; we have something to work upon; we have will; we can work, and we do work. That is the simple secret of it, and I have no doubt that my friends all around me from all sections of the country are very glad to hear it, and probably they believed it before, for I do not think there is any particular ill feeling on the part of one section of the country against another. There are individuals in all sections who are mean enough to be local and personal and to envy their neighbors when they see them prosper; but those individuals are few, and they form exceptions to the general rule.

Now, sir, this question is a very simple one, and I propose to state it and leave it there. The Senator from Kentucky says that there is no doubt about it; that nothing can be said on the other side; that no reason exists for these bounties; and therefore it is a plain matter. I have heard that said before; it has been repeated over and over again from the foundation of the Government, and always unsuccessfully, up to the present time. The grounds on which these bounties were first given are very evident. The fishing interest is and always will be a poor interest; that is to say, an interest carried on by a poor class of people; it is in its nature hard; it is necessarily precarious, not leading to wealth, hardly to a bare sustenance, and attended with great exposure and great danger; and yet upon the seacoast, near where fish abound, it will always be found that a certain class of adventurous persons will engage in that pursuit, sometimes from the love of adventure, the love of the excitement of the thing itself, sometimes from education and tradition; various motives of that kind enter into it. That has been the case upon the coast of New England.

Government took that into consideration in early times; they looked at the thing as it stood. It had been the policy of England, and it is to this day, to give high bounties to encourage fishing upon these very shores. They own a large share of the provinces where are the very best fishing grounds, and they deem it of importance to their national power and their national wealth to encourage the business, to support and sustain it. So it is with the French, who own two of the best fishing stations on that coast. They also give very high bounties, for the simple reason that they think it has a very important and powerful effect in building up their marine to have as large a class of men as possible engaged in this most adventurous and dangerous pursuit. It is a fact well known that there is no navigation in the world that is equal in its dangers to the fishing upon these coasts. Liable to sudden storms, the greatest nautical skill, the greatest courage, and the greatest carelessness as to exposure are required; and these qualities are found there. The numerous shipwrecks and losses, the destruction that occurs every year in this pursuit, have proved that most abundantly. There is no dispute about it. Yet these men remain poor. They make, as was said in the last war with Great Britain, the very best sailors in the world. They are hardy, adventurous, bold, among the very bravest men that can be found exposed to the perils of the sea. Senators are probably aware that the Constitution, which won so much glory for us in the last war with Great Britain, was manned almost exclusively by Marblehead sailors picked up on a sudden emergency, a call made, a crew found out of the fishermen, and they navigated that vessel and fought the battles which she won. There are numerous other instances, not so striking as that, perhaps, but almost equally remarkable in our history.

Mr. FOSTER. Commodore Hull had been a fisherman himself when a boy.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir. It was deemed, for these reasons, by those who went before us, the men of the Revolution and the men who succeeded to the Revolution, wise men as they were considered in their day, Mr. Jefferson being one of the leading men and the first to recommend the system of which we speak—not so wise, to be sure, as we are; of course they cannot be considered so, [laughter;] not so familiar with what is for the good of the nation as the men of the present day, judging from the estimate which we seem to have of ourselves, but in the eyes of others perhaps quite equal to us in statesmanship and wisdom—they thought it was best for them, in a country like this, to build up such a class of men, to encourage them, to sustain them, and to have them always ready at call; and it has been found even in this war that we have drawn a large number of men from that very source to navigate our vessels of war. Many of our best shipmasters, men who are now serving in the Navy as masters, and masters' mates, and ensigns, are men that were educated in these very fisheries, and they have done much of what has been done in achieving the successes we have had in the Navy.

There was one other ground which seemed to our ancestors a matter of justice. We had in those times pretty heavy duties on salt, and we exported a good deal of fish. We have pretty much lost the foreign market now, I understand, owing to causes which are obvious to everybody at present. In the first place, I believe a drawback was given for the salt duties; but it was found very difficult to ascertain precisely what that was. As the salt duties went down that ground failed, and the argument was on the part of Colonel Benton and some others, that there being no duties on salt there was no occasion for the bounties. The bounties took the place of the drawback precisely. Instead of giving a drawback, the Government simply gave a bounty on the tonnage with a view to cover this loss. Now look at how we stand, because the events of a nation sometimes return upon it. We are now in war and want sailors; we are now in war and want money; and we impose very heavy duties on salt. I am informed, and looking into the duties as they stand, I presume it to be true—the estimate has been made by one of the collectors in our State—that we pay thirty-three cents duty on the salt that is used in every quintal of fish, which is one hundred and twelve pounds. Now see the disadvantages under which this poor class of men labor. The best fisheries are right at the doors of the English; they are on their own shores. We have a right by the reciprocity treaty to go there. They have all the advantages of curing their fish on their own soil. We have to navigate to a very considerable distance away from home to enter into competition with them. They have always received much larger bounties than have been paid by this Government. They pay no duty on their salt. Thus the difference is so great that our men lately, as I am informed, have been in the habit of curing their fish there because they get their salt cheaper, and then bringing their fish home; but at this very session we have passed a law making them pay the duty on the salt that they bring home in the shape of cured fish. Then we have taken away that benefit from them. These fishermen stand, therefore, exposed to these disadvantages. The fishing of France and England is at the door of their colonies on their own shores; they have no duties to pay on their salt when they cure their fish; and we have heavy duties to pay. The result of all that is that they have driven us out of foreign markets.

Now, look a little further. We have made a reciprocity treaty with Great Britain. By that we admit their fish duty free into our own markets to compete with us. Our fishermen must go all that distance to catch their fish and bring them home at these disadvantages, and at a very much lower rate of bounty than is paid by the French and English Governments; when they bring them home to our own markets they pay thirty-three cents a quintal duty on the salt put into them, while the people in the British provinces take the fish at their own doors, bring them into our markets without any duty, under the reciprocity treaty, and drive us out of our own market; and you propose, in addition to all that, to repeal the small bounty that is paid.

If it is thought advisable to break down this interest entirely, to drive these men off the ocean, to say that the policy which Great Britain and France deemed to be a wise one in reference to their own fisheries and their own nurseries for seamen, is no policy for us, that we do not need it and that therefore we will drive them out entirely, let the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives of the United States so decide. For my own part I am not convinced that it would be a wise policy even in time of war. The argument is that we ought to save this money. It has been decided over and over again here with reference to other interests that the time has not yet come in this country when, even if it is a time of war, we cannot sustain interests that are important and valuable in regard to keeping the country in its present position. If the rule and argument applied to all other interests is not to be applied here, so be it.

Senators, I do not stand here to beg money for New England. I do not ask it even for the poorest class of our community, which is the fishermen. If you think they are of no value to the country, if you think this interest is of no value to the country in any shape or form, that no benefit is derived from it, and that this is a mere pittance dealt out to the people of New England to keep them alive, vote according to your opinions upon that subject. I do not look at it in that way. If I did, I would vote with you. But I repeat that I hope you will be disposed to look at the question as statesmen, and not in the light in which my friend from Kentucky seems to look at it and represent it, as a mere matter not worth considering, and not having an argument or view either from history or fact to sustain it.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not intend to say a word on the subject of the repeal of the fishing bounties at this time. I said on a former occasion everything that I wished to say in regard to it, and would not now speak on the amendment offered by my colleague to-day but for the personal notice of me by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] which makes it incumbent on me to say something. I shall be short, and I will endeavor to restrict myself merely to the subject under consideration and to some personal remarks made by that Senator.

The Senator charged me with having gone into the dark holes of history and having dug up narratives of facts that were derogatory to New England. I do not pretend to recite his language; I only give the substance of what he said, according to my best and general recollection of it. He of course referred to a speech that I made some few weeks back in the Senate, and which I was delivering in the course of two days. In that speech I spoke nothing of New England generally. I adverted to the history of Massachusetts particularly and specially; and I said nothing in relation to any other of the New England States except two, and what relates to those States was in short paragraphs, which I will ask the privilege to read. I was reviewing the history of Massachusetts in the war of 1812, and the support which that State then gave to Mr. Madison's Administration in waging that war, when I used this language:

"Sir, there is another specimen of Massachusetts loyalty: the Governor of Massachusetts having refused to order the militia of that State into the service of the United States, some of the patriotic people of the district of Maine volunteered, and were placed by the President under the command of General William King. In the year 1813 the Legislature of that State passed a resolution inquiring of General King whether he had accepted any agency or commission from the United States, or received from them any arms or munitions by order of the President of the United States. General King replied:

"The volunteers who tendered their services to the President for the defense of their country were accepted and organized, and have been furnished with arms on application to the General Government. Soon after the commencement of the present war, when the services of the detached militia were withheld from the General Government, I aided the War Department in organizing such a volunteer corps as was considered necessary for the defense of this district. After two regiments were organized the services of such a number of companies were offered as would have made three other regiments, if necessary. As a citizen of the United States I have duties to perform as well as a citizen of the State in this just and holy war."

"A response worthy the friend of that often tried and true patriot, John Holmes."

Maine was then a district, and was attached in its local government to the State of Massachusetts. I have read all that I said in relation to Maine in that speech. If the Senator from Maine considers that what I have read—and it was all that I said in relation to Maine in that speech—brings shame and reproach upon the people of Maine or upon the history of Maine, I dissent entirely from his position. I have no doubt that many people of Massachusetts had at the time the estimate of this conduct of General King and of the volunteer militia of the district of Maine who entered the service of the United States under his command, that would be characterized by the language used to-day by the Senator from Maine. If he chooses to form that estimate of the conduct of General King and of the patriotic volunteers of that district who took service under him in that holy war in defense of the district of Maine, I dissent entirely from his position, from his political ethics, from his sense of patriotism. If that is not the estimate which he places upon the conduct of General King and of his patriotic soldiers, there is no ground of complaint even with him against me for anything that I said of the people of Maine in the speech to which he referred.

Now, I will read a short paragraph that is the only reference in this speech to any other State of New England than the States of Massachusetts and Maine:

"This traitorous Governor Strong and his coadjutors in Massachusetts procured the weak and corrupt Governor of Vermont, Chittenden, to take their position, that it was the exclusive right of the Governors of the States to decide whether and when there existed an exigency that required the State militia to be put into the service of the United States, and to issue an infamous proclamation commanding the volunteer militia of Vermont to march back from Plattsburgh, whither they had rushed to defend that place against the assault of one of the most formidable British armies that was assembled during the war. The traitors of Massachusetts were loud in their promises to stand by their victim, and to sustain him in their common crime; but their guilty souls shrank from the necessary action. The brave and patriotic citizen soldiers of Vermont flung back their contempt upon the treacherous misdeeds of their Governor, who was representing not his State, but British feelings and interests, and remained to cover themselves with glory in one of the most brilliant achievements of the war. All honor to the memory of those gallant and true men! They were fit representatives of the heroes of Bennington."

I was unconscious, in that just and truthful eulogy to the volunteer militia of Vermont, of having in fact offered them or having intended to offer them any insult. I deny that the charge made by the Senator from Maine against me is true. I deny that I hunted into dark holes for the history of the New England States for the purpose of rummaging and collecting their dishonoring much less their infamous history with a view to reproach them with it in the Senate. I did, upon great and grievous and repeated provocation, search into the history of Massachusetts; and that history, according to all the lights and authorities which I had been able to consult, I presented truthfully and frankly to the Senate. If I fell into any error, it would afford me pleasure then and always to correct the error and to do justice to that State in any matter whereon I had done her injustice.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine is like many other men in this: it is the revelation of the truth that gravels him. It is not the enactment of a degrading history, it is not the performance of acts or the expression of opinions and principles that should shame and bring ignominy and reproach upon a man or a people to which that Senator objects, so much as to the revelation or to the reproducing to the memory of that history; and his resentment is not against those who enacted the history, however infamous and degrading it may be, but it is against those who write the story or who recite the story if it has been written. I think it would become manliness, honor, and truth if that Senator would visit the men who enacted the history and who did those deeds of ignominy with his invective, rather than me for having upon great provocation reproduced them for the condemnation of the present generation.

But, Mr. President, I have a sequel to read of the history of Massachusetts on the subject of the negro; I will not recite it now, because it is not the most appropriate occasion; but when one of those never-ending negro bills, that has darkened this Senate Chamber during the whole of this session and for a good portion of two previous sessions, is brought up again, I will present the sequel of that history.

The honorable Senator says that I had changed my feelings in relation to the New England States, and he reproves me for having offered a proposition to organize the six New England States into two, and he goes on, and in very just and truthful terms, to eulogize the wealth and the resources of New England, and sets forth exultingly the amount of revenue she pays into the United States Treasury. All that was proper enough. He contrasts it with ten of the western States and with Kentucky and thrushes in three or four Territories as an adjunct of those eight or ten western or northwestern States. If the honorable Senator was fond of drawing comparisons he might have found one on the other side of this view. He might have compared the six New England States with New York, and he would have ascertained that New York has a population of five or six hundred thousand people more than the aggregate of all the New England States; and that the assessed value of the property of New York is within a small fraction of the entire aggregate of that of all the New England States; and yet we have a Constitution that gives to New England twelve members of this body and to the State of New York but two. If the honorable Senator from Maine and the Senators from New England had rested satisfied with the great principles on which this Government by its Constitution is adjusted in other matters of equally vital importance, and had been willing to permit that adjustment to remain undisturbed, I would have been one of the last men in the Senate or out of it to have disturbed it by proposing to reduce the New England States to two, or in any other mode. But when each and all of them, seeking to break up the fundamental principles of the Constitution and to bring about an extensive and most mischievous revolution of the Government, if I had the power, the New England States should be reduced to two, if not to one. In the disruption which she has lent herself to so efficiently it would be no injustice, but a proper retribution to her and only justice to the other States.

Now, Mr. President, I will read a paragraph or two from a speech that I made upon this subject when a similar proposition to the one now pending was made by my colleague on another bill. I said:

"Mr. President, I shall vote for the amendment of my colleague. Whenever I have been in a position heretofore to support the policy of these fishing bounties I have voted for their continuance. Many years ago I was taught, session after session, by gentlemen representing the New England States, that these fisheries were the best nursery of seamen on the globe, and that whenever our country should be involved in war these adventurous and hardy seamen would be ready-trained sons of Neptune to man our ships-of-war and privateers, and bear our flag in triumph against all comers through the battle and the breeze, and in that way would compensate the country for the cost it paid for their tuition in the form of these bounties. My own State cherished the laurels won by her gallant tars upon oceans and lakes with as true national pride as did New England, and she voted without grudging these largesses that our country might have the first seannanship of the world.

"The principles and policy of my State, too, as her people were induced by her great statesmen, were to regard every section and every State as equally part of our common country, and entitled in their leading interests to the same protection and fostering care from the General Government. Until since New England has become wholly sectionalized and selfish, we had cultivated for her feelings of fraternal pride, conceding that she contributed her full share to our national greatness and glory, and we sustained the measures and policy that developed her industry, wealth, and power, not only as a duty, but with a generous and proud satisfaction. We felt that whatever was aggrandizing New England was at the same time bearing aloft the United States; and we so regarded every section and every State.

"We had been taught by New England statesmen to consider the seamen formed in those fisheries and sustained by these bounties did not belong to that or any other section, but, like the graduates of West Point, to be the property of the nation at large; and that when they took post on the decks of our ships-of-war they were not to be credited to New England or any State, but to the United States. But since the States of New England have, during this civil war, unanimously claimed and each is to receive the benefit of having her seamen computed in the quota of soldiery she is to furnish to the war, one of the chief arguments for the continuance of these bounties is removed.

"Another cogent one when they were first established was, that our marine, both military and mercantile, was then in its infancy, and these bounties were necessary stimulants to foster it against the severe competition of other maritime Powers. This argument was then entitled to and received much consideration, but time and the great growth of our Navy have shorn it of all force.

"But the present political position of New England, which she has been gradually approaching for many years, until at length she is absorbed by it, is what chiefly determines me to vote for the repeal of these fishing bounties. The Federal Constitution was formed upon several important concessions and compromises between the northern and southern States, without which it would have been impossible to have formed a Constitution. Than this there is no fact in history better established. New England adheres, as is her right and her duty, to all the compromises in her favor; but those beneficial to the South, to my section and State, she has been for many years fiercely assaulting, against the spirit and letter of the Federal Constitution, until she has become a unit, and in a spirit of destructive frenzy is bent upon the subversion of the Constitution and the Union which it formed, to expunge all the compromises that protect the rights of the slave States."

I concede that that last paragraph expresses the principal motive upon which I now act. There never has been a bill before Congress to promote justly by incidental duties the industry and manufactures of New England when I was a member of either House, that I have not given it my hearty support. The great master in whose school of politics I was taught, and whom I now follow as the lamp to my feet and the guide to my path, so instructed me. But when New England not only becomes so sectional and selfish as to assail the primary and essential interests of other sections of the United States, and of my State particularly, but undertakes audaciously to disregard the Constitution and all the guarantees which it gives to slave property for the purpose of despoiling its owners, she puts herself where she cannot justly claim any favors from the representatives of the States and the people whom she so deeply wrongs. I would not deny to her any right which the law would give her, much less those which are guaranteed to her by the Constitution. But whether these bounties are to be continued or not is not a matter of constitutional or legal right; it is a matter of continuing a policy from year to year; and when a State or a section forgets comity and justice, the claims of common nationality, and the guarantees which the Constitution of the United States gives to the property of a great section of the country, and of my State particularly, and expects me to come up with a liberal and national spirit and return generosity and bounty for evil and ruin, there will be disappointment. No, sir, I would establish a countervailing policy. If I could I would repeal to-night all the protection which New England industry receives from the legislation of Congress, and I would do it upon the principle of a countervailing policy. I would teach her and her people and her statesmen that if they expect a liberal, a protecting, a national, and American policy from other States, they must extend the same principles and the same spirit to those States.

I hold that the right of the State of Kentucky to adhere to slavery is just as irrefragable and as true, on legal and constitutional principles, as was the right of Massachusetts or any other State to abolish slavery. I hold that New England has no more right to abolish slavery in the State of Kentucky than Kentucky has a right to reestablish slavery in New England. I hold that the General Government, in any of its departments, in any of its authorities or officers, civil or military, or in its totality, has no right to strike the shackles from a slave. That power appertains to the States respectively, and their people alone, as a part of their reserved sovereignty, which they never did and never would have surrendered to the Government of the United States. With the exception of the Senator from Massachusetts who hails from Boston—and I have no doubt he thinks he is big enough to represent a continent, [laughter,] though I should dissent from him on that point—with the exception of that honorable Senator, I know none other in this body that is so ultra, so radical, so unconstitutional, so utterly reckless and disregardful of the Constitution, as the honorable Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] on all questions connected with slavery. From the time of the introduction of the measure to abolish slavery in this District, which ex-President Fillmore condemned then as an entering wedge that was to lead to a policy of mischief and encroachment upon State rights, the evils and results of which no imagination could foretell, there has been no proposition that went to damage slavery, to impinge upon or weaken the rights of the slaveholder or of the slave States, to exalt the slave, the negro, to the level of the white race, or to degrade it to the inferior position where the God of nature has placed the negro, and to raise him from that to an equality with the white race, in which all the puny efforts of fanatics and fools, from the creation to the present time, have failed, and will continue to fail until the omnipotent Creator shall reconstruct the negro—there has been no proposition of that character that the honorable Senator from Maine has not made haste to support.

Now, I say to him that I have the same legal and constitutional right to my slave that he has to his land or his horse; that the General Government has no more power or authority over my slave than it has over his horse or his land, or my horse or my land. Every class of property has the same legal guarantees under the Federal Constitution. Any description of property may be taken for public use, as well negroes as any other kind; and neither that nor any other description of property can be taken from the owner except for public use, and that upon the indispensable condition that he shall have just compensation for his property. This right is guaranteed by an express provision, in the form of an amendment, of the Federal Constitution; and it applies in the same force to negro and every description of property. There is no position more false than that military necessity in time of war invests the President with the power to abrogate that provision of the Constitution, or to free slaves, generally or particularly, which would be its practical abrogation. This new-born heresy, "military necessity," as President Lincoln claims and exercises it, is the sum of all political and military villainies, to adopt a phrase which is sometimes used in this Chamber by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and it is no less absurd than it is villainous. How would this doctrine of military necessity have been treated by Chancellor Kent, Chief Justice Marshall, Judge Shaw, Judge Tilghman, or any other able judge or jurist?

The question of property in slaves has been brought in a multitude of cases before the Supreme Court and other courts, national and State, and invariably they decided and maintained the principle that the owner of a slave had a property in him, and, like any other property it was protected by the Constitution and laws, and its invasion would be redressed in the same mode in the courts.

We had two hundred and fifty thousand slaves in Kentucky. Your war has not been upon the rebellion for the last two years so much as it has been upon slavery; and the reason that McClellan was not sustained when he was on the Peninsula like Grant is now sustained, was that he would have brought the war to too speedy a conclusion for the purposes of the Administration and the supporters of the war, one of them being to abolish slavery everywhere; and that was the reason that he was displaced from his position. Our slaves were worth $150,000,000 at the least. I suppose that in horses and ships and lumber, and other articles of property necessary for the consumption of the Army, Maine had an equal amount of property. Suppose that he who is at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue had said, as he did say, "I have a right to do anything that promises to bring this war to a conclusion; military necessity clothes me with every power; authorizes me to take all property, and do every act which I may think will tend to bring this war to a successful conclusion;" could he not, under that vast warrant of power, have seized all that property of Maine? His power, our Solon says, fluctuates; it expands and contracts. It is not to be sought for in the fundamental law of government, the Constitution, in its language, and provisions, and spirit; but it springs out of the condition of things, out of the military exigencies of the country. What greater exigency for the country in the prosecution of this war than that it should have ships, and all sorts of military supplies, provisions, horses, arms, money, that supplies every sinew of war?

The President upon his principle, if it may be so denominated, could with more reason have taken the ships, timber, horses, and other material for ship-building and everything necessary for the supply and use of the Army found in the State of Maine, as slave negroes, and with a great deal more, because he has substituted the inferior negro for the superior white man, the higher and nobler race animated by the love of constitutional government and liberty, by the loftiest inspirations of patriotism. Soldiers of this class, of the highest of all the types of man, upon a constitutional system of policy could long since have been commanded in abundance to have brought this war to a close.

But President Lincoln confounds matters and questions of legislative expediency and policy, varying with changing circumstances and exigencies, and which within certain limits would be constitutional, but which are purely of a legislative character, and therefore belong exclusively to Congress, and seeks to usurp them to himself in an extent subversive of every principle, limitation, restriction, and guarantee of rights and liberties assured by the Constitution, under the pretext of military necessity. No claim of power ever surpassed this in absurdity, audacity, and destructiveness of constitutional government and popular rights and liberty.

But suppose under this vague indefinite power of military necessity, this sum of all political absurdities and political villainies, he had said to the State of Maine, "The condition of the country, the exigencies of the military and naval service require that I shall have all your ships, all your ship-building material, all your horses, all your manufactured products; they are necessary and they can be appropriated to the use of the Army; therefore I will take them. I will take them under this imaginary power of military necessity, and you shall have no compensation for them." What then would have been the language of the Senator from Maine? He would have made as resolute and as uncompromising a protest against that enormous and absurd and most tyrannical power as I when it seeks to seize on the slaves of my State. I have the same guarantees of Constitution and law to my property that he and his constituents have to theirs. And yet, sir, military tyrants, tools of usurpers, unflinching ensigns and military provosts come through the country, seize upon the slaves of loyal men, and when the officer of the law with its process appears at the encampment to execute the process of the law, myrmidons with fixed bayonets are sent forth, and they prick the officer of the law with the process of a sovereign State in a matter over which it has supreme and exclusive jurisdiction, by brute violence from the execution of its mandate. I have witnessed that scene myself; and, so help me Heaven, if I had been Governor of the State of Kentucky, or a commander of a Kentucky regiment, I then and there would have made the question by the issue of battle, and I would do it to-morrow if I was in a position so to act.

Here are New York and New England and the eastern States that have a vast amount of aggregated capital in the form of bank stocks and manufacturing stocks and other stocks, safety fund banks and savings banks. What more necessary to enable his majesty the Emperor Abraham I, to carry on war than money? Why then should he come to Congress and ask for the levy of taxes if military necessity vests him with the power to do everything, to command anything and any agency that the exigencies of war may demand? There is no greater necessity or power of war than money. Why does he come to Congress and ask Congress to assess taxes? Why, instead of calling out seventy-five thousand men for three months, did he not call out a million during the war, at the outset? Why did he trouble himself with the delay and the debates and the discordant views and clashing arguments of Congress at all? If the magic power of military necessity gives him a right to override the Constitution and all its provisions and guarantees, why did not he go on in the most summary and energetic manner to execute this vast power and bring this rebellion to a close at once? Sir, he has no such power. There is no greater absurdity to a well-ordered and well-read legal mind than that the President is clothed with any power of necessity that will enable him to trample under foot one single provision of the Constitution. He is the creature of the Constitution. He is legally and legitimately its slave; it is his master.

The man has never spoken or lived who can prove by any provision of the Constitution, or by any principle, or by any argument to be deduced logically and fairly from it, that he has any such power as this vast, gigantic, all-conquering, and all-crushing power of military necessity which he has the audacity to claim. This modern emperor, this Tiberius, a sort of a Tiberius, and his Sejanus, a sort of a Sejanus, the head of the War Department, are organizing daily their military courts to try civilians, to try men not engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, or in the militia of the States in the actual service, and not for military offenses either, but for civil offenses. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] put a case the other day that in its features was shocking; but every member of that court-martial who was engaged in trying that barbarian in Tennessee under martial law and convicting him of homicide in the form of manslaughter or murder was a trespasser. I might see a man, a ruffian, an assassin in the most wanton and unprovoked manner make an assault upon the Senator from Massachusetts. He might slay him. If in the act of slaying him I could interfere so as to save his life, I would be authorized to take the life of the assailant; but when the deed was consummated, if it was but for one instant of time, if I then slew the assailant, I myself would be a murderer; and any intelligent and independent court in America would so instruct a jury trying me upon an indictment for murder. Sir, it is only in cases arising in the military and naval service of the United States, or in the militia when in the actual service of the United States, that a military court by military law, martial or any other kind, can assume jurisdiction of a crime and a criminal.

Whenever a citizen is charged with an offense, and that citizen is not in the Army or Navy, and doubly so where the offense is not of a military character, the military or naval court have no more jurisdiction over the subject than would the honorable Senator from Maine and myself. Suppose we were to interfere and organize ourselves into a court to try the case and sentence the man as a murderer to be hung, and direct our myrmidons to take him off and hang him; we should be murderers although he had murdered a man but the moment before. Sir, I want one labor of love before I die. I want the President of the United States, I want his Secretary of War, I want some of his high officers in military command to bring a civilian to a military execution, and me to have the proud privilege of prosecuting them for murder.

This principle has often been tested in England, and it was tested in the case of Governor Wall, as I said here on a former occasion, the military commander of the colony of Angola, in Africa. He there had a soldier arraigned, a man in the military service of his Majesty, for a military offense, and the drum-head court-martial condemned him to receive eight hundred stripes. The Governor was present and gave directions for its being laid on, and when the vigor of blows was about relaxing he stimulated them to strike harder and with more force. The man did not die immediately, but did in a few hours from the atrocious punishment. Twenty years afterwards Governor Wall returned to England. He was indicted for murder, although he had had that man sentenced by a drum-head court-martial, and the sentence literally executed under which he died. Lord Loughborough tried the case, and he charged the jury that it was murder, and the jury found a verdict that it was murder, and the felon governor was condemned to die the death of a murderer.

Sir, I want this war to close for one great, grand, moral reason, and the reign of liberty and of well-regulated liberty restored. I want the reign of the Constitution and of the laws and of the civil courts once more to be resumed in this enslaved country of ours, in all its majesty, grandeur, and power. I want these high delinquents, such as Abraham Lincoln, and Stanton, and thousands of others that I could name, brought to trial in our civil courts under the civil law, and the court presided over by such judges as Holt and Hale, and others who have adorned the English and American bench. I want the law and its just retribution to be visited upon these great delinquents. I would sooner, if I had the power, bring about such an atonement as that than I would even put down the rebellion. It would be a greater victory in favor of freedom and constitutional liberty, a thousand-fold, of all the people of America besides, than the subjugation of the rebel States could possibly be.

Mr. President, Franklin once said that our sins and our debts were greater than any of us took them to be; and I find that whenever I get up to speak, I do not care on what subject, my speech runs to a much greater length than I intended it should. At the time I rose I thought I would make a few remarks in reply to the honorable Senator from Maine, for whom I have great personal respect, indeed; and my only regret is that he has not more respect for the Constitution of his country and the rights of other States than he has. I think that if he and all New England had been of a less meddling and less aggressive and less—I had almost said selfish and fanatical disposition, but I might call him up again. I will not trespass longer on the Senate.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire, sir, to submit a few remarks in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] and I propose to confine myself as far as I can to the subject under consideration.

The very argument used by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] in favor of a continuation of these bounties is a good reason why they should not be continued. He says that they have had them for eighty years. Any interest in this country that cannot sustain itself after it has been sustained by the Government for eighty years ought not to be continued.

In a discussion that we had on this subject at the last session of Congress it was admitted by the gentlemen who insist that these bounties shall be continued, that of all the persons in the naval service of the United States two thirds of them received their education in the mercantile marine and not under this fishing bounty. It was admitted during the progress of that debate, and I presume it will not be denied now, that those persons who were drawn from the mercantile marine were just as good sailors as those that had been engaged in the fisheries. Why is it then that we pay $400,000 every year to keep up these fisheries when we can get just as good naval seamen from our mercantile marine to which we pay no bounties?

And, Mr. President, there is another reason. You have lost during the progress of this rebellion one fifth of the tonnage of the country, while the decrease in the amount of bounties that you pay for these fisheries is very small. While your mercantile marine has suffered very greatly, this interest that has been fostered for eighty years by the Government bounty that you draw from the hard hands and toil of my constituents has decreased but very little. Is there any necessity, then, when there is such a scarcity of money, such a demand for it, why the Government should attempt to educate seamen at this enormous expense when they can get just as good from the mercantile marine? There is no reason that can be urged why this should be done.

But, sir, it is said that we must not touch these persons; that they have rights which have been respected for many years. Mr. President, we are at this moment taxing every interest in the country for the purpose of keeping up the public credit and keeping our Army fed and clothed in the field. You tax articles to-day so that you have driven them from use throughout this country, that had become articles of necessity; that had never been taxed before since the foundation of the Government. A gentleman suggests that you are taxing whisky and tobacco. It is avowed on the floor of the Senate that you intend to draw your revenue mainly from those two articles. You are taxing them five hundred per cent. more than you did a year ago; but you say we must not touch this bounty that we pay the seamen. It would be infinitely cheaper to-day, it would have been infinitely cheaper at any time during our past history, to have bought out the fisheries, to have bought all the craft that have been sailed there, rather than to pay these bounties to them.

Mr. President, every portion of the country is making sacrifices now to maintain the public credit; and why is it, for what purpose, what beneficial purpose of the Government are we to pay these bounties and keep up this little fishing party that goes up there and draws its support I apprehend mainly from the Government? I have no great anxiety or fear in reference to this subject. The bounties may not be repealed to-day; but when you come to lay the hand of taxation upon our people, when they come to examine and explore what has become of the money, they will begin to make a little noise about this; after a while they will begin to inquire what becomes every year of $400,000. They will be told that it has gone to the people of Massachusetts and Maine—for I believe they are the two States that are particularly interested in it—for catching fish down near Newfoundland, or in that neighborhood. Our people will not be content and satisfied to pay this amount as bounty to them when they are being taxed upon every article that they use, every article that they produce, when they are toiling from early light until the stars come at night to get the money to make the payment to carry on their Government. The time is coming, and coming very speedily, when you will not be able to pay out this bonus. I shall vote for the amendment and vote for it whenever it is proposed now and hereafter during my continuance in Congress.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President, perhaps I am myself not quite old enough, perhaps I am not sufficiently long a member of this body to act the censor in the Senate; but I will take occasion to say, notwithstanding, that when gentlemen from the hills and valleys and the wide-wooded plains of Kentucky undertake disparagingly to discuss the morale and particular quality of the people of the hills of New England, in doing this they do not well. And again, when from the tall pine woods of Maine a Senator echoes back a response in the same spirit of acrimony, he does not well. In all these discussions sound argument and true conclusions are lost or not observed; or if for the moment observed, for the multitudinousness of talk not noted. This is a matter to be regretted by all who look at the serious business of legislation and understand that it is a grave office we have in hand here as Senators of a great people. I will for this occasion be censor for thus much.

Now, with regard to this present question, that of the fishing bounties on our northeastern coast, I might make a comparison with an interest in my own State by starting the inquiry, is it not as well to promote the bringing out of the yellow gold from the rugged mountains of the West as drawing up the fish from the bottoms of the sea on our northeastern shores? And is there not equal reason for promoting the mines of the mountains as the mines of the sea? But that would be stating antagonistic propositions; and while I am inclined to think that both would be right, the denial of one does not prove that the other is wrong. I am inclined to think, and have always been inclined to think, that the policy of building up a body of men trained to dare the sea from boyhood until manhood and from manhood until old age on our northeastern shores was a policy that would aid us in securing what we have aimed at from an early day, the empire of the seas against Great Britain and all the Governments of Europe. I thought it a wise policy long since. We are not a people limited to a single interest. The tobacco of Kentucky, the corn of Illinois, the gold of California, the manufactures of New England, the commerce of the seas, the wealth of other lands, our rule at home, our policy abroad; these interests and considerations furnish the materials for a large policy, worthy of a great nation; and in my contemplation of the considerations that should govern our action I embrace them all.

On the northeastern shores of New England we have, from an early day, even from a period as early as the Revolution, sought to raise up a body of hardy, fearless seamen, men who could and would maintain our flag first on the seas. Our northeastern coast is a school for seamen better than that at Newport or Annapolis. It is a school where men learn fearlessly to face and firmly to triumph over peril. The man who learns to plant the prow of his frail smack against the storm-lashed waves of the northwestern Atlantic must be a brave man—one of such men as were the Vikings who, from the stormy coast of Norway, came down and swept the coast of Europe.

I understand this interest in that sense; it is a school for seamen. It is a school for men who will hold the helm firmest when the storm blows wildest, and who, with Long Tom Coffin, stand by the last plank. I understand it to be a school for a class of men of that kind that have made and will continue to make our Navy in times of war one unequalled for skill, daring, and success.

I had occasion to vote on this question at a former time, some ten or twelve years since. I then entertained the opinions I now express. I have been a little jealous, I may say, Mr. President, for the reason that while we out in the West expend the same energy and show the same spirit in developing another equivalent necessary to our Government, it is not protected but is taxed. My own opinion is that that is a legitimate subject of protection and not of taxation; but two wrongs do not make a right, and if the Government does not look as kindly as it ought upon the interest which I more particularly represent, it is no reason why it should not look kindly upon another interest that should justly be protected.

I have never lived upon the eastern shore of this continent. I hardly know what New England is; I have visited it but for a brief period twice in my life; but I know what the American sailor is, and I know what they have done from the organization of our Government, from the war of independence, until now; and I know what a New England sailor is; and I know that any man trained to a fishing-smack on the northeast coast must have the high qualities of a true sailor; such experience would out of a semi-coward make a courageous man. The sea is the school of courage. It has been so through all time, and is so to-day. For myself I think these fishing bounties have not been ill bestowed; I think they have been well bestowed; not as a favor to New England, not as a favor to Massachusetts, not as a favor to Maine, but as building up a class of men to maintain our honor and our flag upon the seas when the time of peril shall come. I do not know how many here have been tempest-tossed on the wide sea, when the crested waves seemed snow-capped, mountain-high, when it required hearts of fire and arms of iron to struggle with the angry elements. Those who have can understand that the master of a fishing-smack who dares the storms of the northeast coast dares more than he who carries a vessel out of the port of New York to Havre or Liverpool or who doubles Cape Horn. A class of brave, bold men are raised in these fisheries, and I am glad they are being raised, for we shall have use of them in a very short time. There is a great war before us. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations may ignore it; gentlemen here may ignore it; it may be ignored or dodged by many persons; but it is in our path; it cannot be avoided; it is inevitable; it is written in the book; we have to front and meet a war with the most aspiring State in Europe. The American people have already declared war with France. All required now is some of the forms of office. It should have been invited by us long ere this time; and if we had true manly courage it would have been invited. We have lost strength, we have lost tone, we have lost character, we have lost dignity as a people by seeming acquiescence in the outrage of France upon our shores. But if we are slow we are not the less sure. War with France is one of our inevitable fates; it has to come; and then, then I want the Vikings from our northeastern coast to man our ships, spread our sails upon all the seas, drive France from the ocean as we will drive her from our continent.

Mr. WILKINSON. Mr. President, at an earlier stage in this session I voted for a proposition to abolish these fishing bounties. I had not then examined the question very fully. Since that my attention has been turned to one or two facts, and I am willing now to vote to abolish the fishing bounties upon the condition that the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain shall terminate. We passed a law this session, I think, providing that this bounty should not be paid until the fishermen or the parties claiming it should establish to the satisfaction of the Treasury Department the fact that they had paid into the Treasury the duty imposed by law upon the salt used in curing the fish taken by them, and for which they claimed the bounty. I am told by those who are conversant with the facts that that duty amounts to just about as much as the bounty. Under the treaty of 1854, commonly called the reciprocity treaty, fish of all kinds are received into this country from the British provinces free of duty, and as the people in those provinces do not have to pay a duty upon the salt they use, they have a great advantage over our fishermen. They have at least the advantage of the duty which our men have to pay upon the salt used in curing their fish, and this amounts, I am told, to as much as the sum which is paid as bounty under the law as it now stands.

Mr. JOHNSTON. About the same.

Mr. WILKINSON. I do not think it is fair for us to make a treaty with England and permit it to stand, by which we give their people who are engaged in one particular branch of trade an advantage over our own people who are engaged in the same trade; and until that treaty is terminated I think it is legitimate and proper that we should allow these bounties to stand as they have stood for a long number of years.

I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky that New England is illiberal to the other portions of the Union. As the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] said, we of the West have asked for a great many measures which have tended directly to the development and prosperity of the West; and since I have been here I have found that, with now and then an exception, the Representatives and Senators from New England have been liberal and generous in the support they have given to those measures, and there is no earthly reason why they should not, for their people go as far as the settlements of this country go. I do not agree with the Senator from Kentucky in regarding this as a purely sectional question. We are one country, and when we foster or sustain the interests of one portion of the country, we are so intimately connected together that we can but benefit the interests of the whole people.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Grimes, Hendricks, Nesmith, Powell, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sherman, and Trumbull—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Collamer, Cowan, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Riddle, Sprague, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I have several amendments to propose to this bill. The first one I shall offer is to come in as an additional section.

Mr. ANTHONY. Before the amendment is read, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 31, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

WAGON ROADS IN IDAHO.

The SPEAKER stated that the regular order of business was the consideration of the bill of the House No. 323, reported from the Committee on Roads and Canals, to construct certain wagon roads in the Territory of Idaho.

BUSINESS OF THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee on Commerce two or three bills of a public nature on Saturday next after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that being done after the committees shall have been called for reports of a private nature.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would remind the gentleman that Saturdays have been set apart by order of the House for public business.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I have no objection. No objection being made, the leave was granted.

ENFORCEMENT OF TREATIES.

Mr. WILSON. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 487, to provide for the execution of treaties between the United States and foreign nations, respecting consular jurisdiction over the crews of vessels of such foreign nations in the waters and ports of the United States, was referred on Monday last to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I desire to have that vote reconsidered, and the bill put upon its passage. I have a communication from the Secretary of State which explains the necessity for it. I will state that the bill has been informally before the Committee on the Judiciary, and they concur in the recommendation that it be passed.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I now withdraw the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. I hold in my hand the communication from the Secretary of State, which will explain the necessity for the passage of this bill. I send it to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 26, 1864.

SIR: The eighth article of the consular convention with France of the 23d of February, 1853, is in the following words:

"The respective consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, or consular agents, shall have exclusive charge of the internal order of the merchant vessels of their nation, and shall alone take cognizance of differences which may arise, either at sea or in port, between the captain, officers, and crew, without exception, particularly in reference to the adjustment of wages and the execution of contracts. The local authorities shall not on any pretext interfere in these differences, but shall lend forcible aid to the consuls, when they may ask it, to arrest and imprison all persons composing the crew whom they may deem it necessary to confine. Those persons shall be arrested at the sole request of the consuls, addressed in writing to the local authority, and supported by an official extract from the register of the ship or the list of the crew, and shall be held during the whole time of their stay in the port at the disposal of the consuls. Their release shall be granted at the mere request of the consuls made in writing. The expenses of the arrest and detention of those persons shall be paid by the consuls."

By the fifteenth article of the treaty with Sardinia of the 26th of November, 1838, it is stipulated that "the two high contracting parties reciprocally grant to each other the liberty of having each in the ports and other commercial places of the other, consuls, vice consuls, and commercial agents of their own appointment, who shall enjoy the same privileges, powers, and exemptions as those of the most favored nations."

A similar stipulation is contained in most of the other subsisting commercial treaties between the United States and foreign countries, the effect of which is to make the stipulation in the consular convention with France common to them all. There is no law of the United States for the purpose of carrying that stipulation into effect, and as it appears from the note of the minister of Italy accredited to this Government, a translation of which is herewith communicated, that vessels of his nation, in ports of the United States, have been put to serious inconvenience in consequence of having been improperly deprived of the services of parts of their crews, the expediency of enacting a general law for the purpose of enabling the Government faithfully to execute such treaties is submitted to your consideration.

A draft of a bill is herewith transmitted.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. Unless some member of the House desires some further explanation of the bill, I will move the previous question upon it.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that this bill has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that they yesterday passed upon it and authorized their chairman to report the bill back to the House. I do not know how it got to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON. I have only to say that the Secretary of State sent that bill to me with the communication which has just been read, asking that action be taken upon it. I have followed his advice, and the Committee on the Judiciary found no objection to the bill.

Mr. COX. There is no objection to the passage of the bill. The Committee on Foreign Affairs have examined it and find it correct and necessary.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT OF MISSOURI TROOPS.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution amendatory of an act to provide for a deficiency in the appropriation for the pay of officers and men actually employed in the Western department or the department of Missouri; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROAD GRANT TO MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and put on its passage Senate bill No. 250, to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes."

Mr. SPALDING. I call for the regular order of business.

WAGON ROADS IN IDAHO.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 323) to construct certain wagon roads in the Territory of Idaho, reported back from the Committee on Roads and Canals on April 19, and postponed for ten days.

The bill was read. It appropriates $240,000, to be expended, or so much as may be necessary, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the location and construction of the following roads in the Territory of Idaho: First. Beginning at a point on the present emigrant road at or near the mouth of Deer creek on the Platte river, to the mouth of Big Horn river; thence up the valley of the Yellowstone river to the head of the Missouri river. Second. From a point on the western boundary of the State of Minnesota, on or near the forty-fifth parallel of north latitude, thence west to intersect the first-named road at the mouth of the Big Horn river. Third. Beginning at the mouth of the Niobrara, on the Missouri river, thence up the valley of the Niobrara to a proper place of intersection with the first-named road; provided, the sum appropriated shall be apportioned to the roads named, as follows: to the first road the sum of $100,000; to the second-named road the sum of $100,000; and to the third road named the sum of $40,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the object be to refer the bill, I have no objection; otherwise I make the point of order that the bill, making an appropriation, must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The bill was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MISSISSIPPI RAPIDS.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was a bill (H. R. No. 420) to construct a canal to improve the upper rapids and lower or Des Moines rapids of the Mississippi river; which had been postponed till the 3d of May, the question being on its engrossment.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the bill be further postponed till the 8th day of June next, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed an act (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes, with amendments; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home; and

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation at Chili.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was a bill (H. R. No. 190) to amend section fourteen of an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, which had been postponed till the 5th of May; the question being on its engrossment.

The bill was passed over informally.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER stated that the next business in order was a bill (H. R. No. 342) making appropriation for public buildings in the Territories of Colorado, Nevada, Dakota, Idaho, Arizona, and Montana, and for other purposes.

The bill was read. It appropriates $240,000 for the erection of capitol and penitentiary buildings in the Territories of Colorado, Nevada, Dakota, Idaho, Arizona, and Montana, to be expendent in the proportion of $40,000 for each Territory, and under the direction thereof; and appropriates the further sum of $7,500 to furnish the Territories of Idaho, Arizona, and Montana, each, with a public law library, to be expended in the proportion of $2,500 for each Territory, and under the legislative authority thereof, and appropriates the sum of $— to defray the expenses of taking the census of the Territory of Idaho.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Territories reported this bill and desires its passage. The committee had some doubt whether, in the present state of the Treasury, it was advisable to appropriate this large sum of money; but in consideration of the fact that these Territories are now supplying the country with large amounts of the precious metals, estimated by good judges at $150,000,000 per annum, and from the necessity of having these Territories properly organized, the committee deemed it proper to report this bill to the House, leaving it to the House to say, under all the circumstances of the case, whether it should be passed at this time.

Unless there be some other disposition of the bill desired, I will move the previous question on its passage; but first I move to fill the blank by inserting $9,500.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this amendment has not been before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it must be considered there.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. FENTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine to let the bill be postponed till next December. This is a large appropriation, and there is no time to give it a proper investigation.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I am perfectly willing to have it postponed, if such be the desire of the House.

Mr. FENTON. Then I move to postpone it till the third Tuesday in December next, after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the next business in order to be the call of committees for reports, beginning with the committee on the bankrupt law.

REGISTRATION IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution in reference to the charter of the District of Columbia was yesterday referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to agree to have the bill referred.

Mr. DAWES. I did agree to have it referred; and it was referred to the committee. I ascertained, since the reference, what has led me to move to reconsider; and these facts I desire to state to the House that there may be a perfect understanding.

The nature of the resolution is such that it can be easily understood even before it is read upon a simple statement of its contents. As I stated yesterday, and upon a further examination I find it to be so, while it does not affect the qualification of a single voter in the District of Columbia according to the laws now in force, it simply provides that where any man otherwise a voter, according to the laws of the District, failed to get his name on the registry list six months ago, he may, upon presenting the proper evidence to the proper authority heretofore constituted, get his name registered now and vote.

Now, that is a very simple proposition, a proposition which it seems to me nobody who desires to secure the elective franchise of every man who is entitled to vote can object to; and inasmuch as the charter election in this city comes off on next Monday it did seem to me, upon examining this measure and ascertaining the delay which must necessarily follow by its consideration in the Committee for the District of Columbia, that I could not do my duty better than to move the reconsideration which I did last night.

I propose to call up that motion to reconsider now, and to submit a few remarks upon it. Then, if the House does not concur with me, of course it is within the control of a majority to lay the motion on the table, and thereby retain it in committee, and have it considered there.

If any gentleman has any amendment to submit to the bill, any amendment which has been considered in committee or any amendment which suggests itself to any gentleman in the House, he may submit it. The simple matter which I desire is that the bill may be acted on in time to be available for the election about to be held.

I can conceive of no other object for insisting upon retaining the bill in the Committee for the District of Columbia except to deprive men otherwise entitled to the elective franchise in this District of the opportunity to vote.

The provisions of this bill have an analogy, I believe, in the laws of every State in the Union where a registry is required. I do not know of any State where a registry of votes is required in which there is not a provision authorizing the proper authorities to place on the list the names of all persons entitled to vote, and whose names have been omitted from it. And if there be any State which has not that provision, it is quite time they had. I call the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the demand for a moment.

Mr. DAWES. I will; and, retaining the floor, will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I presume the gentleman from Massachusetts, who seems to have taken charge of the business belonging to the Committee for the District of Columbia, does not suppose that that committee are desirous of interposing any obstacles in the way of legal voting. But there seems to be a disposition now, as on one other occasion sometime ago, to take the business of the District out of the hands of the committee appointed by the House to consider it. On that occasion a colleague of mine volunteered to take charge of a measure appointing a warden for the jail, a proposition, as he thought, so simple as to require no reference to a committee, and under his guardianship it was immediately passed. It so happened that there was lying in jail at that time a man sentenced to death, and, in consequence of my colleague's law, there was nobody who could legally hang him. And as his execution was thus prevented, the House may be entitled to some consideration as philanthropists for saving the life of a convicted felon.

I apprehend there is no particular necessity for assuming the business legitimately belonging to the Committee for the District of Columbia or the business belonging to any other committee. I apprehend the members of this House are well aware that there are several things connected with the elective franchise that it would be well to consider in committee.

I have no feeling in regard to this bill. I do not know that I have any objection to its passage, but I do object to its being taken away from the proper committee and passed without consideration by the House.

We have a day set apart by the courtesy of the House for the transaction of the District business—Friday next—and I think this particular amendment which is proposed now to the existing law, and which has been allowed to sleep for so many years in the District, may safely be allowed to rest until Friday, when it will regularly come before the House for its action.

I am perfectly willing that the House shall relieve the Committee for the District of Columbia from all of their business, if on every occasion when any question happens to come up in which some gentleman on the other side takes a particular interest the business of this District is to be taken out of our hands; yet if we are not to be allowed to consider these important measures and to report on them in the legitimate way, the Committee for the District of Columbia ought to request of the Speaker, out of respect to themselves, to relieve them and appoint some other members to take charge of that business.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I was about to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I hardly think it good faith on his part to move a reconsideration and bring the question again before the House, as the House only consented to have that bill reported on the understanding that it should be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, there to be considered. That was the unanimous understanding of the House. It was the contract entered into by the House unanimously that this subject should have the consideration of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I think it only fair to the House to now leave this matter with that committee.

What is it? Only a scheme for manufacturing a lot of voters a week before the election. That is all it is. The gentleman says that it is only a registration of voters. It is making voters; giving them the qualification of voters for this city—men who have joined the Loyal Leagues, newly appointed clerks, men after patronage. They are to be registered here for the purpose of controlling perhaps a doubtful election. That is the best view we can take of this thing.

I ask the gentleman whether or not, if this be a fair and good bill and ought to receive the sanction of the House, it should not be sent to the committee to which it was referred yesterday, so that it may be reported on and the question fairly decided on next Friday? Why this haste? Why urge it now? Is there anything he cannot understand? If there is, let the committee sift it and report on it. Is there any fear that the Committee for the District of Columbia will not act fairly in regard to the District business? If there is, then, as the gentleman from New York, the chairman of that committee said, make a new committee, of better men, men more in favor of free suffrage in the District. And I hope until that is done the House will treat the committee with perfect respect and keep its faith on the terms made yesterday.

Mr. BEAMAN. I do not desire to go into any discussion of the merits of this case, but I desire to say to the House that I do not sympathize with my colleague on the Committee for the District of Columbia entirely in regard to the remarks that he has seen proper to make. I do not regard this motion as any disrespect to that committee, nor do I see the necessity for this bill going to it. It is brief and simple in its provisions, and if it be referred to that committee there will hardly be an elaborate report in regard to it. I am opposed to sending it to the committee, and I hope that it will pass.

Mr. MALLORY. I was here yesterday when the gentleman from Massachusetts made the motion to suspend the rules in order that this measure might be taken up, and finding that the rules would not be suspended, there being not two thirds in favor of taking the resolution up and acting on it, he proposed to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STEELE] that it should come before the House with the understanding it should be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. The gentleman from New York agreed to that suggestion, and the House acted on it. When this agreement was made that it should be referred to the committee to digest it and make a report, I went to the gentleman from New York and told him that I thought he had acted under a misapprehension. I said, "By your agreement and the action of the House the control of this matter by one third of the House has been given up, and the control given to a majority of the members of the House, and my impression is that action will be had by a majority because of the motion you have consented to just now." He replied, "I conceive that impossible, for in good faith that matter has been committed to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and I deem it hardly possible that they will take it up and act upon it without allowing the Committee for the District of Columbia to report upon it."

That conversation was between the chairman of the committee and myself. I at last concurred with him in his views, and supposed he was right; and that the House, after referring this matter to the committee, when it had no power to get it up and act upon it without the consent of two thirds, would stand by the good faith it had pledged, and would let the committee act upon the bill, and report their action to the House.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I desire to state not only that I had the conversation referred to by the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, but that I should have selected, as the last man in this House, perhaps, my friend from Massachusetts as a gentleman who would in any way, directly or indirectly, flinch from what was a fair and honorable understanding. The gentleman from Massachusetts said to me that if I would consent to let this bill come before the House—I having objected to its coming before the House—he would consent that it should go to our committee. That arrangement was made between us before the whole House; and I did not expect that my friend from Massachusetts was to be the man to attempt to get rid of a fair and straightforward arrangement.

Mr. DAWES. Nothing could pain me more than the loss of confidence of my friend from New York, although much of it must have arisen from his private conversation with the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, which he did not do me the honor to communicate to me.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I wish to ask the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts if he did not propose to me that if I would withdraw my objection he would allow this bill to go to the Committee for the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAWES. I was going to state the transaction just as I understood it.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. One question more.

Mr. DAWES. One at a time.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Another question just here. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether when he did that he did not intend in good faith that the committee should consider the bill?

Mr. DAWES. If my friend has got all his questions put now I will try to answer them. I did try to get this matter before the House to be acted upon yesterday. The gentleman from Kentucky is quite mistaken when he says I moved to suspend the rules, and finding that I could not get a majority of two thirds to suspend the rules, I resorted to an arrangement. I made no motion to suspend the rules, and consequently did not find that a majority of two thirds was lacking. I made no such motion, because no such motion was necessary. The bill was at all times under the control of a majority of the House, and the only difficulty existing was that it would take some time to take up and dispose of the matters on the Speaker's table before this bill could be reached. That was all. A majority of the House could have controlled it at all times. I never had the matter at any time in a position that it required any more than a majority of the House to control it, but it did require some little time to reach the bill upon the table.

The gentleman from New York did object. I then urged some reasons why I wanted the bill considered. The gentleman said he would object. The Speaker said it could be reached by a majority by taking up one bill after another upon the Speaker's table. I said to the gentleman from New York that if I could not do any better he might make a motion to refer it to the Committee for the District of Columbia, that that would hasten it to some extent, and that would be as much as I could do.

I say in all good faith to the House that when I made that suggestion to the gentleman from New York I had no idea of a motion to reconsider; and the motion to reconsider which I entered at the last moment was the result of an examination of the measure, and of a consideration of the chances that the measure would not be reported from the committee on Friday next. Without any idea that I had committed myself to any arrangement that the bill should be referred to the committee, I suggested to the gentleman from New York that if he would make the motion to refer the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia it would hurry it along, and place it ahead of the other business on the Speaker's table.

I wish now to say a word about the character of the measure, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox], who says it is not a measure to enable legal voters to cast their votes. That shows that the gentleman has not read the measure, but has taken some suggestion from outside. The very first line of the bill will show to the gentleman that it applies only to those otherwise qualified to vote. The phraseology is that men who have every qualification as voters required by the laws of this District, excepting the one of having succeeded six months ago in getting their names registered, may vote, and it provides for proof to be furnished to the appropriate parties—the same men that were to take it six months ago. I submit that nobody who understands this measure and knows what it is can oppose it, unless he desires to deprive men otherwise qualified from casting their votes next Monday.

Now, sir, it is not for any disrespect to the Committee for the District of Columbia, it is not with any disposition to take matters that properly belong to that committee away from it that I make this motion. It is a motion which is made every day by the friends of measures which are upon the Speaker's table, and which they desire to have passed. It is the every-day practice for members to move to take up bills and put them on their passage without reference to a committee, and it is done without any reflection upon the committees to whom such measures would otherwise be referred. It is not done because members have not confidence in the committee, but because the reference of bills to committees in the last days of the session is equivalent to the killing of the measures.

In the case of a measure which can be considered fairly, and understood on its merits in the House, and which ought, if passed at all, to be passed at once, any member of the House can, with all faith to the House and respect to its committees, move to put it upon its passage. I trust that upon a question whether men otherwise qualified to cast their votes, but not registered, shall be permitted to vote, there can be no political division in this House. I trust that political divisions in the House are not to rest upon the question whether we are to permit or to prevent legal voters from casting their votes in this District where we have jurisdiction. I have heard no argument from anybody who seems to have read this resolution that can for a moment have any weight upon the question of postponement. I now call the previous question.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 57, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Herrick, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfschich, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Prun, Radford, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—57.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

During the roll-call, Mr. THAYER stated that he was paired for to-day and to-morrow upon all political questions with his colleague, Mr. RANDALL, or he would have voted no.

Mr. STILES stated that Mr. STROUSE was absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. WILSON announced that Mr. KASSON was detained from the House by sickness.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOTCHKISS and LE BLOND were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Thomas. Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—75.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfschich, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Prun, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—53.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question recurred on the reference of the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. On that I move the previous question.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I would like the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for a few moments to make a statement.

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I desire to say that the condition of the business before the Committee for the District of Columbia is such that there is no sort of difficulty whatever in considering this bill and reporting it here and putting it on its passage on Friday next; provided a majority of the committee shall decide to report it. I hardly think that the gentleman is much afraid to trust to that committee, for a majority of its members have voted with him, and that majority can report the bill, without regard to whether the chairman is willing or not.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman had the slightest amendment to offer to such a simple proposition as this—

Mr. STEELE, of New York. I have not had an opportunity to examine the bill. The gentleman consented to refer the bill to the District Committee, and we have never had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. DAWES. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. COX. Has the bill been printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed whether it has been printed by order of the House. It may have been printed by order of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I desire unanimous consent to put an inquiry to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There was no objection.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he will permit amendments to be offered to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I will hear any amendment the gentleman will suggest. I would like to hear an amendment to so simple a proposition as this.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. There is one amendment that I would like to offer to the bill.

Mr. DAWES. Let me hear what it is.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The amendment which I wish to offer to the bill is, that in taking the oath of voters, they shall also be required to take the oath that they have been for twelve months past residents of this city and that they have no legal residence in any other place.

Mr. DAWES. I would like to know how any man can have a residence in this city and also have a residence elsewhere.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Then there can be no objection to the amendment which I propose.

The SPEAKER. The main question is ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution for the revision of the laws of the District of Columbia, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

REGISTRATION IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the joint resolution to amend the charter of the city of Washington, the first question being on its reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfschich, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Lenzar, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Prun, Radford, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweet, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Spaulding, Stevens, Thomas. Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—73.

So the motion to refer was disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] if he or any other member of the House can inform us what are the qualifications of an elector in the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Committee for the District of Columbia, of which the gentleman is a member, ought to understand that.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The committee have not had the subject referred to them. That is what we desire to have done, so that we may know if this bill needs amendment.

Mr. DAWES. I think if the gentlemen on that committee have served until this time without understanding it there would be very little prospect of their understanding it before Friday. [Laughter.] I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. The bill has never been printed, and the gentleman will not allow it to be referred so that the committee can understand it.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to lay the bill on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chandler, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalfschich, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, James R. Morris, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Prun, Radford, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—72.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The bill was passed.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to amend the title so as to make it read: "A bill to provide that the residents of Washington may vote in two places." [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I demand the previous question on the title.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The amendment to the title was disagreed to.

The title was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the title and the bill were passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KENTUCKY AND EAST TENNESSEE RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER stated that the business next in order was the consideration of joint resolution (H. R. No. 83) authorizing the President to construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio to East Tennessee, postponed on the 25th instant until to-day, and made a special order.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas, in accordance with the recommendation in his annual message of 1861, the President of the United States was authorized by an act of Congress, approved January 31, 1862, to open and construct a military railroad from the valley of the Ohio river into East Tennessee, over such route and under such conditions as in his judgment seemed just and most judicious; and whereas said act was modified and partly repealed by a joint resolution, approved July 14, 1863, restraining the President from exercising the discretion confided in him by said act; and whereas in a special message, dated April 28, 1864, in accordance with the strong recommendations of all the generals successively commanding in the department of the Ohio, the President has called the attention of Congress again to the importance of an early completion of said military railroad as a measure of economy in transportation of supplies and men to the valley of East Tennessee, as a means of suppressing the rebellion, and as a perpetual bond of Union: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to construct said military road on such route, with reference to economy, as in his judgment may be most advisable, and in such a manner as may best serve the interests of the Government and insure the most speedy completion of said road.

Mr. SCHENCK. The construction of this railroad is a subject which has attracted the attention of the military authorities of the country since the commencement of the war. The gentleman on the committee who framed the resolution has embodied so many of the reasons for passing it in the preamble that I do not think it necessary to consume any time in its discussion. I will simply say a word.

This road is needed, is essentially necessary for military purposes in holding East Tennessee, in order to keep open communication between the valley of the Ohio and East Tennessee.

I will say, in addition, that the condition of the people of East Tennessee requires that this road should be constructed to connect them with the loyal part of the Union. Their condition is such as to make this a great humanitarian measure, independent of its necessity.

In both views, then, as a military necessity for the Government and as an act of absolute mercy and justice to the people of East Tennessee, this road ought to be constructed and constructed immediately. If it had been constructed before the repeal of the former power given to the President on this subject, it would have long since more than repaid all the cost of its construction. It will not require more than fifty miles by the route proposed to connect and make a complete line.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me when he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir. It is not necessary to construct the road the whole length of what seems to be the whole line. A short link will make a complete connection.

I will add further, that the services of colored men employed by the Government and the labor of the Army combined will not make it proper that the Government should be put to any unnecessary expense; very little, indeed, if any at all, beyond the cost of the iron put down on the track. With these few remarks, I will now yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, before calling for the previous question.

Mr. MALLORY. I will detain the House but a moment. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio, for I did not hear the bill distinctly, whether the route is indicated by the bill?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not by the bill; but only as we understand from General Burnside, General Foster, and others who have been in command there, that by constructing fifty miles we will make the connection.

Mr. MALLORY. I will say to the House that some two years since, at the suggestion of leading men of Kentucky and Tennessee and myself, the President recommended the construction of a road from a point in Kentucky at or near Danville to Knoxville, in East Tennessee. I was then chairman of the Committee on Roads and Canals, and prepared a bill which the committee authorized me to report to the House, providing for the construction of a road from Danville, in Kentucky, to some point at or near Knoxville, Tennessee, on the Virginia and Tennessee railroad. While I was holding that bill in my possession, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BLAIR,] then at the head of the Military Committee of this House, reported a bill, I think, to increase the engineer force of the Army of the United States, to which he appended a section that the President should have power to construct any line of railroad, complete any incomplete line of road, or take possession of any line of railroad he might deem necessary for the operation of the Government. That was passed by the House and Senate, and became a law, and is a law yet. Deeming that the object I sought by the bill which I had been directed to report by the Committee on Roads and Canals had been secured by this, I held it in my possession, and never reported it to the House. Some time afterwards a gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Trimble, introduced a joint resolution, repealing so much of the military bill to which I have referred as authorized the construction, completion, or use of these roads. That repealing resolution passed this House, but failed to pass the Senate; and the law conferring this power on the President now stands upon the statute-book.

The President has now as much power as he will have if the pending bill be passed. I admit that is an important measure. I have tried to impress the House with my view of its importance on more than one former occasion. I am glad that it has been brought forward this morning by the gentleman from Ohio. It is important not only for the military necessities of the Government but for the uses of the people after the war is over. We have expended vast sums of money to carry on this war and sacrificed thousands and hundreds of thousands of lives the utility of which may be questioned by humanitarians; but in times to come this act will stand as a monument in our honor. History will record the fact that these thousand millions of treasure have not all been poured out without leaving a trace except in hecatombs of slain, in suffering, and destruction.

I hope this great work will be finished. By it not only will the military operations of the Government be facilitated and millions be saved to it in the transportation of Army supplies, but remote regions be brought almost into contact; and long after this war shall cease, the commercial intercourse between the far-distant sections of our country which it will establish will continue to pour its blessings on a once more happy and united nation. By it, sir, the great lakes of the North will be connected by continuous rail with the cities on the Atlantic coast and the Gulf of Mexico, and the bonds of union strengthened, should this war be brought to the conclusion so ardently prayed for by every patriot, a preserved Union, and the restoration of peace and harmony to our suffering and distracted people. Should our prayers and efforts prove in vain, should discord and war continue until our Government is destroyed, our people permanently estranged and divided, and our country become a scene of desolation and ruin, then it will not matter whether we have expended our efforts and our treasure on this great work or not.

Although I am persuaded that the President has the power under existing law to construct this road, yet I see no objection in that to the passage of this act, reaffirming that power. It may, by indicating to him the desire of this House that this work shall be constructed, incite him to commence at an early day a road that should be now finished, and which, if it had been completed a year ago, would have saved the Government, in the cost of transportation, more than twice the amount of its cost.

Mr. SMITH. The President informed me that he had some delicacy in proceeding with this matter after the action of Congress, as referred to by my colleague, [Mr. MALLORY.] The gentleman will remember that in 1862, as well as in 1863, this project was put on foot; prior, however, to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Ohio to repeal the previous action of Congress. Engineers were called out, and the route indicated upon which the road should be built. In the midst of the work which had just begun, and which if continued would have completed the road and put it in running order before this time, the action of Congress to which reference has been made was taken, and thereby the whole thing was broken up. The President has informed me that he could not, under the action of Congress, proceed with the building of the road without some further action.

Now, as has been remarked by the two gentlemen who have preceded me, this road is a short one, and makes a direct communication with eastern Tennessee, which is now the basis of operations of the army in that section of the country. The testimony of Generals Burnside and Foster before the committee was that Knoxville was an important post, the point which the Government must hold in the event the war is to continue any length of time. When the war will close none of us can tell; and as to the necessity in the future of holding Knoxville as an important military point no one can doubt. Chattanooga is south of Knoxville, and Knoxville must be supplied by sending stores first to Nashville, from Nashville to Chattanooga, and thence to Knoxville, making a distance of over six hundred miles.

It will also be seen from the geography of the country that it requires an immense force and a tremendous expenditure of money to protect those roads to prevent their being cut. A large number of bridges are upon those three roads, which are constantly being cut by guerrilla parties, and bridges burned, and supplies cut off. If this road is built from the Ohio river immediately to Knoxville—of which about one hundred and ten miles are already built—the distance will be shortened by from two hundred to one hundred and thirty miles, and that will reduce the number of men required to protect it, and reduce the expenditures of the Government in supplying that region tenfold.

In the expedition of General Burnside to West Tennessee, in 1863, no one can conceive, unless he has the figures before him, of the vast amount of money which was required to carry his army to Knoxville. No one can imagine the amount of labor which was required to prepare the roads so that wagon trains could go over them; and no man can imagine the amount of money expended in horses, cattle, and mules to transport the necessary supplies for even the small army under General Burnside. And I have no doubt that if the Government had built that road one year ago it would have saved from three to five million dollars in the short space of ten or twelve months. If that road is built now—and I understand from military gentlemen that it can be built in eight or ten months without trouble, for it runs through a fine wooded country, and will require but few bridges—it will save to this Government millions and millions of dollars; and not only that, it will enable you to hold Knoxville as a great central point, and as an essential point to the prosecution of this war. It will supply the army there; and not only there, but the army all the way down South. And it will not only supply your army and be a benefit to your Government, but I tell this House and the country that it will feed five hundred thousand people who are to-day almost in a state of starvation. It feeds within the mountain regions of East Tennessee, eastern Kentucky, and western Virginia five hundred thousand true, loyal, and devoted men, and will give back to them in a little while the bread and meat that they took from their houses and from their places of safety to feed Burnside's army when he had not a morsel of bread to give to his soldiers. You remember that when the siege of Knoxville was made by Longstreet, Burnside was unable to determine whether he could hold that place or not. He could not have held it had not these people given all they had of meat and food to his army. There are gentlemen in the city of Washington to-day who will tell you that the people came on horseback and in their horse carts and ox carts, and with baskets on their shoulders, and fed the soldiers of the country while they were defending the city of Knoxville and the whole rear of country from there to the Ohio river.

Sir, the construction of this road is a matter of justice to the Government, a matter of necessity to the Army, and a matter of humanity to those people. Unless this communication is opened, these people must necessarily leave that country. When they see that the Government is disposed to take hold of the matter and build the road and open this communication, they will stay at their homes and get along as well as they can until the road shall be completed.

Those who have observed the country will remember that from Knoxville there are roads running all through the South and connecting with all the States, with all the cities of importance, and with all the commercial points upon the coast. They will remember that from Cincinnati and Louisville there are roads diverging all through the North, and it only needs this connecting link running through the mineral regions of Kentucky into East Tennessee to have those two networks of railroads connected. As my colleague [Mr. MALLORY] has said, it will be one of the strongest bonds of union that can possibly be brought to bear. In the eastern part of Kentucky alone there is coal enough and lumber enough and minerals of various descriptions enough to supply this whole country. There is coal enough there to supply the world for fifty years if you should shut up every other known coal mine on the face of the earth. There is also the finest timber in the world there and the best people—the most industrious, the stoutest, the finest, the bravest men, and the healthiest, sweetest, and prettiest women. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. With a single explanation in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY], who first addressed the House, I shall then call the previous question. I think the gentleman is mistaken in regard to the power not having been taken away from the President. The act of Congress of January 31, 1862, being an act to authorize the President in certain cases to take possession of railroads and telegraph lines, and for other purposes, gave him, among other powers, the power "to extend, repair, and complete the same in the manner most conducive to the safety and interest of the Government." The joint resolution of July 14, 1862, is brief, and I will read the whole of it:

"That an act to authorize the President of the United States, in certain cases, to take possession of railroads and telegraph lines, and for other purposes, approved January 31, 1862, shall not be so construed as to authorize the construction of any railroads of the completion of any line of road the greater part of which remained uncompleted at the time of the approval of said act, or to engage in any work of railroad construction; and so much of said act as authorizes the President of the United States to extend and complete any railroad, is hereby repealed."

The construction given to that law is that although there need only be fifty miles of a road to be built to connect it with other roads, it is in fact the construction of a military road, and that that is forbidden by the joint resolution of July, 1862. Now, it may be that that is not a right construction. I think myself, however, that the power has been taken away from the President; and because the power has been taken away the committee propose to restore the power as to this particular road, which we think a peculiar and exceptional case in its merits. If the power does now exist, no harm can be done in reconsidering it. If it does not exist, which is the opinion of the President, then we give it to him, so far as this one road is concerned, because of its peculiar merits and the necessity for the construction of this road. I move the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will not move the previous question at this time.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the gentleman yielding the floor unless he yields unconditionally.

Mr. SCHENCK. Well, then, I cannot yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the House will not sustain the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana is not in order. He refused to allow the gentleman from Ohio to yield the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers on seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FINCK and ANDERSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 26.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 64, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Anderson, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perlman, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Wadsworth, Williams, Wilder, Windom, and Yeaman—64.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Aucona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, James S. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Gooch, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Marcy, McDowell, Morrill, James K. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pruyn, Radford, Rogers, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, William G. Steele, Stiles, Thomas, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Wilson, and Fernando Wood—56.

So the joint resolution was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. MADDLETON was paired off with Mr. BOUTWELL.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the request of the Senate for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes to the legislative, executive, and adjudicatory appropriation bill be complied with.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS. I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 483, granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad from Lake Superior to Puget sound, was re-committed to the select committee on the Pacific railroad; and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. Will it be in order to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the call for the previous question in order that I may ask him to make an explanation to the House? I want to know what he desires by his motion.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been already seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish the vote reconsidered, and then I will explain.

Mr. MALLORY. The vote on reconsideration depends very much on what the gentleman's intention is.

The question being on reconsideration, The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. MANN and GRINNELL.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 22.

So the vote was reconsidered.

The question recurred on recommitting the bill to the select committee on the Pacific railroad.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this is the same bill that has been already before the House; and I raise the point of order that it cannot be again considered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is erroneous, as the House has considered this bill, read it the first and second time, and re-committed it to the select committee, and has reconsidered that vote.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason I make the suggestion is that if the bill has been already read to the House I should not insist on its being read this time.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to know if it is the same bill that the House has already acted on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer the question.

The bill was read.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the demand for the previous question; and I also withdraw the motion to refer to the select committee, and offer a substitute for the bill. I do not intend to make a speech upon it, inasmuch as the bill has been already fully discussed. I simply want to explain the difference between the substitute which I offer and the original bill. The bill on your files is, so far as the land grants are concerned, just the same as the bill which was rejected the other day, making the charter by the Maine Legislature the charter of the company. That was objected to by many gentlemen, and the bill was lost. In order to accommodate those who objected on that ground, the bill is changed. It provides for the opening of books to receive subscriptions for the stock, in the ordinary way, the same as the Union Pacific railroad. The substitute gives the precise quantity of land as in the bill; and therefore there is no explanation necessary under that head. The difference between the bill and the substitute is, that the latitude of forty-four and a half degrees is changed to forty-five degrees. Thus the line will not encroach too closely on the Union Pacific railroad.

There is also on page 14 of the bill as originally printed an amendment made by striking out three years as the limit of time for commencing the road and inserting two years. As this is a new corporation and the stock is to be taken differently from that provided for in the bill before the House the other day, I think it proper to change the time to two years, as some objection was made to the length of time then proposed.

I have also provided that the alternate sections if sold by the Government shall not be sold under $2 50 an acre. And I have confined the alternate sections if there be land to be taken up within the limits of ten miles of the line of the road. The company are not permitted to go all over the country to select as I see in some of the bills they are allowed to do. I think it a vicious principle, and I have therefore confined it to within a limit of ten miles.

Mr. WILSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that these alternate sections are to be sold by the Government at $2 50 an acre?

Mr. STEVENS. Under the existing law they would be open to homesteads. I provide that if the Government sells them at all the Government shall not sell them at less than $2 50 per acre.

Mr. WILSON. There is nothing in the bill which interferes with the homestead law?

Mr. STEVENS. Nothing; the provision is merely that if hereafter the Government sees fit to sell the lands they shall not sell them at less than $2 50 an acre. There is no money asked for from the Government as there was no money asked for by the Maine law which was before us, the main difference being that this creates a new corporation while that granted the privileges conferred to a Maine corporation. Some changes have been made in the substitute, in the names of the persons selected as incorporators or commissioners, who are to keep the books open until the whole stock has been subscribed, after which the stockholders are to elect directors for three years.

We have reduced the time in which the road shall be commenced, and have required that a hundred miles shall be constructed within two years thereafter.

Now, as I said before, I suppose it would be tedious for gentlemen to make their old speeches over again on a bill almost precisely similar to the one rejected, and I therefore, unless some gentleman desires to ask some questions, will call the previous question.

Mr. SPALDING. I notice that the names of General McClellan and General Grant are among the corporators. I ask the gentleman if he will not allow us to put in General Fremont, so as to have one of our former friends among them?

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to inserting the name of General Fremont. I want to get all the railroad men in, and will accept the gentleman's modification.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the gentleman that if he intended to insert all the presidential candidates he has omitted the "rail-splitter."

Mr. STEVENS. Oh! this is not a rail-splitting business, it is a railroad line. [Laughter.] I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The substitute was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. Before the vote is taken I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he has taken care to provide that this road shall be built of American iron? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEVENS. It says so in the bill. I go for nothing but American iron, of course.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill has not been engrossed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the previous question on the third reading.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been ordered to be read a third time, but if the gentleman from Pennsylvania insists upon his objection, it cannot be read until it has been engrossed.

Mr. ANCONA. I will withdraw my objection. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Anderson, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Bonaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kellogg, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knapp, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Price, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Sweat, Thayer, Upson, Voorhies, Ward, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, and Winfield—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ancona, Baxter, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, Fenton, Finck, Ganson, Harrington, Herck, Holman, Hubbard, Ingersoll, William Johnson, Kabbelsch, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, Morrill, Morrison, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Stiles, Tracy, Wadsworth, Elitha B. Washburne, Joseph W. White, Wilson, and Winfield—50.

So the bill was passed.

*During the call of the roll,

Mr. WEBSTER stated that he had paired with his colleague, Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland, on this bill.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. WILSON moved that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly proceeded to consider the business on the Speaker's table, as follows:

PORT OF ENTRY FOR CHAMPLAIN DISTRICT.

An act (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The Senate have returned this bill with the following amendment:

Strike out these words:

And all vessels coming into Lake Champlain from Canada through the Richelieu or St. John's river, shall enter and report to him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill, as amended, provides that the third section of an act to equalize and establish the compensation of the collectors of the customs on the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, changing the port of entry for the district of Champlain from Plattsburgh to Rouse's Point be repealed, and that Plattsburgh be reestablished as the principal port of entry for said district, at which the collector of customs shall reside; and a deputy collector shall reside at Rouse's Point, and be vested with all the power and authority given to deputy collectors by law.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TRANSFERS FROM MILITARY TO NAVAL SERVICE.

An act (S. No. 218) to repeal the first section of a joint resolution therein named.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the bill be put on its passage.

The bill was read a first and second time.

It provides for the repeal of the first section of the joint resolution entitled "A joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service," approved February 24, 1864.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to amend the title so that it will read, "An act to repeal the first section of a joint resolution entitled 'A joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military to the naval service.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Joint resolution (S. No. 16) submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to the second reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution is as follows:

That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XIII.

Sec. 1. Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

Sec. 2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, "Shall the joint resolution be rejected?"

Mr. WILSON demanded the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 76; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Harrington, Herck, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kabbelsch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Law, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Voorhies, Wadsworth, Ward, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McClurg, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elitha B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Winfield—76.

So the joint resolution was not rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. MORRILL stated that his colleague, Mr. Woodbridge, was confined to his room by illness.

Mr. THAYER stated that he was paired with his colleague, Mr. RANDALL; otherwise he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut, stated that his colleague, Mr. BRANDEGEE, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. PIKE stated that he was paired with Mr. HARRIS, of Maryland.

Mr. LAZEAR was paired with his colleague, Mr. MOORHEAD; otherwise he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. STROUSE, if present would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. EDEN stated that his colleague, Mr. W. J. ALLEN, was absent on account of illness.

Mr. COX stated that his colleague, Mr. McKINNEY, had gone home with the dead body of a soldier.

Mr. ANCONA stated that his colleagues, Mr. RANDALL and Mr. MILLER, if present would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. GRINNELL stated that Mr. JULIAN was called away by the death of his father-in-law.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The joint resolution was read a second time.

Mr. WILSON. I do not propose to occupy the floor myself, but will yield to my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORRIS.]

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman intend to press it to a vote to-day?

Mr. WILSON. I do not. I desire to afford a fair opportunity for discussion to both sides of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the vote be taken this week?

Mr. WILSON. It is suggested that the House take a recess until seven and a half o'clock this evening, after my colleague upon the committee has concluded his remarks. Other gentlemen desire to speak upon the subject, and I hope the House will take a recess, with the understanding that there shall be no vote taken to-night.

The SPEAKER. That motion can be made now.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move that at the conclusion of my colleague's remarks the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock, with the understanding that no vote shall be taken and no business done this evening.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope that will not be done to-night. This bill has passed the Senate and there can be no hurry in pressing it to a vote. A few days' discussion will not delay business at all.

Mr. WILSON. I do not intend to hurry it to a vote.

Mr. PENDLETON. We do not wish to go on with the discussion to-night.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the gentleman will not object to such an arrangement for this evening, and we can come to some understanding hereafter as to the time when we shall take a vote upon the proposition. I am not disposed to cut off debate, but intend to allow a reasonable time for that discussion.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the House will allow me I will ask the gentleman from Iowa whether some of his friends are ready to go on with the discussion to-night? If that be the case I will not object to an evening session.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot say positively whether they are ready or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that he has the names of several gentleman who desire to speak upon this subject.

Mr. PENDLETON. But probably not to-night. It was not expected that the subject would come up at this late hour of the day. I will not object if the gentleman knows that his friends want to go on to-night. We do not.

The SPEAKER. It is understood that there is to be no vote to-night.

Mr. PENDLETON. What I want to guard against is this: the gentleman will say to us to-morrow, "You had all last evening to discuss this matter, and nobody was ready." If gentlemen on the other side wish to discuss this bill to-night I will not object.

Mr. WILSON. I shall not meet the gentleman with any such statement to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire the gentleman from Iowa to state whether he will or will not press a vote during the week. I hope he will give us at least a week to discuss the bill.

Mr. WILSON. I can only say that I shall allow a reasonable time. If the discussion can be closed this week, well; if not it will go over until next week. I desire to have the bill fairly discussed, allowing a fair opportunity to that side of the House for discussion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I did not hear the gentleman's remark, and I desire to ask him a question. Does the gentleman intend to press this matter to a vote this week, provided there are gentlemen who still desire to discuss it?

Mr. WILSON. I intend to be reasonable on the subject.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then I understand the gentleman to say he will not press the question to a vote this week, provided gentlemen still desire to discuss it?

Mr. WILSON. I do not say that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are several special orders this week, and the consideration of the tariff bill was postponed until one day this week.

Mr. MORRILL. I shall ask the House to consider the tariff bill on Thursday, and to continue its consideration from day to day until disposed of. Therefore there will be very little time this week for a long discussion if the House take up that bill; and if the House desires an early adjournment, as I think they do, they will have to have some evening sessions.

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

The motion for an evening session was agreed to; and it was agreed, by unanimous consent, that no vote should be taken and no business done during the evening session.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SHANNON asked leave of absence for ten days for Mr. McBride.

Leave was granted accordingly.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home;

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili; and

An act (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the questions which now engross so much of the public attention as to the status of the several States in rebellion, and just what disposition shall be made of them when finally subdued, are increasing in interest. Upon these points loyal men are known to differ; hence an examination and a discussion of them may be profitable. My own convictions are that much of the difficulty in this, as in numerous other instances which have perplexed and divided our counsels since the organization of our Government, grows out of an element known to be at war with its avowed purposes. If each State in the Union had a republican form of government in fact, I apprehend there would be no controversy upon this subject. Or, to be explicit, were there no slavery all difficulty would vanish.

The truth is, that since the formation of the Federal Government its legislation has not only been embarrassed, but at times it has been wholly impeded by reason of this system. To such an extent has this influence prevailed that nearly every interest of the nation has been made to serve its purposes. And now, when in its death struggles it wields a giant's arm, and is as imperious as ever, its ruling passion increases as it approaches its dissolution. It is not surprising, therefore, that at this eventful period we find conflicting opinions. Not a few, I have no doubt, are influenced by a recollection of an alliance through which they and their political associates secured and for years held the ascendancy in the nation. They are in favor of a return of the revolted States to the Union; but they wish them to return unshorn of the power through which they again hope to secure the control of national affairs. "A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind."

Others when they contemplate this matter advert to the past. They recall the practical workings of slavery, they remember its tyrannical rule, its unholy aims, and they see its present wicked enormities. Such desire a return of those misguided States, but they insist it must be without this element of inevitable mischief. Hence each man modifies his views as he is inclined for or against the institution of slavery. In this I condemn the motives of no one. I only recite the facts, and leave it for others to judge; for every one knows a sailor at mast-head may perceive an approaching sail, while his companions on deck can see nothing but the distant horizon and the receding waves. It does not follow that those of the deck are deficient in vision, but I apprehend it does show he of the mast-head has the advantage in stand-point. In this way I account in part for the discrepancy of opinions in this Hall and in the country. For the same reason also the averments of one man are entitled to more regard than are another's. But while I account for this conflict of views, I can hardly excuse that perversity which stubbornly remains on deck and will neither ascend nor be admonished by those at the mast-head.

But to the question, what is the status of the States in rebellion? Are they really in or are they actually out of the Union? Paradoxical as it may seem, I hold they are neither, and yet are they both. Suppose the officers and crew of any Federal vessel should mutiny and run out a piratical flag, would this act absolve the mutineers from allegiance to the Government? When the malcontents are subdued, should they be restored to command? May they insist upon the control of the recaptured vessel? By their acts they have forfeited this privilege, and yet they are amenable to the laws. They owe the fealty of a citizen without a citizen's rights. There can be no question as to the status of the vessel. Why should there be as to who shall command it? Should this be done by piratical outlaws, or by men of unquestioned loyalty? A highwayman by transgression does not absolve himself from obedience to the law he has trampled upon and defied. As far as allegiance, duty, and obligation are concerned his condition is unchanged, but he has no voice at the ballot-box, he may not hold an office of trust, nor can he participate as a witness or juror in any of our courts. He is a felon, he wears the taint and the disabilities of a felon. No one complains of this except the transgressor.

When Cromwell usurped the Government in Great Britain all kingly rule was suspended. He attempted to institute a new form of government, and was temporarily successful. Yet upon the death of this usurper and the dispersion of his adherents, the royal family were restored, and the suspended Government revived. Did the rulers in this instance ask the consent or seek the coöperation of those who had aimed to subvert the Government by force? Yet they were subjects of the realm as absolutely as were the adherents of the Crown. There was no difficulty here; and why? The English Government was homogeneous in all of its parts. It was monarchical, and whatever was not in harmony with this was swept out of being. The consequences were, recuperation and longevity; the fruit, stability and prosperity. May we not profit by this example?

A Government to be stable must be homogeneous. "A house divided against itself cannot stand."

Wherein do the rebellious States differ from the piratical crew, the outlawed felon, or the English usurpers? Ambitious men have usurped not destroyed the several State governments at the South—they now traitorously hold them and defy the Federal authority. These felons maintain their usurpations by force, and menace the Government with formidable armies. It is proposed to disperse these armies, capture their leaders, and restore order in these unfortunate States. This being done, what is their position? May they claim a restoration to the places and the power they have forfeited by willful abuse? This is not the usual rule, nor is it just. These States, while they may not claim the prerogatives of loyal constituents of the Union, yet are they as actually subject to its dominion and power as if they never had rebelled. I go further; a State can no more secede from the Union than can the arm from the natural body. The arm may be severed by force, but irreparable disaster would follow. A State may be separated from the body-politic of which it is a member by revolution, but peacefully, rightfully, never. The efficiency and completeness of the corporate whole would be destroyed by the act.

I insist the inhabitants of these States may be treated in a twofold light. The Government against which they have sinned may elect to try and punish them under the civil law or under the laws of war. Or it may elect to punish some under one and some under the other. The civil code would be to them what the divine law is to rebellious man. By this they are condemned already. They are adjudged traitors, and they must meet a traitor's doom. But under the laws of war, as under the system of grace, there may be mercy. The former would annihilate them, the latter extends pardon and forgiveness upon repentance and faith evidenced by appropriate fruit. Man, by rebelling against the government of God, did not thereby absolve himself from allegiance. His duties and his obligations remained the same as before his transgression. The Jews did not obtain the inheritance by murdering the heir, but by reason thereof they lost their own birthright and others supplanted them.

So it is with the rebels. They owe fealty to the Union as ever, but being felons they have forfeited their birthright. Any other rule would be destructive of government, and place virtue and vice upon a common level. The safety of society, as well as the laws of God, demands this interpretation.

Why, then, do men differ? It is owing to the stand-point they severally occupy. The lookout of each is from some point upon his own partisan barge.

It is well known that some four years since the Democratic fleet, then anchored at Charleston, through the mutiny of its commanders, if not hopelessly wrecked, was divided and thoroughly scattered. Some of this armament, with damaged timbers and tattered sails, still struggle against adverse winds, hoping to regain its former supremacy. The flag-ship, the most rotten of them, has been refitted, and is now cruising in our southern waters with the ensign of treason defiantly floating from its mast-head.

Another of these ill-fated vessels, more sound, yet quite leaky and unsafe, is found in our northern waters, from which the stars and stripes still float; but its officers, with some noble exceptions, are ready to compromise with these mutineers and even to make base submission for the purpose of again reuniting their fortunes and fleet under its former command.

There is another barge. It is the Union. From its mast-head and capacious deck its officers and men have their lookout. It is now recruiting. New Hampshire, Connecticut, Maryland, and Rhode Island have recently greeted this noble vessel and sent such tokens to its patriotic crew as will quicken their efforts, cheer their hearts, and stimulate to deeds which will enable them to subdue all enemies and again bring back the wayward fleet to allegiance and to its ancient moorings.

But I digress. I repeat, why do men differ? I again answer, it is attributable to the workings of slavery. Our State governments are not homogeneous. To this fact we may attribute our past troubles and the present revolt. Were there no slavery the problem were solved. Hence I may as well say it here as elsewhere, that, like an evil spirit in man, there can be no rest, no health, no peace, no permanent prosperity until the turbulent and wicked devil is cast out and utterly destroyed. There is no alternative. We must have two Governments and eternal estrangement and border feuds, or one nation with slavery, or with freedom only in all of its parts. The question is, which will we have? The answer to this, as I believe, involves the happiness of coming generations, and also the perpetuity of a Government admitted by those who seek to destroy it, "with all its defects to come nearer the objects of all good government than any other on the face of the earth."

I conclude, therefore, that the revolting States are still in the Union. The converse would concede the right of secession, and stamp the present war as unjust. But these States can have no voice in the enactment of law or in amending the Constitution until they are pardoned and restored to their forfeited rights. Is this too severe? I hold this is a charitable view; and as they suffer the consequences, they may severally exclaim in truth,

"The thorns which I have reaped are of the tree
I planted; they have torn me, and I bleed;
I should have known what fruit
Would spring from such a seed."

I now come to the question, what shall be done with these States when subdued? I answer, amend the Constitution so as to for ever prohibit slavery in the Union, and then discriminate in pardoning the rebels in such a manner as to restore to citizenship such as were not voluntarily in hostility to the Federal Government. This involves the further inquiry, what power has Congress in this behalf? In discussing this I hope I shall be pardoned for adverting to some elementary principles, and also for quoting largely from our organic law. Man's moral and intellectual growth, as well as his weakness, constrains to intercourse and communion with his fellows. Society is an admitted necessity, and government its natural fruit. Out of society man is independent, and subordinate to no one but his Maker. In society, equality exists; but the new relation begets duty and responsibility from man to man. It is a principle in mechanics that what is gained in power is lost in velocity. It is conceded in ethics that each good, every substantial benefit, has its counter-check. Analogous is society and government; to secure the general, certain specific advantages must be surrendered. Each individual makes some sacrifice, and thereby obtains a guarantee of protection. Therefore each member upon entering society covenants to yield his particular to the general good, and to so comport as to infract none of the rights of others, and also not to incapacitate himself for the discharge of the duties growing out of the social relations. There is mutuality of interest, equality of rights, and a positive undertaking by each member to protect and defend the aggregate and also each constituent part. The enforcement of these duties and the redress of a breach of this covenant require the enactment and the enforcement of law. Therefore the founders of our Government adopted and we indorse the cardinal truths:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Under this authority some have strangely sought to justify the rebellion of the southern States. It should be borne in mind that the power conferred by this instrument is upon an entire, not an integral part of a people, and its exercise is limited expressly to the altering or the abolishing of a Government that has become destructive of certain enumerated rights. I find no warrant in this for the secession of a State, but on the contrary I find authority directing the people (the Federal Government) to alter and abolish any law or constitution whenever the public interests demand it. We sometimes err in supposing that our Government and the people are distinct entities. Hence we hear of the Government's exactions and tyranny. The truth is, the Government and the people are identical.

The Executive of the nation, the Legislature, and the Judiciary, are not severally nor are they jointly the Government; they are only servants. They represent and act for the sovereign people, and to them must yield obedience and render an account. This common error is a source of much mischief. Many suppose they may assail the Government and embarrass its action with impunity, not reflecting that by so doing they injure their own interests. In ordinary business a similar proceeding would excite suspicions of insanity. Others claim to discriminate between the Government and the Administration, and while they profess to respect the former, they abuse the latter. What is a Government? It is "the body of persons charged with the management of the executive power of a country." What is an Administration? "The collective body of persons who direct the Government of a country." I leave it for others to discriminate between them. It seems to me it were wise to aid the Administration which represents the people in the discharge of trusts in which each man has an immediate interest.

When the doctrines I have quoted were first announced, the original colonies were dependents. The instrument that gave them to the world also abrogated the power of the Crown and declared the colonies free and independent. In 1787 the people of these colonies, then States, being the only authority in the land, ordained and established a Constitution. This Constitution contains the following expressive preamble:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

Thus the sovereign power of the nation, for the purpose of perfecting the work so well begun in 1776, incorporated the elementary principles of the original Bill of Rights into their organic law. In the adoption of this instrument the several States in their corporate capacity are unknown, but without regard to geographical or corporate boundaries the people carved out and perfected a Government for the purposes so forcibly and eloquently expressed in the preamble of our national charter. If the framers of this instrument omitted any clause by oversight or mistake, may their descendants remedy this and perfect the plan of their ancestors? No one will doubt this, unless the Constitution inhibits it, or unless it would infract some reserved right of the States. Upon this point let the Constitution speak. Article six, subdivision two, provides:

"The Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Thus the people of the United States, by their voluntary act, ordained and established a Constitution which is not only paramount, but it is the fundamental law of the nation. It expressly subordinates each State, and declares that any act of legislation, or any adjudication therein, which conflicts with the provisions of this fundamental law, shall be utterly void. A State, then, sustains the same relation to the Union that an individual does to society. They are constituents, are severally equal, severally dependent, and actually subordinate to the whole. The converse would create several sovereign heads in one Government, which would be as destructive to harmony and strength as would several heads in one family. Thus we have one unbroken chain from the individual to society, from society to the State, from the State to the nation: "all are parts of one stupendous whole."

Once more I quote from the Constitution, article five:

"The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution; or, on the application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for preparing amendments, which in either case shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress."

The power to amend the Constitution is express. The only remaining points are: first, is it necessary for Congress and the States to exercise this power? Second, what States may participate in such amendment as provided by article five just quoted?

As to the second point, I have already shown that the revolting States are within the Union so far as fealty and obedience are concerned; but as far as having a voice in the enactment of laws and amending the Constitution, they are out of the Union. Till they are pardoned and restored to favor, they are not to be counted among the States of the Union. Wherefore three fourths of the now loyal States are competent and they alone are to be heard in ratifying any amendment of the Constitution that may be proposed.

Upon the remaining question, is it necessary for Congress and the loyal States to exercise the power conferred, I remark it depends much upon the question whether slavery should be cherished or destroyed.

The framers of the Constitution knew little of the true character of slavery. It was reserved for their descendants to learn this by an experience bitter and expensive. Few persons at the moment realize the danger of the first error. The snow-flake when associated with kindred particles forms a barrier of strength. The imperceptible process of evaporation furnishes the nucleus around which concentrated drops expand to an ocean. Nature generates unseen the subtle essences which nourish the embryo shoot until it becomes a stalwart oak. How similar is life! The infant thought, at first as gentle as the snow-flake, intangible as is evaporation's breath, imperceptible as the agents that minister to the growth of the forest tree, by as quiet and as certain a process, becomes irresistible as an avalanche and deep as fathomless waves. In Governments, one improper influence is permitted to attain, one unpretending precedent obtains, others cluster around, until they become too powerful to be resisted. These are the lessons of experience. We have graduated in this school. Our education has been expensive, as is evidenced by an impoverished Treasury and desolated hearthstones. Shall we profit by the tuition? I aver no nation can violate any moral law without incurring a penalty. No member of society, no matter how weak or humble, can be oppressed without injury to the whole. It is an inexorable law. There is a system of compensation in the economy of God, and applicable to nations and individuals, as inevitable as that fire will burn. We may not admit it, but time will realize the fact. We may not recognize the hand, but the chastening will come as certainly as that God is just. Legislators as well as divines should remember these truths.

Not a few attribute our troubles and sufferings to the agitation and discussion of this subject. I might reply, remove the cause and discussion will cease. But I have another answer. I knew a man; he was a noble and generous companion, endowed with wonderful powers of mind and of unusual business capacity. Industry and sobriety won him wealth and position. But in an unguarded hour he allowed his cups to obtain the mastery. His wasting fortune, his broken health, his neglected business, his weeping family, all evidenced the effects of the first error. His neighbors remonstrated as was their right, pointed to the cause, and kindly advised a reformation. Poor man, he only railed at them as intermeddling fanatics, who had destroyed his business and beggared his family. He persisted in his course till his head was actually severed from his body as he lay unconscious upon an adjacent railway. Was it the friendly counsels, the truthful admonitions, the Christian efforts of these friends that wrought his ruin, or was it the law of inevitable compensation? I have supposed it was transgression and not the preaching of Noah that destroyed his contemporaries. We may attribute our misfortunes to erroneous causes, but we shall learn the fact that they follow transgression as certainly as that gravitation is an established law. This is attested by history; and the events of the last three years are fearful illustrations.

Once more: our fathers permitted slavery from a supposed necessity. This was their first error. They expected it would become extinct under the workings of the Constitution. This was a second error. Others followed, and since the formation of our Government millions have been enslaved. An entire race has been deprived of all social rank, barred our schools, shut out from the gospel, and then held to be inferior for not rising in spite of their hinderances to an equality with the Saxon in the enjoyment of each of these privileges. Under our Government the African is a nondescript; he is not a man, nor yet is he a brute; he has no rights nor the protection of either; he has no resting place, no refuge within this land of liberty and Christianity, and yet he is the only innocent party within its entire boundaries. Tell me where he may rear the home altar and enjoy unmolested the companionship of wife and children. Up to this hour, such is the force of prejudice, that if, rising above and forgetting the inhuman treatment of our Government, the colored man enters our armies and imperils his life in its defense, he is denied not only the pay but the protection of a soldier. And yet we crave Heaven's blessing.

Had slavery been content with despoiling the colored race only, its existence, I doubt not, might have been prolonged for years. But, in its greed, its exactions reached beyond: It inaugurated a plan of adding territory, by conquest and purchase, to our already immense unpopulated domain, for the avowed purpose of creating slave States, that an equilibrium might be preserved between freedom and slavery. What a scheme in a free Government! It was a procedure as prudent and quite as certain to be productive of good as it would be if a Christian church, for the promotion of harmony and a growth in grace, should, upon the receipt of each saint, admit an avowed infidel and libertine into its communion. Satisfy me that a union of holiness and sin, a blending of heaven and hell are essential to harmony and peace, and I will admit not only the policy but the wisdom and justice of retaining the system of slavery in our Government.

Territory was acquired, and yet slavery with all of its efforts could not compete with the enterprise and progress of freedom. Seeing this, and maddened by disappointment, it abrogated its solemn covenants and commanded the Federal Government to create a slave State in Kansas. Failing here, too, with a mendacity known only to unmixt wickedness, it resolved to rule or ruin the nation. To this end it entered, corrupted, and divided our churches and political parties, incarcerated Christian men and women for teaching the alphabet, waged war against free speech, framed new issues, prostituted the ballot-box, suborned legislators, and even polluted the pure robes of the judiciary with its guilty hands. But, as if its cup of iniquity were not full, it placed a frigid ingrate in the Executive chair, surrounded him with its instruments, and then bade the old man worship and obey it. I should except the patriot Cass, who in the trying hour nobly preferred his country to his place. Thus strengthened and guarded, with a fiendish malignity slavery grasped the implements of war, drained the coffers of the nation, and rushed to the destruction of a Government upon whose bounty and forbearance it had been nurtured and fed; and when with uplifted dagger it threatened the nation's life, men were found, ay, men at the North, who gravely asked the Government to pause and examine the Constitution to see if there was any express clause in that instrument permitting the exercise of the power of self-preservation. The superannuated old man did pause. The marshaled hosts, the millions of expended treasure, the bleaching bones and the uncoffined ashes of half a million of brave men now scattered upon a thousand hills and valleys, are among the consequences. The scarlet waters of a hundred sweeping rivers, and the crimsoned earth dyed with patriot blood, cry out against this wicked act. The deep wailings in the land, the drooping head of age, the weeping wife and mother as she prays and watches for the absent, all witness against the criminal neglect of an Executive steeped in slavery and doomed to eternal infamy. God forgive the State that bore this degenerate son!

Self-preservation! it is engraven upon each soul by the finger of God. It is an instinct in every breast. It is recognized by every being on earth, except such as have lost their humanity through the influence of this damned sin. Self-preservation! it is written in every constitution in Christendom; it underlies all Governments, and is tolerated even by those absolute monarchies where the tyrant's will is the only law. Pause to examine the Constitution when the assassin's dagger is at my breast! I would first hurl him to the earth and trample him to dust, and then vindicate my act by the universal approval of mankind, and also by the laws of Almighty God. Violate the Constitution to save the life of the nation! It is absurd. There can be no such thing. He who hesitates to repel the assault when the nation's life is imperiled, not only violates this instrument by the act, but he is a coward—he who refuses is a traitor.

We see that slavery, after despoiling the African, has steadily and aggressively advanced in its exactions and lusts, till it is now thundering at our gates and threatening the nation's existence. Shall we yield this? The nation and slavery cannot both live. Which is of the greater value? I say destroy this monster at once, root out this noxious plant, leave not a fiber to again sprout and choke the tree of liberty planted by our fathers. We have the power; the necessity is apparent; therefore let us perform this duty and save the nation. To stop short of this is a criminal truce.

Sir, this is not a mere struggle between the North and the South; it is a conflict between two systems; a controversy between right and wrong. This is not a war between the Puritan and the Cavalier; freedom begat the former and slavery the latter. They are only instruments in the hands of their respective creators.

Mr. Speaker, the present American Congress occupies a position at this moment of greater responsibility than has devolved upon a like body since the year 1776. The events of an entire century transpire in a year. The United States have made more history in the three years last past than can be written out in an ordinary lifetime. Our action upon this question will adorn or forever sully one of its pages. Our action this day will give perpetuity to a nation of freemen or of slaves. By our action at this time shall we be honored or execrated by the millions who shall people the continent of the West. The eyes of a world are upon us; the hopes of the oppressed, the interests of freedom in every land hang upon our decision, and the blessings or the cursings of Almighty God await our final proceedings.

Mr. HERRICK obtained the floor.

The House then took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., (Mr. L. MYERS occupying the chair as Speaker pro tempore), and resumed the consideration of joint resolution of the Senate No. 16, submitting to the Legislatures of the several States a proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Speaker, as I intend to vote against this proposition to tamper with the Constitution of our fathers, which I have been taught to reverence as a masterpiece of wisdom in statesmanship, and as being the foundation of the most perfect system of human government ever devised by man, it is but proper that I should state to the House and the country some of the reasons which impel me to make the record I intend upon the question of the passage of this important resolution. I have, however, no hope that anything I may say will affect the action of this House upon the measure now pending; but for all that, as the Representative of a constituency as deeply interested in the perpetuation of the American Union as any other population within its borders, I feel it to be my duty as well to raise my voice against this measure as to record my vote. My remarks, however, will be brief, and, I hope, pertinent to the question before the House.

In the first place, Mr. Speaker, I am impelled by my understanding to regard the introduction of this pregnant resolution at this particular time, during the progress of a terrible war, and amidst the very clashing of arms and the slaughter of our citizens by tens of thousands, a war prosecuted professedly for the enforcement of the laws and the preservation of the Constitution we propose to amend, only as another of the ill-devised and malicious measures of the political dynasty in power, especially designed to protract the desolating conflict, and to render entirely impossible the ultimate restoration of the Union after our armies shall have completely overcome and dispersed the armed force of the rebellion.

To my mind, this is a disunion measure; and in my view the adoption of this resolution by Congress, and its subsequent incorporation into the Constitution through the assent of "bogus" State organizations to be improvised for the occasion, under the President's one tenth amnesty proclamation or the reconstruction bill introduced by the distinguished gentlemen from Maryland or new States to be organized by dividing old ones, as in the case of West Virginia, or created out of Territories not having a sufficient number of inhabitants to entitle them to a single Representative upon this floor—I say the adoption of this measure under such circumstances can have no other effect than to seal forever the dissolution of the Union declared by the seceding States three years ago, however superior the northern States may prove in military power.

Sir, this resolution is nothing else than a disunion measure. It means nothing else than eternal disunion and a continuous war. Its design could have been only to widen the existing breach between the Union and the slave States now in rebellion, and to render peace upon any acceptable terms to the South unapproachable. It will give the rebel leaders a new pretext for continuing in arms, for it is virtually a formal declaration of Congress and the northern people that submission to the Federal authority and a renewal in good faith of their allegiance to the Government will profit them nothing in the way of securing to themselves and their posterity the rights which the Constitution, as their fathers and our fathers made it, guarantees to all the States. I mean the right to regulate their own internal affairs, to determine their own system of labor, to control their own social institutions, to have slavery or leave it alone, to fix the status of their inhabitants severally, and to give or withhold the rights of citizenship and suffrage as they may see fit, and to exercise the attributes of absolute sovereignty in all matters not especially delegated to the General Government.

This resolution, which strikes at the original compact between the several States, and which, I apprehend, is to be "put through" and forced into the Constitution "by hook or by crook," by the creation, if necessary, of new or bogus States enough to insure for it the requisite indorsement of the Legislatures of three fourths of those which the ruling power may please to reckon in the Union, will, in my judgment, close the last avenue to a reconciliation of our present sectional difficulties, and in the eyes of the world will furnish sufficient justification for continued resistance on the part of those States which may not be allowed to freely participate in making this virtually new Constitution—new, because this amendment will absolutely upset the social organization in which the people of the slaveholding States were bred, while it will disturb the rights of property among them, disarrange all their industrial pursuits, and completely wipe out of existence, without compensation, the patrimony of a multitude of innocent people, many of whom may not have participated in the rebellion in any degree.

Do the advocates of this measure want the old Union restored? Are they desirous of having this sanguinary contest terminated in the return of the southern States to their allegiance? Do they wish to reestablish fraternal relations through an honorable peace with those people who are now in rebellion, and are they ready, through the coöperation of a reconciled South, once more to form a united country that we may again take our place in the front rank of the nations of the earth? If so, I beg them to pause before they consummate this momentous action. How can they expect to get the seceded States back into the Union by enacting measures to keep them out, is a question that has been pertinently asked; and here I ask it again of the supporters of this resolution. Why, if they be really desirous of restoring the Union, will they not drop the negro and cease to tamper with the Constitution until peace shall once more spread her wings within our borders?

The Constitution as framed by the founders of our Government should be the bond of peace. Fidelity to its provisions and strict adherence to its considerate compromises is the sacred duty of all who have shared its blessings. It was designed as the guarantee of reciprocal advantages and the anchor of safety for contested rights. It is an instrument of harmony, wrought out of discordant elements and various sectional and conflicting interests, to secure a glorious sisterhood of coequal States in one majestic nation, for a common destiny. That majestic nation I would preserve in all its greatness and glory. I would not sacrifice it nor abate a solitary square mile of its territory for the freedom of all the negroes ever born in Africa, much less for the poor satisfaction of wreaking vengeance upon the wretched and thwarted traitors who have vainly sought to destroy it by rebellion and secession. I would freely pardon every traitor that breathes the southern air if thereby I could save the Union and restore our bleeding country to peace and tranquillity.

If the object of this bloody war is really to restore the Union, as its promoters would have us believe in spite of their disunion policy, I have never been able to understand why slavery, or the condition of the negroes of the South, should have any more necessary connection with it than the horses, mules, and other property of that section of the country. If the aim of the Administration is to compel the insurrectionary States to perform their duties under the Constitution—and that should be its only aim in this war—to pay duties on imports to the Federal Treasury, and to yield obedience to Federal authority in all respects like the other States, it seems to me to be folly in the extreme to war upon the tenure of any description of southern property. But my understanding is at fault, Mr. Speaker, if the party in power have any such intention. On the contrary, they seem to have ingeniously and successfully devised a system of measures looking directly to the complete destruction of the very rights of which the southern people are most jealous and which the Crittenden resolutions declared should be respected and protected. Instead of seeking to restore the States to the Union with their constitutions and rights unimpaired, it has now become the avowed object of the party in power to prevent the restoration of a solitary State with any of its independent rights. The reconstruction bill which passed this House the other day, as well as the measure now under consideration, amounts to a full confession of such a policy.

In view of the recent gratifying achievements of our arms, it seems to me, sir, that it would be wise in the further prosecution of the war to confine our policy to the use of force against force; and not, by aggressive legislation like that we have now under consideration and that which we have been maturing for the last six months, to blast the love and repel the attachment to the Union that may be still lingering in the breasts of tens of thousands of honest citizens of the South who have been rebels only by compulsion, on account of the inability of the Government to protect them in their loyalty and crush the rebel authorities, which they have been forced to support and obey upon their peril.

Why will not our friends upon the other side of the House let this whole negro question rest until we shall have subdued the rebellion; or at least, why will they not leave it to abide its fate at the hands of the military department? While we are conquering the rebellion, Mr. Speaker, we should learn to conquer our prejudices and contemplate the obnoxious domestic institutions of the South in a spirit of patriotism and toleration as did the considerate statesmen who laid the foundation of the Government upon compromises and concessions which must still be perpetuated if we would preserve that Government from the convulsions which now threaten its overthrow, and which can never be quieted by any rough-shod measures like this. While we are expending life and treasure without measure, and learning to look upon blood and carnage with composure, is it too much to ask of the politicians who now direct the affairs of the Government to sacrifice their political theories, it may be their philanthropic impulses or their humanitarian philosophy, as well as their partisan prejudices and party affinities, for the sake of our suffering country? If negro emancipation is found to stand in the way of the reestablishment of our free and united Government, upon the principles and compromises which guided our fathers in its original construction, is it not their high and patriotic duty to let the negro slide while we reconcile the dreadful sectional antagonism which is deluging the land with the best blood of our people?

Sir, the assumption that slavery is the cause of this war, and that there can be no union of these States while slavery is tolerated in any of them, is a position which the facts do not warrant or justify. The Union, according to my understanding, was established upon the idea that a free Government could exist when composed of independent States, of various geographical positions, and possessing altogether different systems of social organization, for common purposes; and the assumption of the Republicans, to which I refer, is an argument not only against the rights of States to govern themselves, but it is a concession that the great principle contended for in the Revolution of 1776, after a trial of eighty years has proved a failure, and that we are now carrying on a gigantic civil war to establish a consolidated central Government upon a homogeneity of interests. Success in this undertaking would only undo what our fathers accomplished in 1776. But, sir, in my judgment this can never be accomplished.

Before we can have any right to expect peace, Mr. Speaker, and such a peace as will reconcile the people of the two sections again to live together under one Government and present to the world a united and prosperous country, the glowing fanatics of the party now in power must cease to breathe threatenings and slaughter upon the southern people for the sin of slaveholding, and cease to clamor for extermination, general confiscation, and universal emancipation. The history of mankind, Mr. Speaker, should teach us that if we would have this Government reunited with equal rights and equal privileges to the States, that end must be brought about by other agencies than military force and unforgiving hate. Sir, I believe there have been times in the progress of this war when the exercise of a little wisdom on the part of the Administration and the manifestation of a conciliatory policy might have closed it with honor and without humiliation on the part of either of the belligerents; but those opportunities have been invariably destroyed by some exasperating proclamation, order, or act on the part of the Government, apparently especially designed to drive the minds of relenting rebels into more desperate enmity. Sir, the resolution we are now considering is one of those measures the adoption of which can have no other than an embarrassing effect upon the negotiation which must inevitably precede a restoration of amicable relations between the now antagonist sections of our unhappy country, if such relations should ever be reestablished.

Sir, the slavery issue, which this resolution seeks to finally settle in a summary manner by the immediate abolition of slavery, is legitimately merged in the higher issue of the right of the States to control their domestic affairs, and to fix each for itself the status, not only of the negro, but of all other people who dwell within their borders. That is the great question involved in the resolution now before the House. It must be recollected, Mr. Speaker, that even in the free States we have diverse local laws to regulate the status of different classes of people. While some of the western States have, or have had, laws forbidding negroes to come within their lines to reside either as freemen or slaves, some of the New England States, under the Know-Nothing fanaticism, enacted that men born in foreign countries should not become citizens or be entitled to the elective franchise until after a probationary residence of twenty-one years, and California has a code applicable to its Chinese settlers, fastening burdens upon them to which none of its other inhabitants are subjected.

Now, sir, in resisting the various unconstitutional schemes of the President and his party in Congress to accomplish the abolition of slavery, the Democratic party have not sought to uphold the institution of negro bondage on its merits, but only to maintain the constitutional right of each State to determine for itself, as the northern States have done, what shall be the relative position of the black race in their midst; and to determine also, when they will abolish slavery, or whether they will abolish it at all. These rights, guaranteed by the Constitution, have been exercised by the northern States at their pleasure, and the Democracy hold as a principle that the southern States cannot and should not be deprived of the same privileges. The people of the several States, when the Constitution was formed, had, from their first settlement as colonists, enjoyed the right to manage their domestic and local affairs through their own legislative bodies; and when the representatives of the States came together in Convention to form the Constitution, no proposition was made from any quarter that those inherent rights should be invaded, much less surrendered. No State at that time would have yielded one tithe of those rights for the sake of a Union. They justly regarded the central Government, which they then organized, and which is the same to this day, as incompetent to manage the local affairs and regulate the domestic concerns of so many different communities; and possibly that is one reason why they were never confided to the General Government. While on the contrary, by an express provision of the Constitution, they are with jealous care especially reserved to the States, whose independence in that respect was not impaired in the least degree by the terms of the original Union. The States were all left at liberty to abolish, continue, or establish slavery as they pleased, and the right of Virginia to adhere to slavery was as clear as the right of Massachusetts, New York, and other States to abolish it.

I perfectly agree with the distinguished Senator who said that the States which adhered to slavery and continued it, it being the normal condition of the colonies, had more reason and juster grounds for complaint against the States which abolished it than those States had against such as chose to continue it. I believe also that if all the States holding slaves at the close of the revolutionary war had continued to hold them to the present time the mischievous agitation of the "negro question" by the people of some of those States would never have occurred and this rebellion would never have been heard of. If there had been no abolition in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and other States which held slaves at the organization of the Government, slavery would never have been accused of being the cause of this war, and no trouble could have arisen between the States on account of it.

Nobody, Mr. Speaker, will pretend to say, even at this day, that the Union could have been formed in the first place if the Constitution had not recognized and protected the slave institution. Sir, does anybody believe that if the representatives of a majority of the States in the Convention which framed the Constitution had insisted upon incorporating into that instrument the resolution now upon your table our Union could have been consummated? No, sir. Had New England then insisted upon the abolition of slavery we all know that the Constitution would have failed and there would have been no Union for the rebels of the present day to destroy or for us to save. This country then would have been split up into sundry confederacies, or perhaps each of the States would have been left to "go it alone."

Now, sir, the truth is that the protection which the Constitution threw around the slavery system of the South, and the guarantee it gave to the African slave trade for a period of twenty years, was in fact the very bond of our Union; for it is manifest that no Union could have been formed if those, in these days, horrid provisions had been omitted! What a terrible idea for our negro-worshipping friends on the other side of the House to contemplate!

In this view of our governmental compact—denominated by the abolitionists "an agreement with hell"—and its provisions establishing the tenure of slave property, the rights of the people of the slaveholding States in such property cannot be equitably or honestly abrogated without their consent. It is not, however, my intention to argue this point, for I am sure that I should never be able to convince the majority of this House that they have not the right by some "higher law" to abrogate every species of property belonging to a slaveholder, and to tinker the Constitution to suit themselves, and then say to the people of the South, "This shall be your Constitution; submit to it without a murmur, or we will exterminate your whole race from the face of the earth and parcel out your lands to your negroes in forty-acre lots!"

In this spirit they have conducted the war from its beginning—as full of venomous persecution toward slaveholders for the sin of slavery as was Saul of Tarsus when he made that memorable journey from Jerusalem to Damascus, breathing threatenings and slaughter against the saints! But, sir, Paul on that occasion saw a great light and heard a loud voice; and I am hopeful that before our once happy land is utterly ruined—say in the month of November next—the relentless career of the fanatics in power will in like manner be arrested by the mighty voice of the people at the polls. It cannot be possible, Mr. Speaker, that the spell of fanaticism, the incomprehensible negro mania which now reconciles the free people of this free country to the despotic power and the unconstitutional usurpations of this Administration, and impels them to the toleration of such aggressions upon the personal liberty of citizens and the rights of free speech and a free press as have been made again and again by the military power under its direction, is to last much longer. The exile and imprisonment of citizens for no crime known to the laws, the abrupt invasion of printing offices and other places of business by armed soldiers, and the arbitrary arrest of editors for the innocent publication of matters displeasing to the men in power—as in the case of the New York Journal of Commerce and the World the other day—are startling offenses against the constitutional rights of the people, which, when fully comprehended, can hardly fail to arouse a tornado of indignation among the masses that will hurl from their seats of power the arrogant despots who are now trampling under their feet the sacred charter of our liberties, even while their pliant partisans are here endeavoring, through the insidious resolution under consideration, to wrest from the States all control over their local institutions and constitute a consolidated General Government entirely different from that which our fathers instituted.

But, sir, while I forego the argument I might make upon this point and ignore all the quotations which might be impressed to sustain my position, I may be at liberty to express my humble opinion, that as there would have been no Union in the first place if the power to regulate the matter of slavery had not been left to the exclusive control of the States in their unsundered sovereignty, so now, if that power be taken from the States by this amendment of the Constitution, without permitting the southern States to participate in the formalities proposed—as they cannot participate in their present condition—disunion will be perpetuated for all time and the glory of the American Republic will never return, no matter how successful our armies may be in overcoming the physical power of the rebellion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask if this is the proper time for our people to consider so grave a measure as the amendment of the Constitution in so vital a point? We should not forget, sir, that this great charter of human rights and a free Government was framed by wise men after grave and mature deliberation, at a time when no popular excitement disturbed the public mind and no party prejudices existed to warp their judgment or influence their feelings; but, sir, we are approaching its amendment, proposing to remodel it, in the very midst of a bloody and exasperating war, when the passions of the people are inflamed with sectional bitterness and fanatical zeal, and while partisan prejudices and political animosities are swaying the popular mind almost to frenzied blindness. In the midst of this turmoil of deadly sectional strife, when truth and reason and humanity, as well as fraternity, forgiveness, and common charity have been overwhelmed by heated passion and exasperated hate, it may well be questioned if the public mind is in a proper condition to consider and pass upon any proposition to amend or in any way disturb the fundamental law upon which our very liberties are established. Mr. Speaker, this is no fitting time for such work, and I therefore pray that this House will at once wash its hands of the measure and not hesitate to disagree with the Senate in the disunion movement now under consideration.

The Constitution as it stands is the master-work of wise, experienced, and purely patriotic men—giants in intellect—whose equals, I am bold to say, are not to be found among the pigmy demagogues who wield the destinies of our country in these degenerate days. It is the matchless product of unquestioned wisdom, profound patriotism, practical justice, and approved statesmanship. Immortality has justly crowned the name of every one who participated in its making, and even the glory of the Father of his Country was augmented in being the presiding officer of the august body which gave it to the world. What a magnificent structure for the nations of the Old World to contemplate was the free Government it ordained! How wisely adjusted its division of State and national powers; its granted and reserved rights; its checks and balances; its restrictions and limitations; its adjustment of legislative, executive, and judicial functions; its studied guards against the abuse of power; and its jealous protection of the rights and liberties of the people! What wonder that it attracted the admiration of the civilized world, and what a shame that the people who have attained greatness and glory and honor and unparalleled prosperity through its protecting care should now suffer it to be destroyed by a disregard of the great principles upon which it is based, and a violation, by the administrators of the Government it created, of the sacred rights it was designed to protect. Ought we not, Mr. Speaker, as the Representatives of the people, to be deliberate and cautious when we set about amending this sacred charter of civil and religious liberty? Ought we not to hesitate long and consider well before we efface a single inscription from this monument of the wisdom and patriotism of our fathers? Can such a thing be wisely done in the present agitated state of the public mind?

Mr. Speaker, from my very heart I am constrained to say that of all the measures of this Congress apparently designed to perpetuate the disunion of these States, I regard that now under consideration the most pernicious, because it will be the most effective, and will, as I have before said, entirely close the door to a peaceful reconciliation, if it should be consummated, by incorporating the proposed amendment into the Constitution without the free consent of the States now in rebellion.

Sir, we want those rebellious States to return to the Union under the Constitution to which they owe unquestioned allegiance, and we should be careful to supply them with no justification for continued hostility to the Federal authority. We should hesitate to erect, in our hatred of slavery and slaveholders, even the slightest barrier to prevent their return to their old positions in the Union the moment their physical power shall be overcome by our military movements. In their present condition we have no right to impose upon them this proposed constitutional provision, which we know will be obnoxious, even as a punishment for their rebellion. If they are again to become a part of the General Government, they surely, after they shall so become, ought to be consulted in amending the fundamental law under which they are expected to live in communion with us. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I consider this the worst and most to be feared of all the disunion measures of this Congress, for the reason that when this resolution shall have been made, no matter how unfairly, a part of the Constitution, it will be irreparable in the second sober thought of Congress, while all the other iniquitous schemes which have been enacted to promote the rebellion and procrastinate the war may be repealed at will upon the returning reason of the people, when true patriotism, justice, and humanity shall resume their sway in the public councils and supersede the fanaticism, political profligacy, and degenerate recklessness which now pervade these legislative Halls. But, sir, this project, when consummated, becomes a portion of the organic law, and at once raises a barrier of insurmountable magnitude in the way of that peace and reconciliation which all sober-minded and truly loyal citizens hope to see accomplished the moment complete success shall crown our military operations against the rebellion.

There are a great many loyal citizens, Mr. Speaker, who stand upon that face of the three-sided platform the President laid down in his celebrated letter to Horace Greeley, which looks to the salvation of the country with slavery unimpaired; and they would molest that institution in no other way than through the movements of our military organization during the continuance of the war. No true patriot, in my estimation, will insist upon a prosecution of this horrid war for the sole purpose of extinguishing negro slavery; and yet such a purpose is now the avowed determination of the leaders of the Republican party, boldly proclaimed in the radical press. In a recent number of the New York Tribune I find the following "key-note" of that policy, which indicates that the question of saving the Union is to be entirely ignored until slavery is forever dead and buried. Listen to the shocking invocation of the Tribune which puts entirely out of sight the objects of the war, as declared by Congress and as professed by the President at its commencement:

"Friends of the wounded in Fredericksburg from the battle of the Wilderness, friends and relatives of the soldiers of Grant's army beyond the Wilderness, let us all join hands and swear upon our country's altar that we will never cease this war until African slavery in the United States is dead forever, and forever buried!"

That I take to be the war creed of the party on the other side of this House, and the proposition to amend the Constitution now under consideration is the bugle blast which directs the abolition cohorts to still prosecute the work of blood and carnage after the armed rebellion against the Government shall have been quieted.

This resolution, Mr. Speaker, contains the concentrated venom of the whole abolition crusade, and if it should be adopted while the States most interested are deprived, by their own act it may be said, of all voice in the matter, I fear the result will prove that we have gone one step too far. If this measure should be "put through," as "the powers that be" doubtless intend it shall be, if it commands a sufficient number of votes in this House, the Constitution as it was framed by our fathers, in a spirit of broad and unselfish patriotism, will have passed away. Its substitute will be but the mandate of a sectional oligarchy, the product of exasperated partisan feeling and intense hatred toward a large portion of the people who are to be compelled to live under it, against their will, after being despoiled of their property and their rights.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have already said sufficient to define my position on this question, and to satisfy my constituents of the propriety of the vote I intend to give; but before I conclude, I may be permitted to remark that if instead of adopting such measures as this, and the confiscation act, the absurd freedmen's bill, the negro forty-acre homestead project, and the Union-destroying reconstruction measure of the gentleman from Maryland, and the country were rid of all the negro legislation which now disgraces the journals of this Congress, we might reasonably hope, through the achievements of our armies in the movements now progressing, to witness the speedy restoration of the Union upon the basis of the Constitution "as it is." But, sir, our friends on the other side are after something else; and are so emphatic in their protest against any Union until slavery is abolished in all the States, as to demolish that hope. Therefore I apprehend that we will be compelled by their action to endure the contemplation of a multitude of battle-fields yet to be baptized in the best blood of the land, and to look for the further wholesale slaughter of our citizens, while we await the salvation, not of the Union, but of the negro!

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we may be able to conquer submission to the Constitution as it is, leaving the States all the rights and guarantees of the original compact; but I have no idea that we can ever make the South the slave of the North, and subject it, in its local government, to our will and pleasure. Nor do I think we ever ought to do so. I would not have the northern States assume toward the South, after all her treason and rebellion, the attitude of England to Ireland, Austria to Hungary, or Russia to Poland; but I would have the patriots of our land awake to the dangers that beset our free institutions, and willingly sacrifice not only life and fortune but opinions and prejudices and sentiment for the salvation of the country. I would have them to labor with one heart and one mind, without ha-tered or revenge, in a spirit of unbounded patriotism, for the suppression of the rebellion, the preservation of the Constitution, and the perpetuation of the Union of these States, that we may still further progress in solving the great problem of popular sovereignty. But, sir, the attempt to press the measure now under consideration in this important crisis of our national affairs indicates no such disposition on the part of the ruling powers; and we are left to the sad conclusion that while the President of the United States regards his own reelection as the chief purpose of the war, his partisans in Congress and throughout the country have determined to prosecute it solely for the enfranchisement and elevation of the negro. In their partisan blindness, seeking to attain an impossibility, let me counsel them to be cautious, lest they lose all and make shipwreck of the noble institutions erected by our fathers, and dedicated to the civil and religious liberty of the people.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York. Mr. Speaker, of all the various measures this Congress has in hand and upon which it must act, the most important in my judgment are those which most directly bear upon the terrible issue now on trial for the unity or dismemberment of our country, and which decides for weal or woe the present and future well-being of ourselves and our country. This inclination of my mind does not lead me to dissent from those who find time to consider and provide the measures necessary to our restored condition, for I agree with them that if our cause be lost it is immaterial what follows, and therefore legislate upon the foregone determination that the Union must be, and shall be, and will be preserved. Whether the revolted States are or are not in the Union is a question which is answered variously by different minds, and for myself after thinking and hearing much on the subject I am content that they are still in the Union in law, and therefore in fact, but that their governments have been and are subverted and overthrown, and that they are without a republican form of government such as the Constitution guarantees to them, and which it is our duty and privilege under the Constitution to establish. To crush and conquer this rebellion, therefore, and bring the inhabitants of the revolted States under and into obedience to the Constitution and the laws, is our first great work and bounden duty; and that done, and thoroughly done, the way to reconstruction will be clearly seen and acted on. The President in answer to a clamor, raised by those whose vocation it is to afford aid and comfort to the enemy, that he was substituting the military in place of the civil power, and in his zeal to establish civil government in those States where it has been subverted, proposed a plan which, if it had no other merit, silenced that clamor, but to be reproduced at the opposite enormity, thereby disclosed to them the greater danger of dispensing with military rule and at the same time denying to traitors the elective franchise. Whether the President's plan is entirely wise, or that of others, including that before this House, is in my judgment about equally doubtful. But the rebellion crushed, that reconstruction follows as a consequence, I have no doubt. Nor that alone; but slavery, the cornerstone of the rebellion, is thereby and therewith destroyed, leaving the way to reconstruction plain and obvious. The Congress of the United States, being the ultimate tribunal to decide whether the form of government adopted by a State entitles it to representation here under the Constitution, should do its duty promptly in aid of the event.

And here, sir, permit me to call to the stand, in proof of the fact I have just stated, the best and highest evidence possible. In his Democracy a Hebrew of the Hebrews, a slaveholder, knowing whereof he speaks, Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee—the utterance of whose name excites almost to reverence for his almost superhuman efforts and saving power put forth for the salvation of his country in this great crisis of its fate: “The people made the Government, and it must remain under the control of the people. The Government being under the people, and the institutions under the Government, any institution antagonistic to the Government must necessarily give way for the preservation of the Government. Institutions must not rise above the Government. Institutions are tolerated for a time, they are not fixed; they are subject to change, or they die out. Not so the constitutional Government, which is a fixed, a lasting institution of the people.”

situations must be subordinate to the Government of the United States. Before the rebellion we could discuss all institutions, all subjects, all measures, except slavery. On that subject no one dared speak, or write, or print, except on the side of the slave aristocracy. Now, thank God, the time has come, when the press is ununmuzzled—when the press can discuss this and all other subjects. The time has come when this institution is dead—when the chains are broken and the captive set free. The institution is dead.” * * * * * “Being dead, let us in a becoming manner prepare for the funeral obsequies. Now is the time to dispose of this great question. It is a great question, and one which must be settled upon the great principle of human freedom; not by abolitionists in the North, nor by secessionists in the South, but by that great law of self-preservation which governs all men alike. Slavery is a cancer upon the body-politic, which must be rooted out before perfect health can be restored. The great law I refer to is now at work, and negroes and all things else which may be in the way to impede its course must get out. Do not go to inventing, but find out the great principles of this law, and conform your actions thereto. * * * * * “Destroy the rebellion, and let slavery go with it.” * * * * * “The Union and the Constitution must be preserved intact.” * * * * * “The edict has gone forth, and all that remains to be done is to change the relation of master and slave. The day is not far distant when this nation will be the great center of civilization, of the arts and sciences, and of true religion.” * * * * * “Let us go on with our mighty work. To talk about breaking up a Government like this for slavery! ’Tis madness. Let it go on with its great mission.”

The border States, all acknowledging the fact, hail and adopt the great edict of emancipation, and only some halt and hizzle for compensation. But the great work sweeps on. All rebellion admit it, and stand or fall by it and with it. They have staked all on it and lost. Let them bide the consequences.

That slavery is dead presupposes and assumes that freedom triumphs, and is to triumph on its battle-field. No one, not even Governor Seymour, the most plausible, powerful, and persistent sympathizer with the allies of their southern brethren on the other side of this floor, claims as far as I know that the emancipation proclamation was or is unconstitutional as a war measure. Bitter and unceasing as their maledictions upon that great and indispensable military measure have been, when followed to their conclusion they all tame down to the assertion that the proclamation is powerless and impotent, and that assertion hunted to its corner disappears in the pitiful and shameful protest that it is irritating to their southern brethren. So, then, these oath-breakers and violators of all laws human and divine, striking at your life and mine, at your liberties and mine, and intent upon the disruption and ruin of our common country, must not be irritated even by any measure or means, essential though they be to our very existence and self-preservation.

But is the proclamation of freedom to the slave impotent and powerless? Is not a slave who comes into our lines under it free; is not the dominion over him of his master then lost? The slave is a most potent power in the hands of his rebellious master, and directly used and wielded by him in this wicked war to dig their trenches and build their forts and drag their cannon and carry their burdens and cut and clear their roads to the battle-field; and who but they supply their traitorous masters in the field with the food and sustenance of their armies? If their horses be taken they are the property of their captors, and so of their guns and munitions, and all their engineering of war; and why not their slaves? They hold and claim them as property, and devote them to the purpose and maintenance of the war; and when captured and within our military control, whose slaves are they then? Are we to hold them in bondage or trust for traitors? Something of this has been done by some of our heretofore generals then and still high in the esteem and favor of traitors and their friends on this floor and elsewhere; but, thank God! that is over. Are they, then, not free? And being so, who shall enslave them again? Has not the promise gone forth that they are “henceforth free?” “A promise that must be kept.” Now, all know that this rebellion must be put down by force, by military power. All other arbitrament is rejected by the rebels in arms. They have referred to their generals in the field the dastardly overtures of peace to rebels in arms by their sympathizers here. And when the loyal people of the Union shall by their armies put down and crush out this rebellion, and “occupy and possess” by military force and power every revolted State, and every acre belonging to this Union, and our glorious flag floats proudly over all, will not the proclamation of emancipation, that great military order, then be executed in fact, and the promise of freedom then be fulfilled, and all slaves be free? The illustrious Senator from a border State has well said that a slave of a rebel coming within our military control is free, and no man or men can gainsay it. That the proclamation alone and unaided, like an order of a general or an admiral declaring the property of a town besieged or a ship when captured a spoil or a trophy, waits fulfillment till the dependent events transpire, and then is accomplished.

The rebellion put down, then, and slavery destroyed with it, both cause and effect are disposed of, and to attain that end we may wisely address ourselves to the means to attain it, pausing as we go to make sure and certain that the cause of the rebellion being dead and buried may have no future resurrection. Pass the resolution now pending submitting an amendment of the Constitution to the States prohibiting slavery forever hereafter in the United States or its Territories. This should be done, sir, not by a mere two-thirds vote, but by every vote. And yet it will be seen that the allies of slavery and of traitors to their country are not all as yet conscripted into the hostile ranks of treason, and gathered, as they should be, where their heart is, on the sacred soil, with their erring brethren. But here while the battle rages some will be regretting, with the member from New York, as they have before, their inability to arm brother traitors by the ship-load, and others, with the unworthy member from Maryland, will bewail, as heretofore they have, even in this Congress of the Union, the murderous cruelty of their patriotic countrymen, who go forth to battle and to die, if need be, that their country may live, and piously invoke the curse of God on their country and its cause; others, with assumed prophetic vision, will clearly see and graphically depict the greater ruin, if we do not abjectly submit to the spoliation and dismemberment of our country, and, on the whole, choose the last alternative; and others, with an eloquence and zeal worthy of a better cause, clamor unceasingly that the Constitution should be trammelled with a prohibition against the possibility of taking from proscribed, acknowledged traitors in arms, leaders and authors of this unnatural and unholy war upon their country and humanity, their property, lest their dear progeny, the spawn of treason, may come to discomfort and want, and be exempted from all acknowledgment that “the way of the transgressor is hard;” and herein the Democracy—God save the mark!—the other side of this House, mainly all concur. But not one of their crocodile tears has dropped, or will, for the wreck of fortunes and the want and destitution this slaveholders’ war entails on the children of the North. Better so. They shall henceforth be the children of their country, nursed, fostered, and adopted by it, and held too dear to be polluted by the divided sympathies or concern of those aping treason.

The time was when Democracy meant something, and was first in the field when the country was assailed, and was first and foremost in the councils of the nation, shouting the war-cry of freedom, and when those who failed to respond in concert, and failed to marshal themselves against their country’s enemies, and held their country and its cause in the wrong, were branded as traitors, and consigned to everlasting infamy and contempt. But here and now such men stalk these Halls, and make open and public gowal; and, lest freedom of speech should be abridged, the very inmost counsels and purposes of the Government are laid open to, nay, shared in, by traitors self-confessed, and under and in the name of liberty and freedom and the Constitution this is tolerated and continued here. And how and by whom? Let Democratic voices and votes give answer as they have answered. Sir, the day cometh and now is, when men shall be driven from their refuges of lies, when traitors and impostors and pretenders shall be known and despised of all true men, as were the Cow-Boys of old. Sir, the times demand earnest work and plain talk; and let us have it.

Is it any longer wonderful that all our ways and purposes are manifest to our deadly enemies as soon as conceived, when their friends and open sympathizers have place here? They, in my judgment, are in the wrong Congress, and should follow their illustrious predecessors out from these Halls where they, too, invoked the curse of God on those who stood by their country, to that other congress of their friends, and we, if need be, might better add to their mileage the distance they have stopped short of their journey's end and pass them on to Richmond. Entertaining these views I have not hesitated to offer them by my vote and voice, as I do now, a pass hence and herefrom, nothing doubting but our country would be the gainer.

These, sir, are your peace Democrats, who stay at home to fight, and they represent and gather to their folds all who claim to support the Government in this its terrible day of trial, and yet oppose, denounce, and malign the Administration and its every act and measure, knowing as all must know that weakening and embarrassing the Administration to the same extent paralyzes and impairs the Government.

"What would ye have, ye curs,
That like no peace nor war?"

In favor of war, but opposed to coercion and subjugation, is of a piece precisely with the pretense of supporting the Government while opposing its measures; each is alike hollow and insincere, impossible in practice and false in fact, and amounts to aiding treason. Let none be deceived by it; "it is but the word of promise to the ear, and broken to the hope," and so shall our country be lost and broken if such counsels prevail. Beginning with James Buchanan, who first betrayed humanity in Kansas, and then his country, in the final hour his weakness and treachery had prepared for her, with all others denying the right of the Government to coerce obedience to the Constitution and laws, and including the Janus-faced politicians who, pretentiously fierce for a more vigorous prosecution of the war yet oppose subjugation—they uphold the cause but oppose the effect. And only so for war unless freedom shall take nothing as a consequence, and unless slavery shall be maintained by it and held unimpaired, and unless negroes shall be driven from our lines; and, greater than all, unless they are proscribed the privilege of fighting and dying in the common cause with freemen. All this conceded, and their conservative general in command, no other, the peace Democracy, with the olive-branch and compromise in one hand, and Democratic platform and submission in the other, and clothed with shame as with a garment all white, sir, yes, and pale, for that matter, will march forth and change base, fired on by their great war oracle, with Cooper Institute fourth of July lamentations, and crying, "Peccavi," "I have sinned," take up the chant of their erring brothers, for they know no other music, and straggle on in their devious way to war, keeping step to and singing never so sweetly, "Let us alone, let us alone."

Such men, sir, have plied their vocation aforetime in this country. In the war of 1812 they embraced the same opportunity they now do to vilify and oppose the war Administration of the day; and hear what Felix Grundy, a Democrat and supporter of the Administration, in a speech in Congress said of them, and the description holds perfect now as then:

"An individual goes over, joins the ranks of the enemy, and raises his arms against the country; he is clearly guilty of treason under the Constitution, the overt act being consummated. Suppose the same individual not to go over to the enemy, but to remain in his own neighborhood, and by means of his influence to dissuade ten men from enlisting; I ask in which case has he benefited the enemy and injured the country most?"

"Whom then do I accuse? I accuse him, sir, who professes himself to be the friend of his country and enjoys its protection, yet proves himself by his actions to be the friend of its enemy. I accuse him who sets himself at work systematically to weaken the arm of this Government by destroying its credit and dampening the ardor of its citizens. Such men I cannot consider friends of this nation."

We are told, Mr. Speaker, of a war Democracy, and such there are—their name is legion—good men and true; they are found in the Union ranks bearing arms in support of the Government and the Administration that wields it. At the ballot-box, whether at home or in the camp, they are Union men, and vote as they fight, and hold little in common with the political leaders of the Democratic party in or out of this Hall—the Seymours, the Woods, the Vallandighams, the Woodwards, and their indorsers, who hold and control the Democratic party here, and taint it with treason, till it is a stench in the nostrils of all patriotic men. Mr. Speaker, the war Democracy as yet have no existence as a party that I can learn outside of the party of the Union, nor need they; and the great leader of the Democratic party so affirms, which would not be high authority with me after his denial of the established fact that he would furnish guns to traitors in arms and would turn over the city of New York to secession were he not supported in the assertion by facts. The war Democrats of New York could find no place in Democratic State conventions, and left it and the convention, as I am informed, ignoring a war platform, or resolutions even, sent delegates for the Democratic party to Chicago, and left the war Democracy out in the cold.

Sir, it is undeniable that the leaders of this rebellion in the outset counted confidently and openly on the support of their time-long friends and allies politically, the northern Democracy. Jeff. Davis at the beginning, before the congress of traitors banded together as the first fruits of treason, pledged himself that he would hold in the hollow of his hand all the blood the war should spill on southern soil, but that the North would divide in their favor, and the war, if any, would be there and end there. And from that day to this they have looked hopefully and anxiously for allies from the North. So long had they in the name of Democracy played into each other's hands by joint action and success that they might divide the fruits, the South taking the power and dictating the policy of the Government, the North the plunder and profits; and so potent and controlling had party discipline become, and so unscrupulous and unprincipled had they themselves become, that they doubted if any virtue was left in the land. The question still remains to what extent they reckon without their host. The peace Democracy, and mere party hacks in the North, are fulfilling their masters' expectations industriously, unceasingly, and as far as in them lies. Not even the shouts for victory in these Halls can divert their southern allies here. A sullen gloom at the defeat and discomfiture of their southern brethren settles down on their disastrous countenances, from which no ray of joy can be reflected; you might as well extract sunbeams from a cucumber. No, sir; they even vote solid here against a law to punish guerrillas.

Sir, in my judgment, many of those who withhold from their country the support they would otherwise give it find allegiance to party too strong for their weak patriotism; and now, as in times of peace, subordinate every other interest, even their country's safety, to mere party trammels. Rejecting the example and counsels of Stanton and Dickinson and Butler and Douglas and Dix and Holt and Andrew Johnson and Logan and Rosecrans and Grant and a host of others, all Democrats of the straitest sect, to forget all other ties and cleave only to their country for their country's sake, and rejecting the overtures and example of the Republican party to drop and forget their party name, that all might unite and band together for their country's salvation as Union men, they turn a deaf ear and cold shoulder and sullenly pass by on the other side, thanking God they are not as other men are, and lend, if at all, a calculating, qualified, and conditional and halting support, under protest, to their country's cause; thus justifying the only hope of the rebellion to-day, that party spirit at the North will distract its counsels, divide and discourage and paralyze its efforts, and ultimately make way for the traitor and the parricide to do their worst.

And here, Mr. Speaker, it is painful to know and feel that in this crusade of party, warring to the knife against all who will not bow down and worship it, the State of New York, my native State, has most offended. Her son, whom she delighted to honor had he proved true to his great trust, and directed his great talents and influence with a single eye to the welfare and salvation of his country, and united and wielded the powers and energies of that great State and hurled it against its enemies, as it was his great privilege, the very demonstration would have brought treason to its knees and peace to the country. Sympathizers with traitors in other States, imitating his example, would have come over to the side of their country, and we should have been united and strong, and in that strength he might have gone up to the goal of his ambition, by the consent of a united and grateful people, to the portico of your Capitol to pronounce an inaugural of peace and unity to a now warring and distracted people. But how shallow are man's devices! Man proposes but God disposes. Ambition betrayed him. Forgetting the claims of his country, and shrinking into the narrow compass of the wrangling partisan, when the country waited to hear the bugle-blast of a great and patriotic leader, he uttered forth only the wayward and uncertain squeakings of a party fife. Calling back those who would otherwise obey their country's call, and invoking the law's delay and constitutional doubts in aid of the delinquency, he led the van in opposition. His imitators in other States joined in and echoed his specious sophistries, and some, bolder than he, reduced them to practice, and banded together to resist the execution of the laws he and his kith had taught them to condemn, and bloody and riotous hostility to the Government followed their teachings, till, startled at their work, he called off his friends and appealed to the ballot-box against the Government.

The judgment of an outraged and indignant people recorded against them by hundreds of thousands sent them reeling and staggering from the blow back to their lowest beginnings, and some now "watch and wait" for their country's defeat "over the border;" and some not yet waited on by the people they misrepresent pray for it here; while he of New York, heeding the people's rebuke, again comes puffing up the wind he should have gone before, and suffers what he can no longer prevent, the people's edict of elective franchise to our brave soldiers to become a law, opposed only by himself and his political friends, and at last yields even that the willing black man may fight for his liberty and country; one day sends forth our gallant militia to the defense of a sister State, the next denies them to the defense of his own against his fourth of July friends who stay at home and fight, and the while, as their orator, devotes his country's birthday to pestilent poisoning of the public mind, to denouncing his country's efforts to crush the rebellion, to deprecating its patriotism, and predicting its downfall; an effort as baleful in its influence at home as it was aiding and comforting to traitors abroad. With a varying and fickle policy and practice, not unmingled with good, he has obtained and reflected occasional glimmerings of patriotism, and has received therefor prompt and merited acknowledgment, and again relapsed. His whole course relating to this rebellion and war has been a broken and disjointed thing. The present pronounces it, as the future will, an opportunity for his country's good lost or misemployed, alike damaging to himself, his country, and his friends; a meager harvest, but such as misguided ambition always brings to the garner of its husbandman. These conclusions, sir, somewhat differ from those expressed by my distinguished colleague who has so eloquently commended such course and conduct for our approval here.

But, sir, this is not a time when doubtful men or measures can be tolerated. The country expects that every man will do his whole duty, and will accept nothing less. No people in the course of time ever had greater reason to feel that "sufficient for the day is the evil thereof" than the people of this now sorely tried and distracted country, including all, both North and South, East and West, for I look upon all as our country and our countrymen, and bound together by compact indissoluble except by the same power and authority that ordained it, the free and full consent of all. The present wicked attempt of a portion of the people to disrupt and disintegrate that Union and compact is a violation of the rights of all and each, and an atrocious attempt to install might in its place, an insult to all affected, suicidal in all its ends and consequences, and impossible of attainment against the will of a people indubitably competent to maintain the right against all and every assailant. The conflict, inaugurated on precisely the terms and for the purpose stated, is sustained with a tenacity of purpose and energy of power and boundlessness of resources never before witnessed or conceived of; because such a people, counting by such millions and possessing such vast material and domain, such wealth of attributes, and, above all and more than all, each sovereign and equal and free, never before challenged comparison of an observant world. The judgment of the world already attests these truths. Nations who should be our brothers, though denying their fraternity with ill-concealed envy and enmity, evince their prudence and discretion by confining themselves to covert injuries and diplomatic evasions of duty in our case, who are not wanting in promptness of execution or over-exact in measures, in cases squaring with their interests or inclinations touching less formidable Powers. As to them "sufficient for the day being the evil thereof," we bide our time, treading firmly and protesting plainly, and expecting ultimately voluntary justice, or otherwise exacting it. But, sir, as my time will not permit, I come to the measures and means I deem necessary to the putting down of this rebellion. Men abound, men ready to stake their life and devote their life to its overthrow, and as their mission is fulfilled, others are ready and prompt to take their places.

"It is as though the earth again
Grew quick with God's inspiring breath,
And from the vales and glades and glen Rise ranks of lion-hearted men,
To battle to the death."

Sir, the sinews of war must also be forthcoming; and here and now it behooves us of this Congress to act well our part. Knowing and feeling the justice of their cause, the poor will contribute uncomplainingly, the rich lavishly. But the people will rigidly demand of us that their burdens be made equal. Legislators in an American Congress must ever remember that they are acting as the servants of a people wise and sagacious as themselves. Hence, foreseeing the necessity, their voice in no doubtful accents comes to us demanding taxation sufficient to meet the emergency—sufficient to fill their magazines, clothe and feed and supply their armies, pay the soldiers, and pay them liberally, pension the disabled and the widows of this war, uphold the public credit, pay the public debt, and maintain their Government; and this should be done, and so done as to disturb as little as possible the established course of trade, business, and production, and to that result I must and shall, according to my best judgment, contribute. I have not hesitated nor shall I hesitate to lay a generous tax upon the profitable business and manufactures and accumulated wealth and means of the country where it will be least felt and most productive, and will add in passing that the true interest of those that have will be best promoted by cheerfully parting with a portion and thereby guaranty and secure and save the residue. A depreciated and inflated currency unsettles all values, enhances prices, and we, in fact, are poorer in proportion to its abundance. We shall be wanting in our duty if we fail to provide against such calamity by looking the danger square in the face. Passing it by to a more convenient season is only daubing with untempered mortar and trifling away opportunity.

Mr. Speaker, intimately connected with our duty to lay necessary taxes is the kindred duty of protection and ample and sure and permanent protection to our home labor, home manufacture, and domestic productions—our great and main reliance against bankruptcy and ruin. Free trade, always a humbug, imposed on us by an institution and interest in antagonism with free and remunerated labor, in our present condition would be a blunder little short of criminal. Though the revenue thereby would to that extent seem convenient, yet to drain ourselves of all our gold in exchange for the various importations of the products of foreign labor at the expense of our own, at the extravagant rate now and lately indulged in, will inevitably sink us in bankruptcy too deep for our great Secretary, unrivaled financier as he is, to extricate us. Our debt, staggering as it is, we can yet carry and pay if we keep it where it is and should remain, at home. Here is our weak side; and our good-faith-keeping, neutrality-observing course will strike us here a blow more damaging and disastrous than all their pirate craft of all their Lairds and Commons. Sir, let us encourage and protect and make prosperous our home manufactures and productions, and then we can meet and face down taxation. This duty of protection is well illustrated and made manifest by the article of wool.

The total amount of foreign wool imported into the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1863, was 71,882,123 pounds.

Pounds.
Of this under 18 cents per pound.....	61,572,584
Of this from 18 to 24 cents per pound.....	7,214,582
Of this above 24 cents per pound.....	1,114,904
Free of duty from Canada.....	1,980,053

The above eighteen cent wool and under by foreign valuation paid a duty of three fourths of a cent per pound. Of the second class, eighteen to twenty-four cents, three cents per pound; and the third class, valued above twenty-four cents per pound, a duty of nine cents per pound. The supposition that the wool entered under our present tariff law, valued at eighteen cents and under, would only be that used for coarse cloths, carpets, &c., and would not come in competition with wool produced in our own country, has proved fallacious; the fact being that seven eighths of the whole importations were invoiced and paid a duty of only three fourths of a cent per pound, and came in direct competition with nearly all our wool of domestic production, thus defrauding the Government of millions of revenue and driving our wool out of market. Need anything further be said showing the utter absurdity of a system of foreign valuations as a basis for either protection or revenue? In my judgment, so long as it is followed all your legislation will fail of its object. Sir, I wait to hear and challenge answer why it is that we still adhere to a policy that commits our most vital interests to the tender mercy of foreigners. We are systematically defrauded by it, and we are materially impoverished by it. But, sir, the policy will be vigorously insisted on in this Hall. All who look if not pray for the dismemberment of this country and a repudiation of its debts, with all who find no warrant in the Constitution for self-protection, self-preservation, or self-existence, may well and consistently do so, and will do so; and their professions and practice will therein be consistent. As to others I pause for a reason and a reply.

The same necessity exists for a change of policy and protection of our great iron interest. Our country, so rich in all the productions of its surface, contains in its bosom minerals and mines of wealth exhaustless and undeveloped. Friendly legislation on our part, stimulating enterprise and discovery, and rewarding labor and production and manufacture in that direction, will keep more gold in our depleting Treasury than all the gold bills of all the sorcerers, than all the devices of all the theorists. Sir, whatsoever profitably employs a nation enriches it, and whosoever keep what they gather have abundance to spare. It is scattering abroad that leaves nothing in hand with nations as with individuals; and, above all, temporary and time-serving expedients and mere soothing and not saving remedies are out of place in times like these, when the nation is taxed and tried to its utmost.

Sir, the policy that covets revenue through encouragement of foreign importations is a cheat and a delusion; it pays us a portion for the privilege of taking our all; and in accepting the temporary expedient we plunge into the very gulf of bankruptcy from which we shrink.

Sir, the cry from abroad is, "Who will buy?" And how answered, I shall presently show. We buy all and sell nothing, mainly, but ourselves. As in wool, we go abroad to gather and return shorn, and, our treasure exhausted without payment, we stand, like the lamb, dumb before our shearers. That this is not an overdrawn statement, I read the following statement, furnished me by the Treasury Department, which exhibits the value of the goods, wares, and merchandise imported and exported during the months of January, February, and March, 1864, at the port of New York:

Imports.
Specie and bullion.....	$334,387

These figures are stubborn things, and bring clearly to light the vortex of inevitable bankruptcy into which we are heedlessly rushing. These enormous balances must be canceled by gold; and when done is it any longer a question where our gold goes to, and has gone to? And is this the way to replenish either our public or private coffers, and be able to meet the expenses of this war and furnish its sinews? Sir, let us lay a heavy hand on foreign luxuries, discouraging their purchase, that we may retain their price in aid of our terrible struggle for self-existence; and, above all, let us lay high and protecting duties on all the great leading articles of foreign production that compete with our own, and make it sure by specific duties and home valuation. But, sir, that free list—who is the father of that enormity?—that balance of nearly four million dollars is emptied upon us from the province of what was once called "perfidious Albion" nearest our border; (if it has lately earned a more gracious title at our hands, let another assert it, and not I;) and that balance is the fruit of the reciprocity treaty, bringing to the very doors of our farmers, lumbermen, and producers, rival foreign commodities to undersell them; yes, sir, subjecting them all and all their productions to foreign valuation. Sir, it denies us the privilege of our own market even, and without the slightest equivalent to our Treasury, or otherwise, stalks in upon us, and bears down and bears away our substance remorselessly. And whether this shall continue depends upon no accident, but upon whether we are true or recreant to our duty. Let the notice go forth terminating this flagrant evil, and we shall thereby also make some amends to our Treasury.

Mr. Speaker, while considering the methods which will best enable us to maintain ourselves and our Government, we are admonished that our monetary system is radically defective; that the power to issue currency as a circulating medium without limit should be restrained; and that when issued it should be on the same basis and of equal value throughout the United States; and that to effect this it should be all brought under one general law and under the control of the General Government, and not subject to the varying moods of State legislation. Urged, as these considerations are, by the powerful reasoning and confident opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who in my judgment stands second to no man in the nation in wisdom and ability in that Department, and who, if he shall carry us through the financial difficulties that environ us, successfully, will be acknowledged by all as a chief instrument in working out our salvation, I yield my assent to them. To the methods proposed to reach that result I find it more difficult to agree. This Government must look for its support and find it in the voluntary choice and action of the people. Any project that on its face manifestly tends to prejudice any vested right or interest of the people, they will reject and condemn, and it must therefore fail. Now it is urged that in order to make way for the proposed national banking system onerous and unequal burdens must be imposed upon the State banks now in existence; that they must be driven into the fold or out of existence. In this I differ. I would offer inducements rather. Make the way easy and beneficial for them to come voluntarily into the general national scheme, and you shall not long wait for that desired result. Some affect to deny the right of States to charter banks; but there can be no serious question on that subject. Again, it is proposed to withdraw all the national banks and bank capital from State and municipal taxation, because of the necessity to tax them exclusively for the support of the General Government; and secondly, because the power being left to the States to tax includes the power to destroy; a result which, in my judgment, does not follow, because it may be provided against by providing against them what I demand for them, equal burdens and equal taxation with every other like property.

I am unable to see the wisdom of sequestering property of any description, and withdrawing it from taxation generally. It has never been our policy, and, in my judgment, never can or ought to be. In case of revenue from foreign importations, it was found necessary to bring that within the General Government jurisdiction exclusively; otherwise commercial relations with foreign nations could not have assured fulfillment, and because rivalry between the several States to secure trade would underbid all revenue. Hence that single source of income was sequestered to the national Treasury to defeat and prevent injurious competition between the several States. Beyond that I know of no other case. I see no reason or necessity for it in this case. Better to leave all property equally liable to all taxation; the General Government drawing for what it must, leaving States and localities to do the same, and only so can the burdens of all be made equal to all. Sir, you may tax heavily if necessary without a murmur, but unequal taxation you cannot long enforce. It is an injustice to which none will willingly submit, and the plan proposed must result in inequality. The very argument urged in its favor persuades me against it. It presupposes that the measure will be odious, and hence that it will be taxed by the States to destruction. Sir, a better guarantee of its permanency and usefulness will be found in combining the greatest possible benefits with the fewest possible evils; and that accomplished, it will become universal in favor and practice.

The withdrawing from States their natural and most obvious reliance for self-support, weakens the bands of union by severing the unity of interests, and proceeds upon the mistaken idea that the whole may survive though all the parts perish; that the General Government can be strong while the States languish.

Mr. Speaker, the loyal States have gallantly emulated each other in their generous and uncalculating sacrifices in support of the Government. They have contributed of their sons and substance without stint or measure. In doing so they have contracted heavy State debts. Counties and towns have vied with each other in furnishing forth soldiers of the Union, and adopted their families during their absence in the field, and pledged their faith and property to provide their bounties; and their means to meet all or any of these their great undertakings must not be needlessly circumscribed by partial and class legislation. We must all stand or fall together. That determined on and decided, be our burdens ever so great, we shall bear them triumphantly through. In union is our strength; whatever stands in the way of it must go down. No expense, no sacrifice, no allurements must deter or divert us, but rising with the emergency, and equal to every fate, meet and master every obstacle that stands in the way of the complete supremacy of the Constitution and the laws.

Mr. HIGBY obtained the floor, but yielded it to Mr. STILES, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five minutes to nine o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 1, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

RECORDING OF VOTES.

Mr. McDUGALL. Before the reading of the Journal, I desire to state that just before the vote was taken last evening on the amendment to the revenue bill relative to the fishing bounties, I had stepped out for a moment, leaving word with the chairman of the Committee on Finance where I was going, not thinking that a vote would be taken immediately. I should like, by unanimous consent, to have my vote recorded in its appropriate place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent, and the Chair doubts whether even then it can be done.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have no objection, but I have been refused on one or two occasions a similar privilege when I requested it five minutes after a vote had been taken.

Mr. McDUGALL. Having discussed the question just a moment before, I should like to have my vote on the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will refer to the rules.

Mr. McDUGALL. I hope the Senator from New Jersey will allow me to do it. There is a special reason why I desire to do it, having just discussed the question.

Mr. FOOT. I doubt whether by unanimous consent it can be done within the meaning and intent of the rule, which is very imperative that it shall be done under no circumstances.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was of that impression, and that is the reason he was going to refer to the rule.

Mr. McDUGALL. Without, then, desiring to make a question about this, allow me to say that I was called from my place by a call which I thought required my attendance for a moment; and I regret very much that I was not in my seat when my name was called.

Mr. POMEROY. There has been a usage in the Senate, and I remember one or two instances where parties have recorded their names by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the usage has been the other way.

Mr. POMEROY. There have been instances of that kind since I have been in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There may be one or two instances.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the reading of the Journal be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none; and the reading of the Journal will be dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SUMNER presented three petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. JOHNSON. I present the petition of Charles de Arnaud, who represents himself to have been a loyal citizen of the United States. He states that he was doing a very lucrative business in Jackson, Mississippi, at the breaking out of the rebellion, and determined to return to the States that were not in rebellion, and he removed to Louisville, Kentucky, where he was employed by General Rousseau to obtain information from the rebels. He did it, he says, at great expense of money and great hazard of life, and he complains that he has not been paid a sufficient indemnity for his services. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the bank bill. The matter ought to be disposed of now for the purpose of getting this bill out of the way. I ask for its present consideration; it will take but a moment.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: line two of said amendment strike out the words "the bonds," and insert in lieu the following words, "any excess of bonds beyond one third of its capital stock and," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their nineteenth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the thirty-sixth amendment of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to so much of the thirty-seventh amendment of the Senate as proposes to insert the words "Buffalo, and Providence, Rhode Island," and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the words proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment and insert in lieu thereof the words "Washington city," and the Senate agree to the same.

The House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-eighth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendments: strike out all after the word "notes," in line seven of the matter proposed to be inserted by said Senate amendment, down to and including the word "mountains" in line ten; and in line twelve, strike out the words "three fifths," and insert in lieu thereof the words "one half," and the Senate agree to the same.

The House recede from their disagreement to the forty-first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendment: strike out all after the word "provided," in line forty-seven of said Senate amendment down to and including the word "located," in line sixty-six, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent all the shares in any of the said associations held by any person or body corporate from being included in the valuation of the personal property of such person or corporation in the assessment of taxes imposed by or under State authority, at the place where such bank is located, and not elsewhere; but not at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such State: Provided further, That the tax so imposed under the laws of any State upon the shares of any of the associations authorized by this act shall not exceed the rate imposed upon the shares in any of the banks organized under the authority of the State where such association is located," and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN SHERMAN,
REVERDY JOHNSON,
S. HOOPER,
E. B. WASHBURN,
L. MALLORY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to hear the report read again.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if the chairman of the committee would explain it, that would be of much more value.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so. I will remark that the House of Representatives originally agreed to nearly all the amendments of the Senate, and there were only six points of disagreement. The fifteenth amendment of the Senate is agreed to with a slight modification, not affecting the meaning. That amendment of the Senate authorized a bank to take up the bonds upon which no circulating notes had been issued. The amendment of the committee of conference to this amendment prohibits the bank taking up any bonds except beyond one third the excess of bonds, and upon which no circulating notes have been delivered. It is rather a change of phraseology than meaning. The nineteenth amendment of the Senate was one proposed by the Senator from Vermont, limiting the amount of capital stock of the banks organized under this act. That is stricken out, so that the limitation applies only to the circulation. It was deemed difficult at present to fix the amount of limitation of the capital stock, because it was represented to us that many of the banks in New England and New York that might go into this system might carry in a much larger capital than the amount of circulation they would probably take, and that at any rate for a year or so it was not at all likely that the limitation of $300,000,000 could be reached. There was a radical difference between the Senate and House of Representatives, so that we receded from that amendment of the Senate.

The thirty-sixth amendment inserted Leavenworth as a place of redemption. That is left out. The thirty-seventh amendment inserted Providence and Buffalo. We receded from that amendment and inserted Washington City, the Comptroller of the Currency desiring that the notes of banks in Washington should be redeemable in New York, so that they should keep on hand the highest amount required in cities of redemption, thirty-five per cent.

The thirty-eighth amendment was an important one. It required the banks west of the Alleghany mountains to redeem in the city of New York at one fourth of one per cent., and those east of the Alleghany mountains to redeem in New York at par. We require all of them to redeem at par, make no distinction between east and west of the mountains, so that all the banks in centers of redemption redeem in New York at par.

The last amendment, which was the only material one upon which there was disagreement, and the only one upon which there was much trouble, was the forty-first amendment, reserving to the States the power of taxation. We have slightly modified the Senate amendment, but the legal effect is very much the same as the Senate amendment, in my judgment. The slight difference between the Senate amendment and the amendment proposed by the committee of conference will be very readily seen. These were the only points of disagreement.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator be kind enough to inform me how the matter of taxing the State banks and national banks relatively is left by the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill says nothing about taxing the State banks. It provides for a tax of one per cent. on the circulation of the national banks, one half of one per cent. on their deposits, and one per cent. on their capital above the amount invested in United States bonds. It reserves to the States the right to levy a tax on national banks not exceeding the rate that they assess upon their own banks, and it is to be levied at the place where the bank is located.

The report was concurred in.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage. It is a mere formal bill, intended to promote the convenience of the Departments, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that that part of the act entitled "An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, and for other purposes," approved March 14, 1864, as provides "that hereafter no printing or binding shall be done or blank-books be procured for any of the Executive Departments of the Government without a written requisition on the Superintendent of Public Printing from the head of such Department," shall be amended by inserting after the last word "Department" the words "or his assistant or assistants," so that it will read, "the head of such Department or his assistant or assistants."

Mr. HALE. That seems to be an important bill, and it was impossible to hear it read. I wish the chairman to state what it is.

Mr. ANTHONY. The present law provides that no printing, however small, shall be executed for the Departments unless on the written order of the head of the Department addressed to the Superintendent of Public Printing. Those orders are so numerous and frequently so small as to subject the head of the Department to considerable inconvenience in examining and signing them; and this bill allows the Assistant Secretaries to sign the orders instead of the Secretaries. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone all prior orders.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the credentials presented by me in behalf of Hon. Mr. Fishback, Senator-elect from Arkansas, in place of Mr. Sebastian, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion is pending.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no privilege connected with that question over any other. It is a motion regularly pending, and lies over for consideration. I have no objection to the reference, but I do not want it to occupy the morning hour by eliciting debate. Do I understand that there is any privilege connected with that question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the matter having been postponed by a vote of the Senate, it has not now the character of a question of privilege. The Senator from New Hampshire is in order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not know of any one that is going to discuss this question.

Mr. HALE. I understand the question is decided. It is not a matter of privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remark that in transacting the business of the morning, as the session comes to the close, he will hold pretty rigidly to the rule as to the reading of the Journal, and then receiving petitions, and then going through with reports.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have a report to make.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I have not yielded the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Chair recognized me, and I have not relinquished the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator from Kansas has no right to the floor. He claimed it for a question of privilege; and the Chair decided that the question presented by him was not a question of privilege.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate now to let these papers go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object.

Mr. SUMNER. Before they go, I desire to debate the question.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders for the purpose of considering Senate joint resolution No. 50.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are in order; and the Chair will receive reports.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, praying for an amendment of the act of March 3, 1863, entitled "An act to protect the liens upon vessels in certain cases, and for other purposes," so as to protect the claims of loyal citizens, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 222) extending the jurisdiction of district courts, have directed me to report adversely thereon. It is a bill which purports to extend to the rivers and lakes of the United States the admiralty jurisdiction more amply than it exists at present.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommended a bill (S. No. 166) authorizing the archives in the office of the recorder of land titles in the State of Missouri to be delivered to said State, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 258) making Dakota or Sioux half-breed land scrip assignable, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 137) to exclude disloyal persons from the public lands of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bill and memorial, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

A bill (S. No. 269) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads from Stillwater, by way of St. Paul and St. Anthony, to a point between Big Stone lake and the mouth of Sioux Wood river, with a branch to St. Cloud and to the navigable waters of the Red river of the North, as the Legislature may determine; and

A memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee praying for the construction of a wagon road to Idaho, through Minnesota and Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 259) supplemental to the laws relating to the War Department, and authorizing the settlement and payment of certain claims against the United States, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 276) concerning the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 293) to provide for the payment of the second regiment, third brigade, Ohio volunteer militia, during the time they were mustered into the service of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress, and for the presentation of a medal to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 58) in relation to the professors of the Military Academy at West Point, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 93) to repeal so much of the acts of Congress approved March 3, 1845, and August 6, 1846, as authorize the transportation of goods imported from foreign countries through the United States to the Canadas, or from the Canadas through the United States, to be exported to foreign countries, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an increase of pension to Army and Navy pensioners, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Ann Watson, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain, at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 218) to repeal the first section of a joint resolution therein named, with an amendment to the title of the bill; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 192) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, insisted on by the Senate, and upon its amendments to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. GEORGE H. PENDLETON of Ohio; Mr. WILLIAM WINDOM of Minnesota, and Mr. ORLANDO KELLOGG of New York, managers at the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili;

A bill (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856;

A bill (H. R. No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up Senate joint resolution No. 8, for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports are still in order. If there be no reports, the question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HALE. Has everything been gone through with under the rule? Have resolutions and joint resolutions been called for?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Resolutions and joint resolutions are not required to be called for by the rule.

Mr. HALE. I am glad of that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARLILE. Is the motion of the Senator from Indiana subject to amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin was resumed as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This question has been somewhat debated, and I desire to say to the Senate simply that the joint resolution provides for the payment to the State of Wisconsin of her five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within her limits. There were some equities connected with this claim which the committee found some difficulty in adjusting, but finally arrived at what they believed to be a fair and equitable adjustment of the rights of the several parties, the Government as well as the canal company and the State of Wisconsin. The Committee on Claims to whom this joint resolution was referred were unanimous in favor of it as reported. I ask that there be a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Claims in the nature of a substitute for the original joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask that the joint resolution as it now stands be read.

The resolution was read.

Mr. HARLAN. I will inquire of the Senator who has the joint resolution in his charge the necessity of the first clause of the committee's amendment, which is in these words: "the Secretary of the Department of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to allow to the State of Wisconsin five per cent. of the net proceeds derived from the sale of the public lands within the State, as provided in the act of Congress approved August 6, 1846." I desire to know if that law is not still in force, if Wisconsin is not now receiving the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within the State under the law as it exists.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Certainly the law of 1846 is in force, but the accounts of the State of Wisconsin have been suspended in the Department and no payments have been made for a number of years because of the conflicting equities which are provided for in this joint resolution. It is because of these questions, that cannot be adjusted in the Department, that the State has had to come to Congress for this relief. Payments are not in fact being made under the law which gives to the State of Wisconsin the five per cent.

Mr. HARLAN. If the State of Wisconsin is now receiving the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within its limits under existing laws, there can be no necessity for reenacting that provision, and therefore I move to strike out all after the word "Interior" in the third line of the amendment of the committee, down to and including the word "and" in the seventh line.

Mr. HOWE. Let me suggest to my friend from Iowa, that in the first place this amendment having been adopted, it is scarcely amendable now; but those first lines were introduced only for the purpose of stating what the account is that is to be settled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the proposed amendment is not in order at the present time.

Mr. HOWE. If those words were struck out, there would be nothing for the word "that" preceding "account" in line eight to refer to. After the words proposed to be struck out, the language is "and shall in the settlement of that account," &c. It is a mere statement of the account that is to be settled.

Mr. HARLAN. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin what my object is, and then perhaps he can frame an amendment that will meet my view, if he shall approve it.

If I understand this case it is about this: many years ago a grant of land was made to Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a canal; it was stipulated in that act that the canal should be completed within ten years, and that if the canal should not be completed within ten years the State of Wisconsin should account to the Federal Government for the lands thus donated to the State, it then being a Territory, at the rate of $2 50 an acre. Subsequently the Territory of Wisconsin became a State, and, under the provisions of law then in force and at that time enacted, became entitled to five hundred thousand acres of land to aid in carrying on works of internal improvement and to five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands made within the State subsequent to the date of its admission. In the settlement of the account since that period with the State of Wisconsin the Commissioner of the General Land Office has charged the State of Wisconsin with the whole amount of the canal grant at $2 50 an acre, and has been, and still is, deducting that amount from the sums of money which fall due to the State under the law granting the State five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands. I suppose this is right with this exception, that Wisconsin ought not to be charged more than $1 25 for the canal lands, or only so much more than $1 25 an acre as she may have received for these lands by their sale in the market.

This joint resolution provides various other things. It provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall state an account between the State of Wisconsin and the canal company, and ascertain how much money may be due from Wisconsin to the canal company which engaged in the construction of the canal under the law of the Territory of Wisconsin, and after ascertaining any amount of money that may be due to that company from the State of Wisconsin, to withdraw it from the Treasury of the United States, and I believe it makes an appropriation to pay it from the Treasury of the United States. I object, as a member of this body, to instituting any such commission. It is enough for this Government to do to administer the public lands, to administer the laws of the United States on that subject, as between itself and its own grantees, without converting itself into a kind of sheriff to stop in the Treasury any money that may be due to the State of Wisconsin, for the purpose of paying it over to the creditors of Wisconsin. If Wisconsin is indebted to this company, let Wisconsin settle with the company and pay the company from its own treasury. If the Government of the United States is indebted to Wisconsin, if in the adjustment of this account under which Wisconsin is entitled to sums of money from year to year the Government of the United States is indebted to Wisconsin, let the amount due be estimated on the public lands at the usual rate, and let whatever may be due to Wisconsin be paid over to the State, and not convert the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office into that of an arbitrator to intervene between the agents of the State of Wisconsin and the State itself to settle the conflicting claims or disputed claims set up by these agents of the State against the State of Wisconsin.

We now charge Wisconsin $2 50 an acre for the land originally granted to the Territory to aid in the construction of the canal. As that amount of acres of land was not deducted from the subsequent five hundred thousand acres falling due to Wisconsin when Wisconsin became a State, the Commissioner is now deducting the value of the land at $2 50 an acre from the five per cent. fund, and it is said that he is compelled, under the law as it exists, to charge $2 50 an acre. I think this is too much. I think $1 25 an acre, the ordinary minimum price of the public land, is the amount that ought to be charged to Wisconsin; and that amount ought to be deducted from any money that would otherwise be due the State. I desire to reach that point, and I am not willing to make an appropriation of any other moneys, of any larger sum of money, nor to institute any commission to intervene between the agents of the State of Wisconsin and the State of Wisconsin itself.

Mr. HOWE. I think the Senator from Iowa labors under a misapprehension on two points. First, the act making the grant to the Territory of Wisconsin did not require the State of Wisconsin to pay it back if the canal company did not build the canal, except upon the condition that after the State was admitted into the Union the Legislature of the State should assent to the terms of the act, which the Legislature never has done. When the Senator states that this grant was made on the condition that if the canal was not made in ten years the State should pay back the money, he should remember that there was also a condition that the State Legislature should assent to that provision, which the Legislature never did.

I think the Senator is mistaken upon another point, in supposing that Congress intervenes here, to enforce a settlement between the State and the canal company. The simple fact is that by the amendment of the committee which has been adopted, provision is made that a certain fund which the State acknowledges she has in her hands belonging to the United States or to the canal company shall be disposed of. The State simply acknowledges that she has the fund; it belongs either to the United States or to the canal company, she does not know which; she is a mere stakeholder. The canal company show that a part or the whole of it belongs to them. The amendment provides that the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall determine how much of this fund does belong to the canal company, and as much as does belong to the canal company shall go to them and the balance shall be retained in the Treasury. That is all there is of it. We are mere stakeholders of a fund there, that we are willing the proper owner shall have. Two parties claim it, the United States and the canal company. We allow the United States officer to settle with the canal company, and determine how much if anything is due to the canal company. These are the two points on which I think the Senator was slightly mistaken.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to add a word to what my colleague has said, and to it especially I call the attention of my friend from Iowa. The ground which he has taken is the ground which heretofore, during the time I have been in Congress, we have sometimes urged upon the committees on this subject; that is to say, that the State of Wisconsin ought to receive her five per cent. from the Treasury, and if we owe anything to the canal company we are able to pay, and we can settle with them; but the committees here have always replied to us by saying that we stood in the character of a trustee holding this fund for the canal company as a kind of cestui que trust, and that Congress were unwilling to pay over the money to us without at the same time looking to the equitable rights of the canal company, and therefore it is a thing which is imposed on Wisconsin that she shall submit to settle the claims of this company against her. That is the truth about it. We believed it would be better if our five per cent. were paid over directly to the State, and let us respond to all claims the company has upon us, legal or equitable, but the committees of Congress who have had this matter in charge have not been satisfied to let the matter stand in that light, and therefore they have presented it in the light in which it is now presented unanimously by this committee. They have taken the ground that Congress granted this land to the Territory of Wisconsin as a trustee for the benefit of the canal company. The real truth is, stripped of all verbiage and of all gloss that legislation has thrown over it, that a certain set of men in the city of Milwaukee desired to get up a canal to connect Milwaukee with the Rock river, and they applied to the Legislature of the Territory of Wisconsin in 1836 for a charter, and they did not then succeed, but in 1838 they got a charter, and they got a clause put into it that they might be at liberty to apply to Congress for a grant of land. The Territory of Wisconsin never applied for this grant of land, but this interested corporation did apply and did get Congress to make a grant of land for their benefit, the grant being nominally to the Territory to be expended for the company.

After some years it was found, in the estimation of the people of the Territory, that the whole scheme of this canal was an impracticable thing; it was a thing that could not be done. They expended $100,000 or more upon it and succeeded in building up a first-rate water power in the city of Milwaukee, bringing it down to a plat of land on the west side of the river where the city of Milwaukee is now built up—a water power which this company now holds and is renting out on long leases. That is all there is of the company.

The Territory of Wisconsin finding itself in this condition was unwilling to go on and involve itself further in liability to pay the debts and endorse the bonds of the company, which it undertook to do in the first instance, because it became satisfied that the building of the canal was an impracticability and would have to be abandoned by the Territory. It was abandoned by Congress, too, for Congress authorized the released sections to be sold at $1 25 an acre, which previously were to have been sold at $2 50 an acre.

The scheme having been abandoned, the thing stands now on a matter of account. We apply for our five per cent. We are told we cannot have it; and why? Because it is said there has been some grant to us for the benefit of a canal company, and that canal company stands here across our path. It is the canal company that has been here all the while opposing the very proposition which the Senator from Iowa wishes to carry into effect, and that is to pay us the money that belongs to us, and let us settle with the company. The canal company opposes that and claims to have equitable interests. Perhaps under the law they have. At all events, the committee so regard it, and they have, therefore, reported unanimously this resolution, which settles the whole question by leaving it to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to say how much of this money, which otherwise would belong to the Territory of Wisconsin, shall go to the canal company. I understand that to be the whole effect of the proposition.

Mr. HALE. This question has occupied a good deal of time, and it seems to me it ought to be settled. I have not gone into the particulars of all these statements, but as the impression is on my mind, it is a very simple case. I think, strictly speaking, that we have nothing to do with the dealings of the General Government with the Territory of Wisconsin prior to her admission into the Union as a State unless there be an equitable consideration growing out of the amount of money that the State of Wisconsin has received from this grant that was made to the Territory for certain specified purposes. If Wisconsin has got any such money as that, it seems to me it should be deducted from the amount due her by the General Government, and there is an end of the case. I think it does not become the General Government to interfere arbitrarily in the suit of any corporation in Wisconsin against the State itself. The general impression is that the judiciary of a State can be trusted to adjudicate any claims of that sort. The five per cent. Wisconsin is entitled to under your law. That is clear and indisputable. The canal grant was first made, as I understand, to the Territory of Wisconsin, and made to the Territory not for general purposes for the use of the Territory, but for a specified purpose; in other words, the Territory was made the trustee for the company. If in that relation, acting as trustee for the company, the Territory of Wisconsin realized money which subsequently went into the treasury of the State of Wisconsin, that money should undoubtedly be deducted from the amount of five per cent. allowed on the proceeds of the public lands, and that is the whole of it. It seems to me that is the course Congress ought to take.

Mr. COLLAMER. Either I or some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this subject do not understand it aright. The original grant of land was made to the Territory of Wisconsin, as is stated, for the purpose of making a certain canal. A corporation was created by the Territory for that purpose, and the Territory was in fact and in law, I suppose, trustee for them. There was in the act making the grant a provision that if the canal was not finished in the time stipulated, ten years, the Territory should become bound to the United States for all the avails of the land. They were to have it only on the condition that they finish the work. Those were the terms of the grant; but it does not matter now how that was.

After something had been done on this canal, no matter now how much, the Territory interfered, and not only disposed of the intermediate sections of the land, the price of which they got the Government to reduce to $1 25, but they sold a considerable portion of the land of which they were the trustees, and took the money for it. Part of it I am told they sold above $1 25 and part of it at $1 25, and I believe they paid some of that money over to the canal company in the progress of the work.

When Wisconsin was admitted as a State it was stipulated expressly as part of the conditions of admission "that the liabilities incurred by the territorial government of Wisconsin under the act" granting land for the canal "shall be paid and discharged by the State of Wisconsin." The Territory had disposed of the lands which were to go to that canal and used up the money in the business of the Territory, and the State was to stand in the place of the Territory in the payment of that money. That was all understood. The work stopped, and for a very good reason: the Territory sold the land, took the money, and refused to pay it over to the canal company to prosecute the work any further, but used it for public purposes. It is now suggested that the work was stopped from the intrinsic inability or impracticability of the scheme, or something of that kind, about which I know nothing. It may be true. At any rate, the work was stopped.

Now the State of Wisconsin has a claim upon the United States for five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State. The account comes up for settlement, and the question is how it shall be settled. Some gentlemen say, let us settle with the State for the five per cent. we owe them, and take out the money for which they sold this canal land, and let the question about the canal company go altogether, in order that the company and the State may settle it. I cannot understand how gentlemen who have any regard to the equities of the case can go upon that view. Many committees have considered the question. Years ago, in the other House, the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] then a member of that body, made a full report from a committee to that House upon the question, and from that day to this every committee who have examined it have regarded that as an unjust and improper mode of proceeding, and so our committee say now. The committees all say that as much money as the canal company laid out, and the State or Territory did not pay back, should be paid to the company; that the company should be settled with as far as they went. Now if we settle with the State of Wisconsin and leave the company to look to the State, I can merely say there is no probability that the company will ever get a single cent. The Territory said it was an impracticable thing and the quicker it was stopped the better; and it may be said now that so far from having lost anything the company made money by the work being stopped, and therefore nothing should ever be paid to them. I think we ought to say that so far as they went they ought to be settled with. This joint resolution proposes to do it, and I understand that the Senators from Wisconsin do not object to it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We do not; we concede it because the committees so report, and their opinion is that it ought to be settled in this way. We have acquiesced in it.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no necessity of our settling with the State and then leaving something else to be settled. We may as well settle the matter all around at once. We had better do it now when the State itself and the company and our own committee are all willing to have the question settled and closed. We had better, therefore, pass the joint resolution and have a general settlement all round.

It is perfectly clear in my mind that if we take from Wisconsin the whole amount of money for which they sold the canal lands we shall owe that much to the canal company ourselves. They will then come to Congress at once and say to the United States, "You appropriated some land to us to build a canal; the Territory as trustee stopped it, sold the land, took the money; you settled with them for that money and accounted for it toward your five per cent.; now pay us the money as far as we did go." If they pretend to urge a claim on the State, the State will say, "We settled with the Government, they have paid us, and what money we received for you was taken from us in the account and went toward our five per cent. fund, and now if you want anything you must go to Congress."

Unless we settle it as the resolution proposes, it is clear that the matter will not be closed. I am therefore of opinion the joint resolution should be passed unless it be for one or two things which we can amend, and I will state what they are. At first we put on $2 50 an acre as the price of the reserved lands that we did not grant for the canal. The Territory sold some of its land for $1 25, and I believe some of it was not sold, and we provided that that part should be reckoned toward the five hundred thousand acres which the State received on admission into the Union. It was right that all which was not sold should go toward making up the five hundred thousand acres. Of that which they did sell I do not know but that they sold some at $2 50, and they sold the rest at $1 25. They paid over some money to the canal company. They soon came to Congress and got the price of the reserved sections reduced from $2 50 to $1 25. They then went on and sold theirs at $1 25. They had no authority for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to present the amendment that I indicated some time ago in a more perfect form, and I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to do it, so that when the question comes up again I shall not have to restate the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to observe that I am not through with the remarks I have to make about this joint resolution, and I shall claim the floor when it comes up again.

Mr. HARLAN. I submit my amendment and ask that it be printed.

The amendment was ordered to be printed.

TRANSFERS FROM THE ARMY TO THE NAVY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The House of Representatives have returned the bill (S. No. 218) to repeal the first section of a joint resolution therein named, with a slight amendment which the Chair will lay before the Senate at this time.

The amendment was read. It was to alter the title of the bill so as to make it read: "An act to repeal the first section of the joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service, approved February 24, 1864."

The amendment was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th instant, a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, communicating information relative to the delivery of a person charged with crime against Spain, or its dependencies, to the officers of that Government; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of May 20, a report from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, accompanied by an abstract of the reports of the banks, associations, corporations, and individuals doing a banking business, which are required to be made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government," approved March 3, 1863. A motion of Mr. HENDERSON to print the report was referred to the Committee on Printing.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 294) for the better protection of the tribal rights and interests of the Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

INFORMATION FROM THE ARMIES.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested as soon as he receives information from the armies of the United States to communicate the same to the Senate during its present session, when in his opinion such information can be given without injury to the public interest.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTORS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats, and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER,

J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURN,

THOMAS D. ELIOT,

W. A. HUTCHINS,

Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, was resumed as in Committee of the Whole; the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. WILSON to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That a tax of one half of one per cent. shall be levied and paid, according to such forms and regulations as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the gross amount of all sales of goods, wares, merchandise, produce, live-stock, sailing and steam vessels of all descriptions, and other articles of commerce or trade, whether foreign or domestic, excluding coin, and gold and silver unmanufactured, and including real estate, whether such sale be judicial, public, or private, and whether made by the owner or his agent, or by any officer of the law, which shall be paid in the manner in this act provided: by the owner, when such sale is made by him; by the owner or agent, as shall be provided by regulation of the Secretary of the Treasury, when such sale shall be made by an agent, commission merchant, or broker; by a guardian or commissioner or other officer of the law, when such sale shall be made by or for him; by the parties selling, when the name of the owner is not disclosed: Provided, That any officer of the law shall have the right to add to the taxable costs of the proceedings the amount of tax due upon such sale, and to demand and receive the same before executing or delivering possession or evidence of title to the purchaser: Provided also, That no tax shall be levied or required on sales of such personal property in any month in which the amount of sales shall be less than $100: Provided, That in case of all sales of real estate, and on all sales of personal property, made by guardians, commissioners, sheriffs, marshals, or other officers of the law, the said tax shall be levied without limitation in the amount of sales.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Finance have considered this bill carefully, have made several amendments to it, and it is now before us subject to further amendments. It is understood that the needs of the country require that we should raise from three to four hundred million dollars a year by internal taxation. I have read the bill with some little care, and I have conversed with gentlemen who, I think, understand the subject quite well, and I believe that this bill will not raise within a hundred or a hundred and fifty million dollars of the amount of money that the country requires should be now raised. I think that some of the best minds of the country believe this bill will not raise over two hundred or two hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

Mr. FOOT. What is the Senator's estimate of the amount that will be produced by the tax on sales which he proposes?

Mr. WILSON. I think this half per cent. tax on sales will bring us from a hundred to a hundred and fifty millions. I think we ought not to allow this bill to go from the Senate unless we are very sure that it will give us $350,000,000 of revenue. There has never been a time in the history of the country when we could pay taxes better than at the present time. We can pay taxes much better now than we can when we shall have peace. We have more than seven hundred million of money in circulation. Labor is high, skilled labor in all parts of the country especially high; many men employed in mechanical pursuits are receiving three or four dollars a day. The cost of living, it is true, is very high; but this great cost of living has been brought upon the country because we have not raised revenue enough and have expanded the currency. We should be better off now if during the past two years we had paid treble the taxes provided for in this bill. I believe the people of the country will make money by putting on a tax that will pay the interest on our public debt and at least one half of all our annual expenses. We shall all save money by it, because by that means, and by that means alone, we can keep down the redundancy of the currency. We have passed gold bills without effect; all expedients have failed and will fail. We have hoped that General Grant's victories would bring down gold, but gold goes up in the face of our victories. If Lee's army should capitulate this day gold would keep up to an enormous standard until we reduced the $700,000,000 of paper currency now in circulation to at least three hundred and fifty or four hundred million.

The rate of taxation I propose on sales may be too high, but I have no doubt it will give us at least $100,000,000, and it is believed that it is an easy way to raise a large revenue. Many of the best practical men of the country believe in this system, and have always advocated it. I see no inconsistency in adding it to the system embodied in this bill.

I am in favor of another amendment, which I intend to propose, and that is in regard to the exemption of $600 incomes, under cover of which a large majority of all the incomes in the country pay no tax, under which some of the most independent men in the country pay no income tax. I think we should exempt the earnings of men engaged as laborers and in mechanical pursuits under say $600; but to men who own property, who own farms, who employ others, we should not make this exemption. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of the most independent men in the country pay no income tax at all under your law, and whole communities go without paying any income tax.

There are some other provisions in this bill, and especially those increasing the compensation of the officers, to which I object. I have a table which shows that the increase of salaries by this bill as it now stands is $547,000. I hope we shall do nothing of the kind. I believe the salaries are sufficiently high now. We ought not to add a dollar except to the Commissioner. I think we should pay him a good salary, and demand the first mind of the country to administer this great department of our Government.

If Senators think the half per cent. on sales proposed by my amendment is too large, they can make it one fourth per cent.; but I believe that if we add this amendment to the other provisions of the bill we can raise three hundred and fifty or four hundred million dollars, and all the interests of the country will be promoted by it; and everybody who has got anything or hopes to get anything, and everybody who desires to live within his means, will be benefited by this increased taxation, for it will reduce the redundant circulation that is now carrying up the prices of everything to an enormous rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great objection to a tax on sales is that it will put upon the tax-duplicate nearly every able-bodied citizen of the United States, and perhaps about one fourth or one fifth of the women of the country. It will be a tax very difficult to be collected and very expensive in its collection. It will very materially check the transfer of property by levying a tax upon property passing from hand to hand rapidly many times in the course of a year. For instance, the crop of wheat in its ordinary course, in passing from producer to consumer, goes through at least four or five different channels. All clogs in the way of trade are injurious.

Besides, a tax of this kind would make a necessity for more than doubling your army of office-holders, and would add very largely to the expense. A tax on sales could not be collected, in my judgment, for less than one tenth of what it would yield. When applied to auction sales, or sales by merchandise brokers, the only classes of sales included in our tax law, it may be collected, because auctioneers and brokers sell in large quantities in the cities, and can be reached; but when you apply the tax on sales to the whole country, extending to the produce of the farm, to the produce of the shop, and to all the various transactions of business, you so multiply the tax that you have not the machinery to collect it under this bill. I would vote for a general tax on sales if it could be fairly executed, but as I am satisfied it cannot be, I cannot vote for this amendment.

I agree with what the Senator from Massachusetts has said as to the necessity of taxation. I believe that this bill is inadequate to produce what is absolutely necessary for the wants of the Government. The estimated yield under it is $250,000,000. It may yield that after a year or two, but it probably will not in the first year. We know by the experience of the present tax law that it did not yield one half the estimate at first, and it is probable that during the first year this tax law will not yield so largely as has been estimated. In my judgment, the true way to raise the amount necessary is to assess the tax so that the persons who are to pay it will be as few as possible. If the Senator will propose to increase the tax on manufactured articles fixed in the ninety-third section of the bill, to double or even quadruple the tax on manufactures, it will yield twice or three times the amount of the tax on sales and will be collected from comparatively few persons. If a tax of twenty or twenty-five per cent. is levied on manufactures, it will be mostly paid in the manufacturing States, but it will be added to the cost of the articles and will be finally collected from the consumers. Experience has taught in England and France and in our own country that a large tax on manufactures, which is collected in the first instance from comparatively few persons, can be levied at less expense than any other, and is finally disseminated among the people in the least offensive form. I do not know any way in which you can increase the taxes proposed by this bill unless you increase the tax on manufactured goods. If, therefore, the Senate really feels that the amount provided for by this bill is not sufficient, the only way in my judgment—every Senator must form his own opinion—is to levy a tax on manufactures sufficiently high to raise the requisite sum of money. The reduction of the currency and the addition of twenty or thirty per cent. to the tax on manufactures would yield the money we need. A tax of even fifty per cent. on manufactures would only add one half to the cost of the articles; it would not add as much to the cost of the articles now consumed in this country as the inflation of paper has already added. It could be readily collected first from the manufacturers in very large sums, and finally from the people when they consume the articles. I have conversed with many manufacturers in the eastern States—nearly all of them are in the eastern States—and they do not object to it. As a general rule, they make a profit on the tax because they not only add the tax itself to the price of their goods, but they add a reasonable profit on the tax besides.

I think, then, that if the Senator has convinced the Senate that the bill is not sufficient to raise the money necessary, the mode which he proposes is not the proper one to accomplish the object, because it is expensive, troublesome, and burdensome. It will put on the tax-duplicate at least one million persons. A tax on sales would extend to every employment of life. It would be a tax most difficult and expensive in its collection, and it would be very often evaded, and would lead to sham sales. It would destroy all those intermediate agents through whom sales are made, brokers, factors, and all those men whose operations tend to keep down prices.

I will only say further that in case the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts is adopted, the machinery of this bill, in my judgment, is not sufficient to execute it. Instead of one assistant assessor for each county in the western States, you must have many more. The amendment, if I understand it correctly, extends to all agricultural productions; probably it is right that it should; there is no reason why a tax should not extend to agricultural productions as well as other productions; but the effect will be to put every farmer in the country on the tax-duplicate, and you will have to assess the amount of his production and the amount of his sales. A portion of his productions are converted into hogs and sold in that shape, and so on. It will be very difficult indeed to assess such a tax without at least as many tax officers as there are now under State laws, one for every township in the United States. It will be a task so difficult that I think any one would be deterred from doing it. It is not a proper mode of taxation. The proper mode is to reach those articles which will pay the largest tax, and let the tax be distributed afterwards on the consumption of the articles taxed. If I am correctly informed, no nation has ever attempted a tax on sales. England has not tried it; France has not attempted it; and that very fact is a reasonable argument against our attempting the experiment now.

Mr. WILSON. Early in the war one of the most practical men in the country, Mr. Bigelow, of Boston, came here and pressed upon Congress this plan of raising revenue. He thought it was a practicable measure. I had consulted with many other manufacturers and business men, who believe the plan practicable. Still I know that it will not do to rely entirely upon the judgment of business men or of bankers in dealing with these questions, for they differ very much in opinion, and I think we have found sometimes that they have changed their opinions very often.

The Senator from Ohio says that this amendment, if adopted, will require the addition of an immense number of Government officials. That certainly is a very great objection, for I think we have quite too many of them now. I am very anxious, however, to adopt some plan that shall raise more revenue than I think can be raised by this bill. I am willing to carry the taxes up from five to seven per cent., and to increase the duty on whisky and tobacco, and I think we ought to do it. At any rate, I think we ought to meet the question now, and make a bill that we are sure will give us from three to four hundred million dollars during the next year. We want the money and we want it now. A hundred million dollars is of more consequence to us now, probably, than it ever has been at any other period during the war, or perhaps ever will be to us again. I shall not, however, urge this amendment. I know some very excellent men, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, who think that this is a practicable measure; and it did seem to me that with our present organization under this bill we could, with some increase of officers, enforce this provision, and raise out of it the money necessary to make up the sum that I think we all admit we ought to raise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend from Ohio has stated in brief and very clearly the objections to this mode of taxation. I do not propose to repeat them, as I hope we shall get along with as little talking as possible. I will only say in addition that this measure was proposed two years ago, when we made the original tax bill. It was urged with a good deal of vehemence by the gentleman alluded to, and by some others. It was thoroughly, and I will say exhaustively, examined by the committees of both branches of Congress, and it was also urged, I think, in both branches of Congress on motion. The committees came to the conclusion almost with entire unanimity that the thing was utterly impracticable, especially in this form. The only mode in which we could get at a tax on sales, and the mode that was proposed by the gentleman alluded to, was by a system of stamp duties, requiring a stamp on every package sold. That was also found to involve such serious difficulties that it was also deliberately abandoned. I should be very glad if anything could be made out of it; I should be very glad to find any sources of revenue which we could appeal to to raise the increased amount of money we have to raise, but I am satisfied this is not one of them; and I feel, therefore, having once thoroughly examined the subject, and it having been so maturely and carefully considered and deliberately rejected, as no new light whatever is afforded us, and no new scheme proposed by which it can be carried into effect, to still object to it as impracticable, and involving difficulties that are too great for us to surmount. It may be that I am in error about it; I am apt to be mistaken about a great many things; but if I am mistaken I err in common with almost every man who has examined the subject of taxation. The system that has been found the most practicable is that the subjects of taxation should be as few as possible; that as far as possible the taxes should be laid and laid severely upon luxuries; and some things must be so considered which are in general and almost universal use. If we are obliged to enlarge that list we should enlarge it as little as possible, and upon articles where the tax can best be laid, and where the collection can be most easily and most securely enforced.

These are the principles upon which the bill is framed. The bill covers a vast number of articles as it is. I should like it better if we could reduce the number, but I see no way to do that. We have resorted to almost everything that could be thought of. We even propose to add ice, not that it is likely to yield a large revenue, but I give it as an instance. I should be glad to go further; but I assure my friend from Massachusetts that if his amendment should prevail I should not have the slightest hope or expectation that it would be adopted by the other branch; it would create a division. It is introducing in a short section an entire new system, which would need a great many details in order to render it effective. I think, therefore, it is unwise, and I should advise that it be not done.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment under the circumstances.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Anthony in the chair.) The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. I have an amendment. I propose in section fifteen to strike out all after the word "income," in the ninth line, to the word "and," in the twelfth line, and to insert:

Do not exceed the sum of $600, and be not derived from compensation for actual personal labor or services personally rendered in mechanical pursuits, a duty of three per cent.; and on all incomes over $600, and not exceeding $10,000, five per cent.

The words which I propose to strike out are:

Exceed the sum of $600, a duty of five per cent. on the excess over $600 and not exceeding $10,000.

Under the provision exempting $600, more than half and I think nearly two thirds of all the incomes in the United States pay no tax. Some of the most independent men of the country, men who have possession of houses and lands, of flocks and herds, who employ other persons to work for them, who have families that they support in independence, pay no income tax whatever. An examination of the income tax returns show that the incomes of the country do not pay the tax they ought to pay. I am willing to exempt the products of a man's personal labor if he works on a farm or as a laborer or as a mechanic and earns under $600 a year. I am willing to let that go to support his family.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose he is a lawyer or a doctor?

Mr. GRIMES. Or a preacher.

Mr. WILSON. I think lawyers and doctors and preachers ought to pay their income tax as the rest of us pay ours.

Mr. COWAN. I ask the Senator what he would do in the case of a widow living on a dower of less than $600 or an orphan child that had a distributive share yielding less than $600.

Mr. WILSON. I am against making exemptions of persons who have property or possess incomes not earned by their own toil. If persons labor, I am willing to make the exemption; but I do not believe in this system of exemption. The facts are before us; the results show that whole townships do not pay a dollar of income tax, or that but one or two men pay it—whole farming communities pay not a dollar,

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether the very men whose incomes are less than $600 do not pay almost all the taxes of the country, from the fact that they are the consumers of the products which are taxed.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir, they do not pay almost all the taxes. That is a very great error which is prevalent in the country. The working men of my State, of New England, of New York, who labor for a living in our various mechanical and manufacturing pursuits, our mechanics who work for wages and never employ others, pay three times as much tax for the support of this Government as the farmers of any part of the country. There are many laboring men, men who labor for others for wages, who pay toward the support of the Government three times as much as farmers living by their side worth their thousands. Every man knows this who knows anything about the subject. Talk not to me about the farming communities paying the taxes on our imports or our internal productions. The communities who have to buy with their labor all that supports them pay the greater proportion of the taxes.

Senators say that we in the manufacturing States do not pay the taxation. I tell you, sir, that the commercial and manufacturing States pay three or four times as much tax on the consumption both on foreign and domestic products under the tariff laws and under your system of internal taxation as do the communities that are engaged in farming. It is so in the towns in our own States. In some towns the people engaged in mechanical or manufacturing occupations purchase everything they consume; in other towns the people engaged in farming purchase hardly anything. In towns of great wealth where there are rich farmers they buy but very little compared with the poor men who live in commercial, manufacturing, and mechanical towns.

If this amendment of mine be adopted, all persons receiving under $600, with the exception of those who earn that much by labor or in some mechanical pursuit, will pay three per cent. on their incomes, and all persons having incomes from $600 to $10,000 will pay five per cent. The bill provides that all incomes above $10,000 shall pay seven and a half per cent. That, I believe, we have settled upon.

All over this country there is a great deal of cheating in regard to the income tax. I was told the other day of some seven or eight gentlemen in one of the most wealthy towns of New England who met together one fine morning in the office of the assessor and assessed themselves. One of them said to another, "Your income, I suppose, is about six thousand dollars a year." He answered, "Yes, about that." To another it was said, "Yours is about four thousand dollars;" and to another, "Yours is about three thousand dollars," and so on. They made out their incomes in that way; and the man who had his income put down at $6,000 had really an income of from forty to fifty thousand dollars, and the others in proportion. It is so all over the country. Men who have large incomes are returning their incomes reduced in every way; and some men are absolutely changing their places of residence to escape paying this income tax. We have that abuse at one end; and at the other we have the great mass of our countrymen receiving under $600 exempt from paying anything. I am opposed to this system. Exempt as few as possible, and see to it that the large incomes are taxed as they should be.

Mr. CLARK. I have not any doubt that some people of large wealth do avoid the proper proportion of their tax; nor have I any doubt that under any system which we may frame some will do it. The fault may be somewhat in the law, but in my judgment it is very much more in the breast of the individual, and if he is disposed to cheat the Government he will contrive some way to do it. That, however, is no argument why we should not make the bill as perfect as possible to reach all classes of persons, and to reach all property. But it seems to me that the Senator from Massachusetts is not directing his amendment to what he wants to obtain. He proposes here in this amendment to provide that unless the person has earned the $600 with his own hands in some mechanical employment he shall not be exempt from this tax. What is the theory on which the exemption goes? That the man needs $600 for the support of his family, and if he only gets $600 for that support that you shall not take any of it from him for the support of the Government. I desire to ask the Senator whether, if that be the true theory, the family of the man who earns $600 in some other way is not just as dear to him and just as necessary to be supported as the family of the man who earns $600 by his own hands. Take for instance the man who trades in a shop; the profits of his business have been only $600; he has a family of little ones at home; they are to be supported just as much as the family of a man who works in the mechanic shop. Take the clergyman, if you please, who lives on a salary of $600, and there are very many of them all through his country and mine who do not get more than that, with their families at home. Shall they be taxed any more than the man who labors only six days of the week with his hands in some mechanical employment? Take other professional men; take the lawyer who only gets his $600 and has a family; take the doctor who only has his $600 and has a family; and there are many of both classes. Are they to be taxed, and the man who earns it with his hands to be exempted? Would it not be invidious, and would it not be exempting a class instead of all the classes that were in a like situation?

I submit to the honorable Senator that the cheating is not so much with these small men who have only $600 as it is with the men who have hundreds of thousands such as he suggests; but under this bill the incident that he mentions cannot take place, because we propose now to require every person under oath to make his return and to state what his income has been; and I submit that in the very case which he names the fault was not so much in the law as it was in the execution of the law, because all the assessors have been furnished with blanks and regulations by the revenue bureau, requiring a man to return his income on this account and that account, and to specify his credits, to state the account. That might have been done; but if the assessor chose to let a man say, "I will be taxed for so much income," it was the fault of the officer and not the fault of the law, and there may possibly be dishonest officers. We must do the best we can, but a provision of this kind would not reach such cases.

I suggest to the Senator that his amendment reaches a very small class and a very worthy class, when he should have directed it against the men who have large property. I hope the amendment will not be made. I hope that while we are taxing heavily—and I agree to all that has been said in regard to the necessity of taxes—we shall not begin by imposing heavier burdens on those individuals who have the least and take from them what they need for the support of their families.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. As it seems we cannot adopt anything that will increase the taxes, I propose now to diminish the expenses a little. I move to amend the twenty-second section of the bill by striking out all after the word "quarterly," in line four, to the word "and" in line ten, and to insert:

And in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $200,000, and shall not exceed the sum of $400,000 annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $200,000; where the receipts of a collection district shall exceed $400,000, and shall not exceed $600,000, one fourth of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $400,000; where the receipts shall exceed $600,000, one tenth of one per cent. upon such excess. But the salary of no assessor shall in any case exceed the sum of $4,000.

The words which I propose to strike out are:

And in addition thereto, where the receipts of the collection district shall exceed the sum of $100,000 annually, one half of one per cent. upon the excess of receipts over $100,000; but the salary of no assessor shall in any case exceed the sum of $4,000.

This amendment will offer an inducement by paying something for the assessment where the collections in the district are over six hundred thousand dollars. By the bill as it now stands, the assessor gets a fixed salary and then he is allowed a certain percentage up to a certain sum, and when he gets that sum he has no particular inducement to go on and assess other property where he may find it. I propose by this amendment that he shall have as much as $3,000 where the collections reach $600,000; that is $1,500 salary and a percentage up to $400,000, and then a certain percentage to $600,000, and one tenth of one per cent. on all over six hundred thousand dollars, so that if the amount collected should be $1,600,000, the assessor would get $1,000 additional percentage, making altogether $4,000. I think that amount abundant. I think $3,000 is salary enough for a man who assesses property which yields $600,000, and then I would hold out an inducement by giving him one tenth of one per cent. to go on and get more if he could, limiting his compensation, however, to $4,000.

I have before me a statement which shows that by the bill as it now stands before us we are now raising salaries very largely. Forty assessors now receiving $3,000 will get under the bill as it stands $4,000. Ten assessors receiving $2,500 will get $4,000. Forty assessors receiving $2,000 will get $3,200. Fifty-five assessors receiving $1,500 will get $2,700. It will add to the assessors altogether $181,000 in salaries. There are two thousand five hundred and forty-eight assistant assessors. The average number of days per month service on their part is twelve days. The addition proposed by the bill to their salary for a year on that basis is $366,912, making an aggregate increase of $547,912. I am of the opinion that we ought not to increase these salaries. My amendment will increase the salaries of about forty assessors a small amount.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that the question which the Senator suggests was considered carefully by the committee, and they finally settled down on the bill as it now stands. We had a great many representations made to us on the subject. We did not make any calculation to show how much the bill would increase the pay of assessors taking the whole country through; we were not furnished with those statistics; but we took into consideration what the assessors in small districts would be likely to receive, being aware too that in some of the large ones the pay must be increased somewhat, and we deemed it necessary that it should be. The result of the amendments which have been made on the motion of the committee will be that the matter will probably be in debate and be considered in a committee of conference. We moved our amendments principally with a view to have the matter left open for further consideration. I am very glad the Senator has presented the statistics. If his amendment should be adopted, the result probably would be that there would be a disagreement which would remain to be considered by the committee of conference, but I think he would attain his object as well (presuming that the same course will be taken with the bill as was taken two years ago) by submitting his amendment, with the statistics he has, to the consideration of the committee of conference that will be appointed.

I hardly think it advisable to make the change he has suggested, for the reason that there is a large number of districts, very much the largest number of districts, where there is not $200,000 assessed and collected. Many districts range somewhere from sixty to a hundred thousand dollars. In these he would confine the salary to $1,500. It may be enough, perhaps, in such cases, and we do not propose to give any percentage on the first $100,000, but I think when the collections are above $100,000 probably $1,500 would not be enough to meet the necessary expenses which the assessor must be at and pay him a fair remuneration. I think, therefore, it is hardly advisable to make the change, but of course the whole matter is for the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am very glad that the Senator from Massachusetts has offered this amendment. When I read the bill before I thought these rates of compensation too high, but I did not understand the subject well enough to make any suggestion in regard to it. When we are taxing the people so heavily I do not think it is a time to give very large salaries. Four thousand dollars is a very enormous salary in the country districts, and in cities I should think good men could be had at very much less rates.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is not a fixed salary, but it is a maximum, and there are very few districts where that maximum will be reached. At any rate we changed the bill as it stood originally in this respect, with a view to have the matter open to further discussion. It was represented to us, and we were certainly induced to believe, that there were some districts where the maximum formerly fixed, $3,000, is hardly sufficient to obtain the kind of men that you must have to discharge these duties faithfully. Take, for instance, the city of New York; you cannot get men to devote their whole time to the duties for the salary now allowed. In the present state of the currency of the country it only amounts to $2,000 actually, and you want first-class men and you cannot get them for that sum in your large cities, where the expenses of living are really very high. You cannot get there the kind of men that you want and must have in order to collect your revenue, for that sum. I am perfectly convinced of that; and as the districts where the maximum will be reached are so few, we predicated it upon the necessities of the time, believing that what we lost by the slight addition to the maximum of salary we should very much more than gain by having the right kind of men, willing to accept the office and to discharge the duties properly. It may be that we are mistaken; I have no pride of opinion about it; but it was in reference to that consideration that the salaries were raised, and in view of the increased prices of living growing out of the present state of the currency, which really makes the matter worthy of consideration. As I said before, however, the committee had no other object than every gentleman here ought to have, and undoubtedly has, to effect the great purposes of the bill at as reasonable a rate as we can.

Mr. GRIMES. If I agreed with the Senator from Maine that it was necessary in order to secure the services of the right sort of men to fix the salary at $4,000, I should vote with the committee, but I do not exactly agree in that opinion. I believe the services of as competent men as there are in the country can be secured for less than the amount which has been fixed by the Committee on Finance. I have never heard that there has been any trouble growing out of the declinations or resignations of gentlemen who held these offices in New York or Boston or elsewhere. I think that if there should happen to be a vacancy by death or resignation there would be an abundance of patriotic gentlemen in each of those cities who would be willing to fill the vacancy. Nor do I altogether concur in the suggestion that it is very expensive to live in the cities. Only last Sunday I was reading a Boston paper in which there was an account of a meeting of boarding-house keepers—it seemed to be a very large one—in which they fixed the price of board, aside from lodging, at four dollars a week. That is no higher than board in the cities of the Northwest. I do not know how it may be in New York. I only cite this illustration of the expense of living in Boston from the fact that a meeting of this body of people, a very respectable body of people everywhere, determined that they must increase the price of board, aside from lodging, to four dollars a week. We furnish these men with their offices, and, according to the returns made to the Commissioner from some of the Boston assessors and collectors, we furnish them most luxuriously.

Mr. HENDRICKS. During this session I have been a good deal embarrassed about what was my proper duty in respect to the question of salaries. I appreciate the suggestions of the Senator from Maine touching the expense of living in view of the condition of the currency; but if we go into a general increase of salaries it is hard to tell how much the expense of the Government will be increased. In this city there is a very large class of clerks, generally intelligent business men; who get $1,200. I do not see how they live and support their families; and yet my acquaintance with that class of gentlemen satisfies me that most of them are fit to be assessors under this law. They are generally intelligent business men, and I should think one half of them were fit for these places; if they are fit to be clerks, I know they are; I know it from my connection with the public offices at one time. I do not feel that I can do what I should like to do, if we do justice to the Government under the circumstances.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Mr. President, it matters not how much patriotism there is in the country, and how men are disposed to go into this war with a perfect rush, when you appeal to the pockets of the people and begin to impose on them the onerous burden of taxation they commence to count the cost and look about them. We should do nothing to make our tax bill unpopular or any more burdensome to the country at large than is barely possible; and I know of no feature in the bill which is more calculated to dissatisfy the public mind of the body of the community—the tax-payers—than the provision for the undue increase of the salaries of those persons who are employed in the assessment and collection of these taxes.

I know that there is a great anxiety on the subject of increasing the salaries of persons engaged in this duty; and it is perfectly natural that it should be so. Men want to benefit themselves and receive a large reward. But there has been just as strong an interest in procuring these appointments, and that interest is felt to this day; and there are thousands of good men who have not these appointments at the hands of the Government who are fully as competent as the incumbents, and who would be willing to take the appointments and stipulate not to ask for an increase of their salaries. I did not the other day vote against the amendment of the committee, though I thought it very impolitic indeed, which proposed to raise the per diem allowance of the deputy assessors, increasing it a dollar a day more than they have been in the habit of receiving. I have some knowledge of the class of persons who are employed as deputy assessors. They are worthy men; they are excellent men; but they are men many of whom are receiving almost double what they have received for any employment in which they have heretofore been engaged.

How does it strike a community, either a manufacturing town or an agricultural district? You send your tax-gatherers into every hole and corner; they are numerous; there are swarms of them; it is necessary that there should be a large number; and the men who have to pay the taxes ascertain the amount of these men's salaries, and they make a difficulty about it. It makes the law unpopular, and it is one of the many reasons why the patriotism of the country, which was so warm and glowing at the start, has cooled off and become chill; and I fear that if too heavy burdens be put on it may die out altogether. I want the war carried on; I want all the taxes raised that we can possibly raise to keep down the public debt, and to insure the payment of interest on our public debt. One of the means of doing it is to keep down the expenses of the collection of the internal revenue. I want to relieve the system from the objection which is raised to it and the odium cast upon it on the part of the great mass of the community because of the amount deducted from the fund for the purpose of defraying the expenses of collection.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. WILSON. By the bill as it now stands an assessor who assesses $600,000 will get a salary of $4,000. By the amendment which I propose an assessor who assesses $600,000 will get a salary of $3,000, and $3,000 is enough. We sit here for $3,000 a year. Our services may be worth very little; but I think they are worth quite as much as those of the assessors in the various congressional districts. If an assessor assesses over $600,000 I propose to give him one tenth of one per cent. on the excess until he gets up to $1,600,000, where I propose to stop. There are some large districts that raise over $600,000, and we ought to encourage the assessors to go on and assess for the Government all that can be assessed; but by the provisions of the bill as it stands he gets his salary of $4,000 when he gets up to $600,000, and he has no motive to go further. I believe this amendment is right, and ought to be adopted.

Then I propose to add another provision. I notice in the bill that clerks are allowed to be employed without limitation. I know that frauds have been committed by some of these assessors. In one case an assessor employed a boy as clerk and paid him twelve dollars a month and charged the Government six hundred a year. In another district the assessor used the assistant assessors and made them do the work, and then charged the Government for their pay as clerks.

Mr. JOHNSON. In what State was that?

Mr. WILSON. In the State of New York.

Mr. FOOT. The assessors should have been reported and discharged.

Mr. WILSON. Some of these offending assessors have been reported, and some others will be reported. I am in favor of fixing the salaries in this act as they ought to be, and giving as little discretion to anybody as possible. Three thousand dollars is enough for any assessor in this country who assesses $600,000. I propose to give a percentage above that, simply as an inducement for the assessor to go on and get something more than $600,000 for the Government. I shall further propose an amendment, in another section, to provide that the allowance for clerks shall not exceed $3,000 for any one office. In some cases of two offices that collect the same amount of money, one does it for one third the clerk hire and one third the expenses of the other. I have read the list of the districts of the country, and have compared them carefully, so that I know whereof I affirm when I say that abuses exist in some of the offices.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator, (for really I do not feel disposed to contest his amendment very much; I like the principle of it, and was originally in favor of it in committee,) whether he does not make the minimum a little too high; whether an assessor, if he assesses over $100,000, should not be entitled to a commission of one half per cent. Of course I do not want to meddle with the amendment, as he has prepared it, but I would suggest whether this $1,500 is salary enough in all cases where an amount less than $200,000 is assessed.

Mr. WILSON. My reason for fixing that minimum was that in those districts where we collect less than two hundred thousand dollars the people are generally poor people, and in those parts of the country the expense of living is not very great, and a salary of $1,500 is probably as high a salary as is paid to any public officers. It seemed to me that a salary of $1,500 was sufficient for the assessor in a district where he did not assess more than $200,000.

Mr. GRIMES. The judges of the circuit court in my State get $1,350 a year, and they have on an average eight counties in a district to which they go twice a year; and we propose to pay these assessors who are permitted to have deputy assessors in every county in the district, $1,500 a year.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The assessor must go into every county.

Mr. GRIMES. He goes in once; he is there a day. The business is all done in the counties by the deputy assessors.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not object to the amendment very much individually; but as chairman of the committee, I stand by the amendment proposed by the committee. I must say I like the principle of this amendment very much, and I have been from the beginning in favor of it; but it seems to me the minimum is very high. I think the Senator from Massachusetts had better change it to $100,000. We shall get more revenue by it in that way, because there are very few districts that go up to $200,000, and a great many that stand between $100,000 and $200,000, and it might induce a large number of assessors to make every exertion to get the revenue up.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator, I understand, agrees to the principle of my amendment; he simply proposes that instead of saying that on all exceeding $200,000 one half per cent. shall be allowed, the commission shall begin with $100,000. That would add something to the expense; but it might be some inducement, and I will agree to strike out "two" and insert "one." I so modify the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I rather advanced an argument against myself. I meant to say that there was a very large number of districts, in my judgment—I do not know how many—where the revenue does not come up to $100,000, and they might probably take extra pains to bring it up to that sum if the commission began there.

Mr. GRIMES. You have about doubled, as I understand, or expect to double the receipts by this bill. There is hardly a district in the country that is so poor that it has not yielded in the neighborhood of eighty or ninety thousand dollars under the law as it now stands. Under this bill I take it we are going to realize in any district hardly less than $200,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is not of very great importance how you fix it if you introduce this system, because it will all come under the revision of the committee of conference finally which will examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts may modify his amendment by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

Mr. WILSON. I think on consideration I will not do it, in view of the fact that we are largely increasing taxation. I think most of the districts will be over two hundred thousand dollars.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cardie, Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendrickson, Hendricks, Hicks, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Salisbury, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, Willey, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Clark, Fessenden, Johnson, Nesmith, Richardson, and Van Winkle—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Dixon, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Riddle, Sprague, Wilkinson, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to amend the twenty-second section in the eighteenth line after the word "compensation" by inserting "not exceeding $3,000 for any one office."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that the committee have considered that subject, and the Senator from Wisconsin, who is not in his seat, [Mr. Howe] has an amendment to cover that whole matter. We are cognizant of the abuses that have existed, and think we have provided against them.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. But I wish to ask the Senator in regard to another amendment. In line twenty-three of that section we have amended the House bill by striking out $3 50 and inserting $4 a day as the pay of assistant assessors. I suppose it is not in order now to strike that out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No. You can object to it when it comes into the Senate.

Mr. WILSON. I shall have to defer that, then. I want to ask the Senator further if in the fiftieth and fifty-second lines of the twenty-second section, before the word "assessors," the word "collectors" ought not to be put in?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir. The collectors stand by themselves in another portion of the bill. This section relates simply to assessors, and has nothing to do with collectors.

Mr. WILSON. I propose in section twenty-three, line twenty, to strike out "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and insert "accounting officers;" and I wish to state why I do that. I think that the money ought not to be paid over to the collector; I think he should not settle these accounts, but they should go to the accounting officers of the Treasury, where all other accounts go.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that that whole subject is under consideration, and we propose to materially change the whole frame of the bill in that respect. The Senator from Wisconsin has a series of amendments to offer, when they are perfected, in that respect.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to ask the Senator if in the twenty-fourth section, on page 27, these words are to be retained in the bill:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to make such further allowances, from time to time, as may be reasonable in cases in which, from the territorial extent of the district, or from the amount of internal duties collected, or from other circumstances, it may seem just to make such allowances.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir, we propose to retain them.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move to strike out those words, and I do it for this reason: I do not think the Secretary of the Treasury ought to have any discretion in the matter whatever. I have as much confidence in the present Secretary of the Treasury as any other man in the country can have or ought to have; but I do not think he should be now allowed in the law any discretion in the matter. When we established the system there might be reasons for it because we did not understand how it would work; but the act is in operation, the condition of every district is well known by the returns that are made, and I happen to know that every effort has been made and every influence brought to bear to get allowances from some parts of the country for these officers. So long as the Secretary of the Treasury is allowed any discretion he will have these men besieging the Treasury building for the increase of their compensation.

The Secretary of the Treasury cannot attend to these matters; they must be turned over to some of the subordinates, and when these men know that this subject is turned over to some of the subordinate officers of the Treasury, they know just how to approach them and persuade them and apply every influence to get their ends answered. I know that such influences have been brought to bear and are being brought to bear by these officers, and I want no discretion left in the Treasury Department. An honest, faithful Secretary of the Treasury cannot devote his time to the subject in the multiplicity of his engagements; he must turn it over to some subordinate officer, and I have not the fullest confidence in all the subordinate officers of the Government, either in the Treasury or any other Department. Therefore I move to strike out these words; they are not needed in the law, and so long as they are there several districts will be agitated more or less by an effort to get the compensation increased. If Senators knew the amount of labor, the running to Washington, the efforts that have been made during this session of Congress by Government officials to get their compensation increased, they would not permit the clause to stand in this act for one moment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose I need not assure the Senate that a clause of this importance did not pass either in the original bill or in this bill without very careful consideration, and that there was no member of the committee that did not have very considerable reluctance as to allowing the clause to stand. We, however, came to the conclusion that there was no other way to reach it. Such is the diversity of districts in the country that it is in the nature of things impossible to frame a system of salaries and payments to these officers which will apply with equal justice to the whole country. You cannot do it by any human ingenuity. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts, who is so positive on the subject, who speaks of what he knows, when he moves to strike out this clause, propose something by which we can avoid the very difficulties that we want to avoid. I am averse to giving this power to the Secretary of the Treasury, to the present Secretary or to any other; and why? If he is an honest man I do not want to burden him with the labor and trouble; I do not want to subject him to the annoyance to which he must be subjected by it; and if he is a dishonest man I do not want him to have the power. There is a good reason either way why you should not give him the power. But you cannot frame a system that will apply equally to all. Take, for instance, a State like California, in one of the districts of which we were assured, and I have no doubt of it, the collector not only spent all his pay, but was out of pocket.

Mr. CONNESS. Out of pocket $3,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That resulted from the very great extent of the district, and from the very small amount that could be collected. We cannot say that we will not attempt in any district of this country to collect revenue, although the amount there may be very small, because we must apply an equal rule to the whole country. We must therefore appoint an officer and let him see what he can do. As we are only giving a salary of $1,500—and in such a country as that such a salary might be entirely insufficient from the very great extent of the district—we must leave some discretion. The salary is only now allowed under this bill; it was not allowed under the former one. That amount may be utterly inadequate, and you may not be able to find a man who can be trusted that is willing to take it. This difficulty is not confined to California alone. You cannot fix the ratio here in any possible way that will cover the infinite diversity of cases. In some districts of very small territorial extent you collect a very large amount of revenue, while in other districts of immense territorial extent you collect a very small amount of revenue. In both cases the ratio fixed as the maximum may not be sufficient, because the expenses connected with the office may be more. Therefore the only way we can reach it is to say that in such cases the Secretary of the Treasury shall have power to do what is just and right. Under that provision here-before applications have been made to the Secretary of the Treasury, and have not been answered; he will not touch them; and the result has been resignations in some cases. Men say that they cannot afford to work a year round and pay money out of their own pocket for the Government, as they have been obliged to do.

If the Senator thinks this is all wrong, let him tell us what is right; let him show how we are to meet these difficulties. It is very easy to pull down; it is another thing to build up. When a legislator here gets up and proposes to strike out a provision without knowing the reason why it was put in, or inquiring why it was put in, I think it is his duty to say what shall take its place to meet the difficulty. He should know in the first place what it was intended to meet, and then propose a mode by which it may be met. He cannot do the Committee on Finance the discredit to suppose that all the objections which addressed themselves to his mind did not address themselves to the mind of every member of the committee; and yet we retained this provision, and he ought to have taken it for granted that we had a reason for it. I have stated the reason. Now if the Senate choose to say that it shall not be there, and they take the consequences of striking it out without providing anything else, be it so. It is the only thing we could hit upon. We have done our duty in relation to it, and there is no further responsibility upon us.

Mr. CONNESS. I was a little offended at the Finance Committee, I confess, because they would not agree to insert "shall" in place of "may" in this identical provision allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the compensation of assessors and collectors in the State of California. Why should I feel so? Simply because for two years past gentlemen have engaged in the business in my State earnestly, honestly, faithfully, and have absolutely in a majority of the districts paid money out of their own pockets; and with all the appeals that could be made to the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, to this hour he has never made a dollar of allowance to those officers. One man holding the office of collector in the third district for one year goes out of the office minus $3,000 of money. There is no allowance made to us by reason of the disparity between the money paid by the Government and the money in circulation in our State; and I will here say that gold and silver are in circulation in the western Territories on the other side of the mountains as in California.

Mr. JOHNSON. How are the taxes paid in California?

Mr. CONNESS. All in coin. There is no such thing as a legal-tender note or paper money in circulation there. It is merchandise sold in the market, and every officer, civil or military, who receives it sells it at forty per cent. discount, and now the discount is more than that, of course, because of the recent advance in the price of gold. The cry comes up from that State, from every officer, both military and civil, for an allowance in lieu of this. My table at my lodgings is burdened by applications of this character, by petitions coming from the common soldiers and from officers, for we have guarding and holding posts in the western Territories and in California, and reaching forward to New Mexico and the borders of Texas some seven thousand of our soldiers receiving this money from the Government and trying to pay their expenses with it. I will state here that I have not presented these applications to the Congress of the United States, because from every part of the country here applications come up for an increase of salary in every conceivable shape, based upon the immense advance and enhancement in the price of everything that is consumed; and I knew that if I presented such applications from my people it would but open the way for a pressure that Congress could not afford to respond to, and I took the responsibility of saying to all those persons, "These are times of war, they are times of difficulty to the whole people; you must for a while bear your portion of the burden." But when you undertake to take away the compensation that the revenue officer receives, the man who assesses and the man who collects, you strike at the very basis and foundation of your revenue. It is better of the two, and more profitable and will pay better, to extend even some extra compensation to the men engaged in assessing and collecting the revenue than to stint and starve them.

This is our experience, Mr. President, in the State from which I come. We tried for many years to reduce the enormous expense of collecting the revenue in that State. In some of our attempts, we cut down those expenses too low, and the result was immediately a falling off of revenue. Now, after fifteen years of experience, the lowest compensation that we pay in any of our counties is from five to seven dollars per diem in gold and silver to our local assessors and deputy collectors for collecting our State revenue. The deputy collectors who collect the internal revenue of the United States under this act receive, I think, four dollars in legal-tender notes. What must the result necessarily be? Inefficiency in collection.

I ask the Senator from Massachusetts not to pursue a penny-wise and a pound-foolish policy in regard to this matter. I hear testimony in addition to every word that was spoken by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance; and in regard to that gentleman I will state here that notwithstanding the dissatisfaction that I hinted at, which was, I am willing to say, perhaps my own fault, the fault of my own temper, no man in the Senate could be chosen who has given the amount of labor, the amount of exact consideration that he has given to every part and portion of this bill. It is my duty to say this. I know it. Everything has been weighed and poised by him by an exact and even-handed justice, his desire being to so construct the law that we should get the greatest amount of revenue with the smallest possible expenditure and burden to the people.

I hope, sir, that this amendment will not prevail, but that the discretion allowed in the section proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Massachusetts, so rarely exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury, will be permitted to remain. I intend prior to leaving the city, which will occur very soon, to sit down after the pressure of Congress is taken away from the Secretary, and to show him exact facts and figures, and to beg him to make such allowance as will enable the people of California to pay their proper portion of the taxes into the national Treasury. I have intended to put it off until that time shall occur.

Mr. WILSON. I hope, sir, that the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not suppose, and that no other member of the committee will suppose, that because we propose amendments to the bill, or make suggestions or give our opinions, we are reflecting upon the members of the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all. I am glad to hear any suggestion.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly no one appreciates the members of that committee and the chairman of the committee more than myself for their ability, industry, and fidelity. I understand that we can easily provide a way in this bill to meet all the cases suggested by the Senator from California. The bill provides in regard to assessors and other officers in the rebel States and on the Pacific coast that the Secretary of the Treasury may increase their compensation to such an extent that the gross amount shall not exceed that paid to other officers in those sections.

Mr. CONNESS. It never has been done.

Mr. WILSON. I should say that it ought to be done on the Pacific coast and in the rebel States where there are great difficulties in going over those States on account of travel and other expenses; but in the other parts of the country, east of the mountains, and in the loyal States, I do not see any necessity for this. By inserting the word "collector" in the proviso to the twenty-second section of the bill, collectors will be placed on the same footing with assessors in the rebel States and on the Pacific coast. Everybody knows that the assessors ought to be paid as high as the collectors. I think the assessor is by far the most important officer. It requires more capacity to assess the property of a district than it does to collect the revenue. The twenty-fourth section provides that the collector shall have $1,500 per annum salary, and, in addition, a commission of three per cent. upon the first $100,000 collected, and a commission of one half per cent. on all sums above $100,000 and not exceeding $400,000. Under the provision of that section a collector of a district that pays $100,000 will get a salary of $1,500 and then three per cent. on $100,000. That is a very large salary—enough for him, in my judgment. The bill, however, provides that no collector shall receive over $5,000 exclusive of his expenses, and allows him to go up to $10,000 including expenses. With that increase provided for by the bill, there can be but very few districts which will need any action of the Secretary; and it appears that where they have needed it they have not got it. I can say that if they have not got it, it has not been for the reason that they have not tried to get it, and many men have tried to get it who ought not to have it. I give it as my judgment that so long as this discretion is confided to the Secretary of the Treasury, you will have the collectors from all parts of the country striving to get their compensation increased, running up the expenses in their collection districts unnecessarily; and many of them have done it.

Take the districts and examine them. Look at the expenses for clerk hire and stationery. Some districts that raise more money than others have not expended over one third as much for clerk hire, stationery, and other expenses. I invite Senators to examine the details and comparisons of these districts. They will find that in eastern Pennsylvania and eastern New York, where the men employed live in or about cities and know how to make up accounts, it costs about three or four times as much for clerk hire as it does in other parts of the country. Senators may take two districts, one of which raises $600,000 and the other $250,000, and the cost of clerk hire and stationery is two or three times as large in the district that raises the smaller amount as in the other. Take the Hartford district in Connecticut, and then take some of the districts in the eastern part of New York where we have men that know how to make up accounts, and we shall see that in several of those districts there have been great extravagance or corrupt practices—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator need not make a speech on that subject, for as I have already told him we intend to make amendments preventing all that, and it has nothing to do with this question.

Mr. WILSON. I want to show that if the discretion is left to the Secretary of the Treasury he will be deceived by interested representations. I think we ought not to allow the discretion, and therefore I have moved the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I propose to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That no account for the compensation for services of any clerk or other person employed in any duties in relation to the collection of revenue under this act shall be allowed until such clerk or other person shall have certified on oath or affirmation that the same services have been performed, that he has received the full sum therein charged to his own use and benefit, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, nor contracted to pay, deposit, or assign any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, nor in any way, directly or indirectly, paid or given, nor contracted to pay or give, any reward or compensation for his office or employment, or the emoluments thereof.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will say to the Senator that a member of the committee, the Senator from Wisconsin, has an amendment prepared to cover that whole ground.

Mr. WILSON. Very well. I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. WILSON. In section ninety-three, line two hundred and ninety-two, after the word "thickness" I move to insert "five dollars per ton," and after the word "spikes," in the same line, to insert "one half cent per pound;" so that it will read:

On band, hoop, and sheet iron, thinner than No. 16 wire gauge, plate iron less than one eighth of an inch in thickness, five dollars per ton; and cut nails and spikes, one half cent per pound.

I move also to strike out all after the word "spikes" in line two hundred and ninety-two to line three hundred and five, inclusive, and to strike out lines three hundred and six and three hundred and seven.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

Not including nails, tacks, brads, or finishing nails, usually put up and sold in papers, whether in papers or otherwise, nor horse-shoe nails wrought by machinery, a duty of five dollars per ton: Provided, That bars, rods, bands, hoops, sheets, plates, nails, and spikes, not including such as are usually put up in papers, nor horse shoe nails wrought by machinery, as before mentioned, manufactured from iron upon which the duty of three dollars has been levied and paid, shall be subject only to a duty of two dollars per ton in addition thereto, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

On iron castings used for bridges or other permanent structures, a duty of three dollars per ton.

Mr. WILSON. I propose a tax of five dollars per ton on this iron, and on nails and spikes half a cent a pound. It will be an increase of the amount now put upon nails. I understand that they can bear it. It will be entirely satisfactory, and I am told by gentlemen who understand this subject thoroughly that we can increase our revenue by so doing; and by striking out the other words from lines two hundred and ninety-two to three hundred and five, the duty on those items will be increased, for they will come under another head.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say that the gentleman to whom the Senator refers, who knows all about it, came to the committee and suggested a series of amendments. The committee considered them very deliberately and very carefully, and also consulted with other persons, who perhaps knew as much as he did in relation to it, and looked at the whole subject with care, and they came to the conclusion to make some of his amendments and not to make others. I hardly think it would be wise, merely on the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that he has this from a gentleman who knows all about it, to overrule a great many gentlemen who profess to know something about it. I think it had better be left as it is.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that that gentleman is not alone in regard to it, but several other gentlemen who have been in the city have assented to the fact that the interest can bear the tax if it be increased from five dollars to ten dollars a ton on nails.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have made one or two amendments that he suggested and we have had a tremendous outcry on that very point. I am rather inclined to think we did wrong, but on the whole we thought we would leave it as it was fixed after consultation between the two committees. I think it had better be left as it is, unless the Senator can demonstrate from his own knowledge that the tax he proposes can be readily borne.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot from my own knowledge. But on the suggestion of Senators I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I have an amendment to propose as an addition to section one hundred and seventy-three:

And provided further, That no direct tax whatever shall be assessed or collected under this or any act of Congress heretofore passed, until Congress shall enact another law requiring such assessment and collection to be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That matter was a subject of consideration between the two Houses at the last session, and they finally fixed on the law as it stands now, and I hope it will not be interfered with. We put off the direct tax until 1865, to see if we could get along without one, so that we have another year to consider it. If it is found that we can get along without one, we can then act upon it; but it is hardly worth while, I think, to act in advance, for we really do not know now but that we shall be obliged to enforce the collection of a direct tax after next year. At any rate, as there is time before us, as the time originally fixed after much discussion has not been changed, and the amendment will lead to a great deal of discussion, I hope the Senator will not insist on it now. His great anxiety to rid all the lands of the West from any possibility of a direct tax, as well as of other sections of the country, at any rate can wait until it is found out whether we can get along without it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have some anxiety too in regard to the lands of the eastern section of the country as well as the western.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have not any.

Mr. GRIMES. Perhaps the Senator has not, as he lives in a city; but I have seen gentlemen who entertain very much the same opinions on this subject that I do, from his own State. The argument urged against the adoption of this amendment is that having the statute now on our statute-book, we can repeal it next winter if we choose. If we decide between now and the first Monday of next December that it is necessary there should be a direct tax imposed, will it not be equally easy for us then to enact a law to that effect? The next session is a short session; it is to last only three months; and if there should be any disagreement between the two Houses, if any fatality should happen to befall a very few members of the Senate who are in favor of the repeal of this section, the matter will be left entirely in the hands of those who may happen to be in favor of the imposition of a direct tax and who would therefore be able to prevent the repeal of the law which imposes it. I think the safest way in every point of view is to strike off the law that imposes the direct tax, and whenever the necessity arises for its reimposition to reenact it. What is the use in keeping that law upon your statute-book? It is agreed on all hands that it shall not be enforced now. If it is not to be enforced, why not just as well repeal it as to keep it in a state of suspension?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The answer to that is that the Senator has furnished an argument against himself. It is very much easier to repeal a law, for that is done in a few words, than to enact one; and if next session be a short one, and we shall be pressed for time, the shorter the work to be done the easier it is to do it. The Senator asks the question, if he should happen to die in the mean time what will become of the matter?

Mr. GRIMES. Oh, no.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the amount of it. I think somebody else may live, and that the State of Iowa will not be left without Senators. The same fatality which may strike a Senator from the Northwest may strike a Senator from the Northeast.

The fact is that this is merely anticipation. The law is of importance in one particular at least; and that is in reference to its bearing on the act which was introduced by my friend, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE], under which it may have an effect, a very valuable and beneficial effect, in getting something from the Confederate States by way of direct taxation if it be left to stand. Although it may not operate during the next year, it may be found very advisable to continue it.

I do not want to get up a discussion now between the two Houses on this question. An attempt was made in the other House to repeal the law. It failed. An effort was made in the other House also to continue it, that is, to put it into immediate operation, and that failed. The result was a conclusion that it had better be left to stand as it is, and if we find at the next session of Congress that we can get along without it, it is very easy in five lines to repeal it then. I deprecate at this late period of the session the introduction of a question of this kind, which is unnecessary at the present time, into this bill, and I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I am very much gratified that I furnished my friend with an argument; it is the only one he has urged against the adoption of the proposition I have submitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am frequently indebted to my friend from Iowa in that respect.

Mr. GRIMES. Is it not just as easy for us to pass a law to reenact the law that is now upon our statute-book next winter as it is to pass a short law repealing that statute? We can take the statute as it now stands bodily and reenact it. Is it compelled to go through any more legislative stages than an act to repeal it would be compelled to go through? Where, therefore, is the force of that argument?

Mr. President, I protest against this effort always whenever a proposition is submitted by myself, or by somebody from my section of the country, to say that here is an issue attempted to be raised between the Northwest and the Northeast. I have not offered the amendment in any such spirit. I can tell the Senator that I have seen representatives from his region of country who have exercised as much influence in regard to this question in the House of Representatives during the present session of Congress as any man in it on the same side entertaining the same opinions I do on this subject. They did ask for its repeal and were content with its suspension. I go one step further and ask for its repeal, and I do not intend to be content until I get an opportunity to record my vote in favor of its absolute repeal; and then when we come here at the next session of Congress, if the chairman of the Committee on Finance can satisfy me that the public interest requires that there shall be another direct tax imposed, no man will vote for it more freely than I will. But I cannot see any force in any argument that has been urged here or elsewhere for allowing a dead statute to repose upon our law-books. I am in favor of getting rid of it; let the dead be buried; and then if you want to revive it hereafter, pass a law to do so. It will take no more time to do it than it will to repeal it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend is not afraid of anything that is dead. It is asleep, and it may wake. This troubles him, and he wants to kill it, and kill it effectually. If he would acknowledge what is really in his mind about it, he would admit that to be his object. If it was dead he would not say anything about it; but it is because it is not dead that he is concerned. So far as I am individually concerned, there is no law that could possibly be passed with reference to taxation that would affect me personally so severely as a direct tax upon real estate. I happen to be so situated that so far as the pressure of taxation is concerned on myself, the worst tax that could possibly be passed would be one precisely of that description. Notwithstanding that, I do see in the present state of the country and in the future state of the country, that it may possibly be right and proper to impose a direct tax. I voted for the direct tax in the first instance; I voted against its suspension; I believed the money ought to be collected, and events have proved that we needed the money, and it should have been collected; but nevertheless a majority has been against me, and I submit. Still I believe that it may be that this statute should revive, and it may be that we shall have to increase it. If the necessity comes, let us do it; at any rate I do not see the necessity of raising the question now at this time, because at present it is sleeping, and it hurts nobody.

Mr. DAVIS. I am decidedly in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Iowa; and I am opposed to the principle of direct taxes altogether, for the reason that they bear exclusively on the land property of the States. There is a suspended law for direct taxes that is expressly retained by the provision of the act now under consideration. That direct taxation now, I suppose, rests in the main upon land. When it was enacted before it based upon land and slaves; but the mischievous legislation of Congress in relation to slaves has virtually abolished that subject from the operation of the law, and has left as its only subject the landed estate of the country. The direct tax which the law assessed upon the State of Kentucky was somewhere in the neighborhood of $700,000. Suppose the revenue system of our State required us to collect $700,000, and there was a proposition made in the Legislature and a law about to be passed to raise that $700,000 exclusively from landed estate, and to exempt all other property from the burden or any portion of it, would our people submit to such a system of taxation? Would the people of any State submit to such a system of finance as that? Take, for instance, the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Indiana, the State of Illinois: they are to raise, say $5,000,000, or any amount of money for the purpose of State expenditure, and a proposition is made in the Legislature of those States to raise the amount exclusively off the landed property, would their people allow it?

Look and see how this measure will operate sectionally. In Massachusetts, and in the eastern States generally, there is a large aggregation of capital that does not exist in the form of real estate; it exists in stocks; bank stocks, manufacturing stocks, canal stocks, and railroad stocks, and in other forms. What is to be the effect of this proposition that the direct tax shall slide silently into operation next year without any additional legislation and without the attention of the people being brought to the fact that there is now proposed a reenactment for the purpose of continuing that law? The effect will be that all the property in the United States including the eastern States, except landed property, will be exempt from being taxed or burdened to raise the amount that is proposed to be raised by direct taxation. In Illinois and in Indiana the real estate amounts to something like three fifths or more of the aggregate property of those States. In some of the eastern States it does not amount to more than about one half; probably in some of them not half. Sectionally the operation of this law would be to impose upon three fifths of the aggregate property of the northwestern States the whole burden of raising the amount that is to be raised in those States by the direct tax; and in the eastern States, where there is a large aggregation of personal estate in the form of capital, and where it exists in other forms, the effect would be to impose at most only upon about half their estate the burden of raising the sum of money that is proposed to be collected from them under this system of direct taxation.

A great many years ago the taxes in my State were collected off lands, negroes, and horses. When a young man I was a member of the Legislature of that State, and I proposed that the entire aggregate of property should be the basis of taxation, and that there should be an ad valorem tax on all a man's estate, whether it was real, mixed, or personal, and that he should pay in proportion to the value of his estate upon the ad valorem principle. It was an innovation. It took it a year or two to get the assent of the Legislature to its adoption, but it was assented to, and now the system and burden of taxation in that State has been uniform and equal upon all property, with some exceptions of a small amount in favor of every person. The great and equal principle of taxation is that the whole of a man's property and estate, be it real, personal, or mixed, shall be equally subject to the support of Government, and that no classification of property shall take place by which upon any class there is to be a distinct and separate assessment and collection of taxes. Upon that general principle the tax is more equal, it is more impartial and just. Personal estate is more able to pay taxes than real estate in many instances. The landed property in the Northwest is divided into small farms, and the produce of the entire farm is often necessary to support the family. The owner of the farm has no surplus wealth vested in bank stock and in manufacturing stocks and internal improvement stocks. These stocks yield a certain revenue, and often a considerable revenue. We have seen through all the sources of information that these stocks in the northeastern States have been and are now eminently profitable. All these stocks are exempt from the operation of the direct tax law. They in truth have more capacity to pay than real estate has, because they yield a much greater amount of annual profit. The proceeds of personal estate in those farms are much more productive in annual fruits than are the proceeds of the small farms in the northwestern States. The effect of this law then is to charge upon the large portion of the property collectively and individually of the northwestern States that is not very productive annually the whole of the direct estate tax, and to exempt something like an equal portion of the estate of the northeastern States collectively, and of the people there individually, that are eminently productive in their annual fruits, entirely from the taxation.

It seems to me that if the people of the United States are now about to have reimposed upon them, as provided for in a distinct provision of the act under consideration, from the next year the direct tax law which will thus unequally tax them and their property to the partial exemption of the older States where there is large accumulated wealth in the form of stocks that yield annually large profits, they ought to be fully and distinctly advertised that such a principle of legislation is now about to be adopted. Sir, I am against it. The slaves of my State when this direct tax was assessed were of large value, and yielded a large proportion of the tax; that is, a large proportion of it was assessed upon them; but now, under the demoralizing and unjust and iniquitous system of legislation of Congress those slaves are of no value. The entire direct tax, then, will be assessed upon the landholders of that State; and even in Kentucky there are large masses of personal property accumulated in a few hands that would be entirely exempt from the burden of taxation so far as is involved in the sum that is to be raised by direct taxation.

The great mass of landed estates in America are of small amount and value as to acres and productiveness. They are scattered among and belong to the general mass of the population. In the northwestern States particularly this system of direct taxation will have the effect to impose upon and to oppress a vast number of small landholders whose means and whose profits from their lands give them no surplus, or a very stunted surplus, with which to meet this taxation.

Sir, I come back to the principle with which I started, that the taxes upon property ought to be equal as far as practicable; and to adopt any practicable rule at all you must assess taxes not upon land alone but upon every description of property real and personal, and consequently the owners of personal estate that amounts to such a large proportion of the aggregate wealth of the United States ought not to be wholly exempt from the direct tax and the entire burden of it devolved on the real estate of the country, but equally subject to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I omitted to say one word that I intended to say, and it is this: if this matter slides over silently now until the next session and this tax shall be disagreeable and burdensome and odious to the people they may whistle to have it repealed. Why? Because there intervenes the veto power, and it would require two thirds of both Houses to remove this burden from their shoulders. If the burden is to be removed from the people now or in the future, now is the time to leave it off. The next session will not avail. If the tax, in the language of the Senator from Iowa, shall be indispensably necessary to enable the Government to continue its operations of any character, the patriotism of the people no doubt will come up and reenact it; but the people may be trusted with that matter. There is a congressional election for the whole United States to intervene between now and the time when this proposition could be reenacted in all probability. Let the people now have the matter within their own power subject to their own will and their own judgment. Repeal it now, suspend it at least until further legislation shall take place to give it vitality and action, and then, if it becomes indispensably necessary to enable the Government to progress with its operations, the people may be safely trusted to reenact it.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa if his amendment will affect the cases that have already been entered upon. We have already made one assessment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this amendment should be adopted the law will stand repealed; there will be nothing further to be done under it then.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg the Senator's pardon. It will not stand repealed so far as relates to what has heretofore taken place. The amendment reads:

That no future direct tax whatever shall be assessed or collected under this or any act of Congress heretofore passed until Congress shall enact another law requiring such assessment and collection to be made.

It does not repeal the law so far as it relates to any arrearages that may be due from any State under the law as it now stands. If there shall be any State that has not paid up its proportion or any State that has not paid up any of the tax that was assessed under the laws, it does not repeal it as to that, but declares that there shall be no future direct tax assessed under any law until there shall be some permanent action of Congress on the subject. I will read the language again:

And provided further, That no future direct tax whatever shall be assessed or collected under this or any act of Congress heretofore passed until Congress shall enact another law requiring such assessment and collection to be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What does the Senator call a tax upon watches under this act but a direct tax?

Mr. GRIMES. Does the chairman of the Committee on Finance call that a direct tax under the Constitution?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly I do.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am not sure that I understand the amendment. I was not present when it was offered. What is called the direct tax—we differ as to the meaning of that term—is now suspended until 1865; that is to say, no such tax can be imposed or collected until 1865. During the present year, therefore, the tax cannot be collected. I understand the amendment to repeal at once the authority to levy a direct tax. I understand there is some difference of opinion as to whether it applies to that tax which may be considered as in arrear, if any can be considered as in arrear, so as to prevent our collecting it in the future; but there can be no difference of opinion as to this: that the law under which the tax is to be levied, if this amendment passes, is repealed and cannot be enforced again, unless Congress impose it again.

It seems to me that at this time it would be very impolitic to say that Congress would tie up its hands in any way; that either branch of Congress would tie up its hands in any way against the imposition of this tax. We do not want it now, or at least it has been supposed that we do not want it now, and that we may not want it until 1865; but the amendment of my friend from Iowa suggests that we are not to want it at all unless each branch of Congress shall assent to it. Now look at the probability of each branch of Congress assenting to it. The taxes that you propose to pass, considered as indirect taxes, as contradistinguished from direct taxes, will be collected principally from the States that will be least affected by the direct tax; and if it should turn out that those taxes are adequate to meet the exigencies at once of the Government, then you will have no direct tax, and the whole burden of the support of the Government will be thrown upon the indirect taxation. Taking that view of it I shall vote against the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senator says there is some contrariety of opinion among gentlemen here as to what may be the effect of this proposition. I do not understand that there is any. I have not heard that there was any. I suppose that there is but one kind of direct tax known to the Constitution and laws of the United States. It was in pursuance of the provision of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to levy such a tax that three years ago, in 1861, we passed an act imposing a tax of $20,000,000 upon the people of this country. At a subsequent session of Congress that was suspended. Nobody professes that there is any desire on the part of anybody that that law shall be enforced. It was not imposed by this Congress, but by another. It was not imposed by a Congress that had the same kind of representation that this Congress has. We had another apportionment entirely of the people, and they were represented under different circumstances in Congress than they are now. All I propose is this: that that law which you do not pretend that you want to enforce, under which you do not propose to collect any tax for twelve months, shall stand repealed, and that you shall rely upon the voluntary action of this Congress at the next session to supply you with direct taxation if you desire it.

The amendment is not open to the criticism which is attempted to be raised against it, that it may prevent the collection of taxes that were assessed under the law which it is alleged I propose to repeal. I do not propose to repeal it, even. The amendment declares:

That no future direct tax whatever shall be assessed or collected under this or any act of Congress heretofore passed until Congress shall enact another law requiring such assessment or collection to be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I look at it in another point of view; and that is, as a declaration, substantially, that this Congress do not mean under any circumstances to have a direct tax, and as such it would affect our credit very materially. At present the declaration is not necessary; the thing is inoperative; and we need not make it and affect the credit of the country until the time comes, to say the least of it, in my judgment.

Mr. WILSON. I am afraid that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be understood in the country as a declaration that no effort will be made to collect the tax already ordered to be collected. Two or three years ago we assessed, I think, $20,000,000 of a direct tax. In some of the States that assessment has not been paid. I am in favor of making that assessment and collecting those taxes, and I do not wish so to act as shall interfere with that purpose. I desire to see these large rebel estates assessed, taxed, and sold by the Government for taxation and settled by our soldiers and our toiling people. I understand that Forrest and Beauregard, and the runaway Governor Harris, of Tennessee, have all paid their taxes within a very few weeks in order to save their lands. I do know that some traitors have, under the amnesty proclamation which has been so injurious to the loyal men of the country, paid their taxes to save their estates. I am in favor of imposing these taxes in the rebel States and collecting them, and using them not only for the purpose of putting money into the Treasury, but also of breaking down the great landed estates of these slaveholding traitors.

Otherwise, I wish to say this: that I have not the slightest doubt that we shall not have any more direct taxes assessed. We see opposition enough here now to prevent it. Senators say such a tax is unequal. It is unequal; and we shall have a stern opposition to it that will prevent it. I should not like to see the direct tax law stand on the statute-book, except for the reason that it seems to me if we repeal it the Administration will take it as a declaration on the part of Congress that they must not undertake to collect these taxes in the rebel States that have already been ordered. If those taxes were collected I would vote to repeal the direct tax law, because I have not the slightest idea that we shall have any more taxes assessed on lands. I think it would be wiser to let those lands be taxed by the States to pay their own State expenses, and the expenses of their local communities, and to raise the revenue of the nation in some other form. I fear, however, if this amendment passes in its present form it will be deemed and taken by the Administration as an intimation not to undertake to collect the taxes in the rebel States that have already been ordered to be assessed. If Senators are sure the amendment is not liable to this construction I shall vote for it.

Mr. GRIMES. All I have to say in answer to that is that if the Administration is not familiar with the ordinary rules of grammar and the construction of language they are as liable to a misconstruction of any other law as they are in regard to this. I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts entertains the opinion that any such construction can be given to it as he says or thinks the Administration may give to it.

Mr. POMEROY. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if the Administration construe the law as it now is to mean a suspension of this direct tax in the seceded States, a law to suspend the direct tax would be as bad as a law to repeal it. I am certainly for repealing this statute and getting it out of the way. If the argument of the Senator is worth anything it proves too much.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Harris, Hicks, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Foot, Harding, Howard, McDougall, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. On page 141, section ninety-three, line three hundred and seventy-two, I move to strike out the words "when sold or removed for sale." The clause now reads:

On oil-dressed leather and deer skins, dressed or smoked, when sold or removed for sale, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that that amendment is not now in order, the clause having been agreed to in that form.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be in order in the Senate.

Mr. TEN EYCK. If it is not in order I will let it go by for the present, and propose another amendment. On page 144, section ninety-three, I move to strike out the proviso commencing in line four hundred and forty-one, in the following words:

Provided, That when diamonds, emeralds, precious stones or imitations thereof, imported from foreign countries, or upon which import duties have been paid, shall be set or reset in gold or any other material, the duty shall be assessed and paid upon the value only of the settings.

The object of this amendment is to prevent an unjust discrimination in favor of articles of useless character which may be regarded as luxuries over articles of prime necessity and in every-day use. The whole clause reads as follows:

On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent.

ad valorem: Provided, That when diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, or imitations thereof, imported from foreign countries, or upon which import duties have been paid, shall be set or reset in gold or any other material, the duty shall be assessed and paid upon the value only of the settings.

If I understand the effect of the proviso, if it should be adopted, it will be this: a diamond worth $1,000, if it has been set before and is now reset in a setting that costs five dollars, is to be entirely free from this duty of ten per cent. ad valorem. I do not understand the reason of the discrimination in favor of an article of this kind over articles which I see upon the opposite page, such as "hats, caps, bonnets, or other articles of dress for the wear of men, women, or children, five per cent. ad valorem." The very articles that go to make hats, caps, bonnets, and other articles of wear for men, women, or children, are taxed in the raw state, and are also taxed by this bill when they are manufactured.

If this proviso stands, I think it will enable persons engaged in this business of selling and disposing of diamonds and precious stones to cheat the Government out of a duty that they ought to be subject to; and in the next place, as I stated before, it will make an odious, unjust, and improper discrimination in favor of a luxury against an article of prime necessity and every-day use. I received a letter from a gentleman engaged in the jewelry business, in which he expressed the surprise of himself and a large number of persons engaged in that very business that Congress should propose to do a thing of this description.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the gentleman to whom the Senator refers really did not consider the effect of the provision. The Senator will see that the clause preceding the proviso puts a duty of ten per cent. on all diamonds and precious stones. Suppose, for instance, the Senator himself owns a diamond worth $500; he has to pay a duty upon that of ten per cent.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Oh! no; not under this clause.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not? This is not an import duty. It is a duty "on all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof," unless it is intended to apply to those that are in the hands of manufacturers to be sold. Now, then, take it either way: we either impose a tax upon these things in the hands of individuals or we do not. If we do not tax a person for a diamond so long as he keeps it in its present condition, and he chooses to carry it to a jeweler and have it reset, why should we do it because he wants to have it reset?

Mr. TEN EYCK. I understand the effect of this clause, and so does my correspondent, to be, that if it can be made to appear that the precious stones which are subject to this duty of ten per cent. have been set before they are only subject to a tax upon the value of the setting alone and not upon the precious stones. That is the way that I understand it. Therefore, if it can be made to appear that the diamond had once been set before and had once been used as an article of attire or been manufactured for sale, it should not be liable for any duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, but only the setting, which might be of the value of two dollars, should be liable to it. Why, sir, this would be an inducement to the men who deal in these precious stones to make it appear to the Government officials that the precious stones had been set before when they never had, and would throw open the door to fraud and imposition upon the Treasury. That is the light in which I view it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does not the Senator see the meaning of this clause? When they are imported from foreign countries they pay a duty upon their value. Then, if the person who has paid this duty on their value carries them to a jeweler's to have them reset, the proposition of the Senator is to make him pay the duty over again on the whole value of the diamonds instead of upon the setting.

Mr. TEN EYCK. That is not my understanding of the direct operation of this clause. A diamond may have been imported fifty years ago, and, I take it, under this tax bill, that precious stone ought to be subject to the duty of ten per cent. ad valorem in order to raise revenue. That is the object. We want to keep the wheels of Government moving.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator could not have heard me when I was up before. I repeat, it either does or does not come under the preceding clause:

On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem.

That must be paid according to the language of the act. If I, for instance, have paid that duty on a diamond, and then carry it to a jeweler and have it set over again at an expense of ten dollars, I have got to pay the whole duty over again, according to the Senator's proposition.

Mr. TEN EYCK. If that is its effect I shall insist upon the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not see any other effect; that is, if it is subject to that clause. If it is not subject to that clause, then it is only saying, "As long as you keep your diamond at home you need not pay anything; but if you have it reset you shall pay ten per cent. on the value of the diamond." Of course nobody would have them reset under those circumstances.

Mr. TEN EYCK. What does the duty in this clause refer to? A duty on importation?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will read it again:
On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. TEN EYCK. That means a duty under this internal revenue law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course.

Mr. TEN EYCK. Then where is the propriety of subjecting these precious stones to a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem upon the article, when, if it is made to appear that it has once been set before, it is not subject to a duty of ten per cent. at all, but only a duty levied upon the resetting, which may be of the value of five dollars when the diamond is worth $1,000. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I read it a duty of ten per cent. is to be collected upon all these stones in the hands of whoever may have them. Now, then, that duty being paid, if you choose to put them into another shape at an expense of ten dollars, you must pay the whole duty over again, according to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not see any such difficulty as the Senator from New Jersey supposes. All diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, &c., in the condition in which they shall be, have to pay a duty of ten per cent.; that is, without any reference to any import duty that they may have paid. All diamonds now in the country upon which duties may have been paid upon the importation are, in the hands of the holders of such diamonds, to be subjected to a further duty of ten per cent. ad valorem. But it may happen that the diamonds, emeralds, &c., which are now in the country, and on which is to be assessed a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, may have an additional value imparted to them by being reset; and the provision in the proviso is that where they are reset the duty shall be paid only upon the value of the setting. But for a provision of that description, if you were to state that all diamonds in the country shall first pay a duty of ten per cent., and then that all such diamonds when they shall be reset shall be subject to a duty ad valorem upon their then value, including the value of the diamond and the value of the resetting you would impose a double duty upon the diamond.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland what construction he puts upon the words "imported from foreign countries or upon which import duties have been paid" in that very proviso. If his construction of it be correct, it seems to me those words are very useless there.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was looking to the first part of the clause independent of the proviso. The first part of it is in these words:

On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem.

Then it provides:

Provided, That when diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, imported from foreign countries, or upon which import duties have been paid, shall be reset in gold or any other material, the duty shall be assessed and paid upon the value only of the settings.

The meaning of that is, that if it has paid the import duties, that of itself is sufficient.

Mr. HARRIS. That is, equivalent to this internal revenue duty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes, sir.
Mr. HARRIS. That is the construction of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it is to be subjected only to a duty, if it is reset, on the value of the resetting.

Mr. HARRIS. If they have paid the foreign duty, it exempts them from taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Striking out the words "or upon which import duties have been paid" will answer the purpose and effect the object.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. It can be made now and the matter can be considered in the committee of conference.

Mr. HARRIS. This clause was not in the old bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to it. I confess I really do not understand what the exact operation of the clause is. It may have the effect that the Senator from New Jersey says, and if so it ought to be amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I have another amendment, to be inserted on page 82, section seventy-three, line twenty-nine, after the word "license," at the end of the amendment that was inserted there by the Committee on Finance. I propose to add a further provision to secure the object of that amendment, for the purpose of making it certain that this section shall not be avoided by those upon whom it is intended to have an effect. I move to insert these words after the word "license":

And in case any peddler shall refuse to produce his or her license when demanded by any officer of internal revenue, said officer may seize the horse, wagon, and contents of pack, bundle, or basket of any person so refusing, and hold the same until the license is produced.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. At the end of section one hundred and nine, relating to banks and banking, I move to insert the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the notes or bills for circulation of all banks, associations, corporations, or individuals issued before this act goes into operation shall not be liable to pay any duty whatever.

I will say a word or two in explanation of this amendment. The banks in Kentucky, with an aggregate capital of some twelve or fourteen million dollars, have a very small circulation of their own paper and a large deposit of gold and silver. They have been very anxious for the last two years, ever since the legal-tender notes began to circulate pretty freely, to withdraw all their circulation. The Northern Bank of Kentucky, for instance, has a capital of $2,250,000. Its circulation amounts to about $900,000 and its specie on hand to about $1,100,000, independent of its assets in the form of paper upon other banks and the notes of the United States. I suppose not $100 of that paper has been put into circulation in the last two years. On the contrary, the officers of that bank have reported to me frequently that they were extremely solicitous to get in their whole circulation and they were offering inducements, not in the way of premium but facilities for banking operations, to get their paper returned upon them.

One effect of the small amount of paper that those banks have in circulation and the large amount of paper that they have to redeem it has been to raise the paper of those banks to a premium of from three to five per cent. upon the greenbacks. The better currency is always hoarded. The inferior currency, the more depreciated currency is always forced into circulation by the holder. That has been the effect in my State. I suppose these banks in the aggregate have four or five million dollars of their paper in circulation. There is not a dollar of it out with their will. On the contrary they have earnestly desired and have been making efforts for the last two years to obtain the return of all their paper upon them, but they have been unable to effect it. It seems to me that that state of fact furnishes an equitable and proper case in which the duty upon the circulation of the banks, on those banks at least, should not be imposed, and I know of no other mode by which to reach it than to exempt them entirely from the duty that is proposed to be imposed upon the circulation of the banks.

Mr. President, I agree with the proposition made by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday, that for the purpose of restricting the circulation of State banks the Congress of the United States have not one jot or tittle of constitutional power. I admit that they may tax a bank circulation, but it ought to be with the sole object and view of getting revenue, and not with the indirect purpose of regulating or forcing a recall of the circulation of State banks. If the Congress of the United States wanted to adopt a salutary rule in relation to this subject, it seems to me it would be somewhat in this form: I maintain that they have no right or power whatever to discriminate between the paper circulation of the State banks and the associations going into operation under the banking law which was recently passed by the Senate; that identically the same rate of taxation or duty should be imposed on the State banks as on the associations under the bank law recently passed by Congress, or which probably is yet in an inchoate state; they ought to adopt a uniform rule of taxation; and they have no power to discriminate in favor of the associations going into operation under the legislation of Congress, and against the State banks, especially with a view to restrict or totally annihilate their circulation.

Congress might discriminate upon principle in relation to these subjects and upon good reason; and that, to my mind, is this character of discrimination: let them tax the circulation of any banks that do not redeem in gold and silver a higher rate than those who do redeem in gold and silver. If they adopted that principle it would operate wholesomely in relation to the circulating medium of the country. To claim for Congress under the clause of the Constitution so often adverted to by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] granting to them the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures," an indirect power to determine or to attempt to regulate what amount of property its gold coin shall purchase, seems to me eminently unsound.

They have the same power over foreign coin in relation to regulating its value as they have over the coin which they may authorize. The words of the Constitution are:

"To coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin."

They have precisely the same power over both subjects, domestic coin emitted under the authority of Congress and foreign coin; and that is an analogous power to what follows in the clause in the few words which I will read: "And fix the standard of weights and measures."

Congress has the right, for the convenience of the country, in the sale of solids and liquids to fix the standard of weights and measures; but that does not authorize Congress in any way to interfere with the market price which any of these various species of solids and liquids may bring in market. Its whole effect is a restriction to the exercise of the power in denominating what shall be a bushel of solid matter or what shall be a gallon of liquid matter, that so many inches or so much of contents by any other measurement shall be the medium by which these solids and liquids shall be sold.

It is so in relation to coin. The whole power of Congress over the subject of coin in regulating its value is merely to determine the denomination by which the various classes of coin shall pass, and nothing more. They authorize and direct so many penny weights or ounces of gold to be coined, and they denominate it an eagle or a double eagle. So of silver; so many penny weights of pure metal and so much of alloy to be coin in silver dollars or half dollars. The whole power of Congress to regulate that subject is simply to determine the pay or the count at which these various classes of coin, gold or silver, shall pass. That Congress under this power "to coin money and to regulate the value thereof" has the indirect power to restrict, to interdict, to impose penalties or fines upon the emission of State bank paper or to prohibit it, is to my mind as illogical a conclusion as ever was drawn. The power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof, in truth, does not give Congress a single iota of power over the circulating paper of State banks. It does not give to Congress an iota of power to regulate the value of coin, except to determine what shall be the count of the various denominations of coin, gold and silver, which it may direct to be coined, and the same power over foreign coin; it may declare by law at what value foreign coin may pass, and that is all the jurisdiction or power that it has over the subject of regulating the currency.

The greatest curse in the world to a country, financially and commercially, is a spurious currency, an unsound currency. The only standard of a sound currency is the precious metals, gold and silver, and the viciousness of a currency is measured by its depreciation below that common standard of the world. I admit that Congress may indirectly operate to bring up a paper currency to the par of gold and silver. The first or second United States Bank, I believe, once performed that office; I have an indistinct recollection of it; but at one time, when there was a general suspension of specie payments by all the banks, it gave notice beforehand to those banks that on a particular day it would resume specie payments, and that forced all the State banks that were solvent to the same step, and those that were not able to resume specie payments went to the wall, as they should have done.

The General Government may perform two important offices in bringing back the country to specie payments. The honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] the other day spoke justly and truly in relation to the necessity of a sound and wholesome circulating medium, and he likened it, properly, to the circulation of the human system. Both circulations must be healthy, neither redundant, to perform their respective offices properly. The General Government is in duty bound, when it can incidentally in the proper exercise of its power, to aid the country and the moneyed institutions of the country to return to specie payments.

There are but two legitimate modes, according to my understanding of the powers of Congress, by which this can be effected or attempted by the Secretary of the Treasury or the Congress or the Government of the United States, and the first is, let the Government itself resume specie payments; let it give notice to all the banks of the United States that on a given day it will resume specie payments. Whenever that notice is given by the Government the banks in Kentucky will be ready to resume specie payments. They are in a condition that will enable them to resume any day after a very short notice, and that is the state of affairs and the business which they would prefer.

If it is so necessary, as I concede it is, for the business of the country, for the operations of its Government, for all of its commerce and all of its industry, that we should have a sound and uniform currency, we can only have a mixed currency upon that inflexible and essential principle of all legitimate banking, that no paper should circulate when it is not redeemable at its counter in coin by the power that emits it. If the Government of the United States would just put itself in position to resume specie payments in six or twelve months or at any time, and give to the banks of all the States timely notice that on such a day it will resume specie payments, my word for it that movement followed up by the corresponding action of the Government would force every bank in the United States that could live at all to resume specie payments on the very same day, and those that could not live ought to go to the wall and cease to be banks and to emit a circulating medium. That is one legitimate mode in which the Government of the United States may operate, and which its duty to the people of the United States and to the commerce and business and industry of the United States requires that it should operate to bring about a general resumption of specie payments, by resuming itself.

There is another legitimate mode in which the Congress and the Government of the United States might operate properly and safely and within the pale of its powers to effect this great desideratum of the resumption of specie payments; and that is, to repeal the law making greenbacks a legal tender. Whenever that law shall be repealed and banks and individuals are permitted by the authority of the laws of Congress to collect their dues in gold and silver, all banks that are based upon a solid capital will soon place themselves in position to resume specie payments. The unwise and vicious legislation of Congress has made an irredeemable paper a legal tender, in my judgment, against the Constitution. I think that question will yet come up in a form in which the principle will be decided by the courts of the country under the imperious and universal demands of the people of the country and its business and industry, that nothing but gold and silver can be emitted by Congress or the authority of the General Government as a legal tender. I think it was a great mistake, and I think the results have proved that it was a great mistake on the part of the Government to resort, in the first instance, to this irredeemable paper, and to force it upon the country as a legal tender. In my judgment, it would have been much wiser and much more beneficial to the interests of the country and the convenience and economy of the Government if the Government had at once gone into the market and borrowed as individuals borrow, upon its credit; and I believe that the amount of cost and discount to the Government would not have borne any proportion to its loss between the par of greenbacks and the par of gold and silver.

I have merely adverted to these two modes in which the Government can legitimately and efficiently operate to bring the country to specie payments generally. Let it pay specie itself, and when it does so it will be an example of so much force and efficiency that none can withstand it. Let it withdraw by funding or otherwise all of its legal-tender notes; let Congress leave the business of the country alone, and let them restrict the operations of the Government to the legal, constitutional currency, gold and silver. That is the only currency and medium of exchanges of the world.

But, sir, in relation to this immediate amendment, here are banks in Kentucky that have dollar for dollar in gold and silver to redeem all their circulation; some a little less and some a little more. They have been striving ever since this spurious paper assumed the place of a sound, constitutional currency, to get in their paper. They have not been able to effect it. It is not their fault nor default that they have not redeemed this paper. I ask, then, if it is not unjust and oppressive legislation to impose upon these banks a duty upon their paper in circulation under these circumstances. It seems so to me, sir, and therefore I offer the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can scarcely think that the Senator expects or anticipates this amendment to be adopted by the Senate. The Senate have already acted upon this subject very fully. The reduced tax agreed upon by the Senate, I suppose, will not be objected to by any one. If the Senator wishes to compel the retirement of these notes, or wishes to provide a mode by which the banks will have an opportunity to redeem them, I will join with him in such an endeavor; and I will suggest to him a mode by which we can compel the redemption of these notes. He says the banks cannot redeem them because they are not presented for payment. If I had the power I would adopt some such device as has been adopted in the rebel congress, and I would sooner compel their redemption by authorizing the bank to deduct two, three, or four per cent. for every month that those bank bills remain outstanding. In that way you would compel their presentation and redemption, and that is a thing that ought to be accomplished to prevent the inflation of the currency.

The small tax that is now placed upon the circulation of the banks is one that they can very readily pay. They draw full interest on every bank bill that is outstanding. They hold in their vaults the notes of their customers to an amount equal to the amount of their circulation. As a matter of course they did not part with their circulating notes without receiving something for them. They hold the notes of their customers on which they are receiving from six to ten per cent. interest. If, as the Senator says, these notes are not presented for redemption, then they are drawing this interest without any risk, without any danger, without any liability, for nothing. I think instead of paying one per cent. interest to the Government they ought to share the interest they are receiving; that is, pay three per cent. If I had the power, and I only regret that the Senate did not agree with me, I would at least compel a share of the profits of the banks derived from the condition of affairs in which we are now placed.

As the Senate will not agree with me in that, I am surprised that the Senator from Kentucky should object to the tax of one per cent. on their circulation when he can see that they are drawing at least six per cent. on their circulation outstanding. If what he says is true that these notes are never presented to the bank, that they will not be presented, that they are hoarded, that is only the more reason why we should increase the tax and not diminish it. If he desires legislation to compel the holders of the notes to present them for payment I will join with him in providing that legislation, and it will be some such mode as I have suggested, by levying a tax on the holder of the bank bills and requiring the bank to deduct a tax of one or two or three per cent. if it is not presented within three months. Some such device as that would remedy the evil of which the Senator from Kentucky complains, and I would be very glad to see it adopted.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think that the plan proposed by the Senator from Ohio is at all feasible. We certainly have no power to pass any law by which we will compel a bill-holder to present his note, and if he does not to take off a portion of it every month. Certainly such a proposition would not be regarded as in the shape of taxation in any form.

I think that the amendment proposed by my colleague is eminently proper. I know that all the banks of Kentucky have ceased virtually to issue any paper; and most of the banks, I believe all of them, some of them I absolutely know, have been making efforts within the last year or two to retire all their paper. I conversed with the president of one of our banks who was in this city a very few days ago, and he told me that for the last year he had been using every effort to retire all the paper issues of his bank, that he had not issued in that period a single dollar, and that absolutely he had agents at work giving premiums to buy it up, and he had still a million dollars or more of circulation out. I do not think that a bank struggling to get in its issues in that way, should be taxed. The moment they come in they will be retired. The truth is that it is a good bank the issues of which stay out in this way. If you would tax the trashy paper that comes in quicker, you would do the country more service; but those banks who desire to retire all their issues, who try all they can to get in their notes and when they are in do not reissue them, should not be taxed upon their circulation. Tax the issues made hereafter if you choose. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS. I will only add a word to what has been said. If the honorable Senator from Ohio had offered his amendment in the form in which he now suggests it, as a substitute for the section which was offered a few days ago, that there should be a tax of a certain percentage upon all the outstanding circulation of the various State banks in the hands of the holder, and that on the presentation of those notes the bank should be at liberty to withhold from the redemption as much as would meet the tax upon the paper, I should have much less objection to that proposition than to the one which he offered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can assure the Senator that if I supposed Congress would adopt it, I would propose to levy a tax of three per cent. after three months, six per cent. after six months, and twenty per cent. after twelve months, and I would make it the interest of every bill-holder very promptly to come in and present his bill for redemption within the three months, so as to avoid the tax; but I am told that such a proposition as that would not be sustained.

Mr. DAVIS. But I have a radical and fundamental objection to the proposition of the honorable Senator. In the first place every note that is issued by a bank is a contract. It is a contract between the bank and any person who accepts that note, and, consequently, neither party to the contract can change its terms. But there is a general leading principle of taxation which the Senator's proposition would, as he last explained it, violate. I hold that all unequal taxation is unconstitutional. My explanation is that where the same subject or class of subjects is taxed, the tax must be laid equally on the article in the hands of all persons who own it. For example, could Congress in this bill, or any other bill, assess whisky, or any other subject of taxation, at one rate in one State and at a different rate in another

State, and at still a different rate in a third State? Could they impose a varying rate of taxation upon the same article in any or in all States? Not at all. I think it is a constitutional and fundamental principle of taxation that the rate of taxation imposed upon any subject under the same state of circumstances must be equal and uniform, whether that subject is held by A or B, and that, consequently, this varying tax which the Senator from Ohio suggests would be an infraction of that principle, would be unjust in itself, and ought not to be adopted; and I hold that Congress has no power whatever to legislate upon or to attempt to regulate this subject.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to hear from my friend from Kentucky as to the effect of his amendment in one respect. Suppose that his amendment should be adopted, and that the circulating notes now out should be reissued by the banks, would they be taxable?

Mr. DAVIS. Oh, yes, certainly; that would be an issue. A reissue is an issue. The amendment applies only to notes that have been issued and that are now in circulation.

Mr. HENDERSON. The difficulty about the amendment is that we cannot distinguish between those notes now out and those reissued unless we provide some means by which they shall be stamped when they come in.

Mr. DAVIS. If the body is disposed to accept the amendment which I have offered, when the bill comes into the Senate we can provide some mode for identifying the notes. The suggestion of the Senator from Missouri is very timely and very proper.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think there would be some difficulty about it as it now stands.

Mr. DAVIS. But for the purpose of testing the principle, the vote may be taken on the amendment in its present form; and if the principle should be favored by the Senate, the matter can be readily provided for; if it should not be, there will be no necessity for providing for it.

The amendment was rejected—ayes three, noes not counted.

Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the bill by striking out in line four hundred and fifty-seven of section ninety-three, on page 145, the words "and snuff-flour," so as to leave the tax to be assessed on the snuff when it is manufactured and ready for sale. The distinction between snuff-flour and snuff is this: the snuff-flour is the tobacco after it is ground and before it is manufactured into snuff by pickling or scenting or anything of that kind, and the two provisions here make a difficulty. It is sometimes to be taxed as snuff-flour and sometimes as snuff, and between the two you may not get any tax. My proposition is to strike out "snuff-flour" and leave it to be taxed as snuff when prepared for the market, because in manufacturing it into snuff the weight is increased about one seventh, and you get more pounds to tax, and it is better for the Government to do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think I can offer an amendment that will be better for the revenue and it may perhaps meet the case. I would insert after line four hundred and fifty-nine this proviso:

Provided, That the tax on snuff or snuff-flour shall be paid by the person or persons grinding the same, and snuff-flour having once paid a tax shall not be subject to any additional tax after being mixed or scented, except upon the additional weight added thereto.

Ground tobacco is not snuff; but, as I am informed, druggists and other dealers in snuff are in the habit of purchasing ground tobacco, "snuff-flour," as it is called, and manufacturing it themselves; and yet no collector would think of going into one of those places to collect a tax on snuff; and this is the only way, in my estimation, to insure the collection in every instance of the tax. I am informed that it is a very common occurrence for a druggist or a dealer in snuff to purchase ten, fifteen, or twenty bushels of snuff-flour, and manufacture it himself into snuff, without any tax ever being previously laid. The result of that will be absolutely to defraud the Treasury out of this tax of thirty-five cents a pound which belongs to us.

Mr. CLARK. It is as I had supposed; I had seen the proposition of the Senator, and I know very well whence it comes, and it is worthy of some attention. But upon careful consideration and upon information from other people, I had thought this was the better way, and if we strike out "snuff-flour" in this clause it will leave the whole matter to be considered between the two Houses; and then I propose to put in after the word "tobacco" in line four hundred and fifty-seven the words "or any substitute thereof," and let it stand for further conference. The proviso presented by the Senator from Michigan does not avoid the difficulty I suggested, that between the two forms of snuff and snuff-flour the Government may lose more than would be gained the other way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Michigan as moving an amendment. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I propose further to amend by striking out the four hundred and sixtieth, four hundred and sixty-first, and four hundred and sixty-second lines of section ninety-three, which are in the words: "On tobacco, fine-cut, sold or delivered loose, in bulk, or in packages, papers, wrappers, or boxes, thirty-five cents per pound;" and inserting in lieu thereof:

On fine-cut chewing tobacco, whether manufactured with the stem in or not, and however sold, whether loose, in bulk, or in packages, papers, wrappers, or boxes, forty-five cents per pound.

It will be observed that I have increased the percentage on the article from thirty-five to forty-five cents a pound. This fine-cut is made of the very finest kind of tobacco produced in the country, and I am told by those people who are acquainted with it and know it that it will bear a tax of forty-five or fifty cents a pound. I have retained it, therefore, in this form, hoping to increase the tax upon it, and get a little more revenue.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Now, I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow us to take up the question in the next clause on striking out "seven" and inserting "eight," and let that be disposed of.

Mr. CLARK. I cannot do that, because I have got that whole matter of cigars under further consideration. I propose further to amend the bill on the 144th page by striking out from the four hundred and forty-sixth to the four hundred and fifty-second lines, inclusive, of the ninety-third section, which are in these words:

On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, and manufactured tobacco not otherwise provided for, of all descriptions, (not including snuff, cigars, fine-cut, smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems and not sweetened or otherwise prepared, nor shorts or other refuse separated from fine-cut tobacco in the process of manufacturing,) and on stemmed tobacco, thirty-five cents per pound.

And inserting the following in lieu thereof:

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco not herein provided for, from which the stem has been taken in whole or in part, or which is sweetened, thirty-five cents per pound.

On smoking tobacco manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, and on refuse tobacco known as fine-cut shorts, twenty-five cents per pound.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "twenty-five cents" and inserting "twenty cents" in the last clause. My object in moving this amendment is to increase the revenue. I believe we shall receive more revenue from a tax of twenty cents than we shall from a tax of twenty-five cents, and I really believe we should receive more from a tax of fifteen cents than a tax of twenty cents, because any man can step into a store and purchase a leaf of tobacco which pays no tax and with his jack-knife make precisely as good smoking tobacco as can be made by any manufacturer in the United States. I think I will first propose to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen" as a revenue measure, as a measure which I believe will yield more revenue than can be obtained from a tax of twenty-five cents.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be better at twenty cents.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will put it back at twenty cents.

Mr. CLARK. I hope it will not be made twenty, because the Senate will observe that we have a further provision in the four hundred and fifty-third line of this section, that on smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems, there shall be a duty of fifteen cents a pound, and that provides a cheap kind of tobacco. I had this matter of fixing the duty on smoking tobacco at 'twenty' or twenty-five cents under consideration, and while the gentlemen whom I may say the Senator represents, and from whom he gets his information, advised that there should be but one rate of tax, and that at twenty cents, I thought it was better to put the low kind at fifteen cents, and this kind at twenty-five cents, because if you do not have a cheap kind of tobacco taxed with the stems in at fifteen cents, which the people will use, they will get it from the farmers to some extent. I came to the conclusion, and that was the conclusion of a large number of persons engaged in this matter, who seemed to be honestly for the Government, that it was better for the Government to retain the higher duty on this article and put a little lower on the other. I propose to make two grades of smoking tobacco—that which is manufactured of the stems and leaf, including the fine-cut shorts, at twenty-five cents, and that which is manufactured exclusively of the stem, at fifteen cents. I think it is better for the Government, notwithstanding that I differ from the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am informed by large dealers and manufacturers that the price of stems is from two to three cents a pound, while the price of the quality of tobacco from which smoking tobacco is manufactured is from three to five cents, a very slight difference indeed. Now, I am told that if we make this large difference of ten cents a pound in the tax, the effect will be to raise the price of stems absolutely above the value of the leaf itself. A further effect will be to drive smokers of this low grade to the use of the leaf prepared by themselves, and so the revenue, instead of being increased, will be largely diminished.

There is another item in this account, the shorts. I am informed that small manufacturers, those who pay from five hundred to a thousand dollars a month tax to the Government, find no difficulty in getting rid of their shorts, while large manufacturers, who pay from ten to twelve thousand dollars a month to the Government, accumulate them very largely. Now, the Senator professes to put on shorts a tax of twenty-five cents a pound as well as upon smoking tobacco. These shorts are the refuse of chewing tobacco. They will not sell to-day for the amount that you propose to put on in the shape of a tax. They accumulate largely upon the hands of the large manufacturers. It would be a hardship and an injury, which I think ought not to be inflicted upon them: I think that the tax should not exceed fifteen cents a pound; but still, if the Senate sees fit to put twenty cents a pound upon smoking, shorts, and all, perhaps it would be satisfactory to all parties, and I am sure it would increase the revenue of the Government.

Mr. CLARK. The Senate cannot expect—and if it does expect it cannot succeed in the expectation—to satisfy all the manufacturers of tobacco; but I am very glad that the Senator has called the attention of the Senate and called my attention to this matter of the shorts, because it is a matter in which the manufacturers defraud the Government as much as in anything else. The shorts, proper, are the refuse or fine dust of the tobacco as it drops out in manufacture. You may add to that almost any of the fine tobacco, and still call it shorts, and have it go into this very low grade which the Senator would put at fifteen cents. I did propose to put the fine-cut shorts into the high grade at thirty-five cents, because they defrauded the Government so much in that matter; but on conference with large numbers of tobacco dealers they all agreed, with the exception of the gentleman to whom the Senator refers and from whom he gets his information, that they should go into the twenty-five cent rate. The Government is very liable to be defrauded by the mixture of a very good article with the shorts. It only needs to pulverize it and put it in with the shorts, and the result is the very best kind of smoking tobacco; and that the Senator would have at fifteen cents a pound. It is better, in my judgment, that it should be put in with the twenty-five cent kind.

The Senator will observe that as this bill came from the House of Representatives all smoking tobacco was put in the twenty-five cent grade except that manufactured from stems exclusively, and these shorts; all that manufactured from the leaf and stem together, all the smoking tobacco, was in the thirty-five cent tax. We proposed to take it out of that, because that would be too high in the judgment of the committee, to bring it down to twenty-five cents, and make another grade and put the low-priced smoking tobacco at fifteen cents; and in the judgment of the committee that is the better way. The committee of course are not tobacco manufacturers; they must rely on the information they get. I have seen the gentleman to whom the Senator refers several times; and I have also had long conversations with and information from a great many other people, and the best conclusion that I can arrive at is that which I have presented to the Senate, and I hope the Senate will adopt my amendment and leave the matter for further consideration between the two Houses. The effect of it is to leave the whole matter open.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have one remark to make before the vote is taken. I pass no opinion upon the amount of tax that is levied upon manufactured tobacco; but if a tax of thirty-five cents is to be retained upon manufactured tobacco, this proposition submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire, of twenty-five cents upon smoking tobacco, manufactured with the stem in, is low enough. I mean to say that if this is lowered the strong probability is that much fraud will be committed. It is a very well known fact that the very finest article of tobacco is manufactured as smoking tobacco. Frequently tobacco that has been raised in this country the first year from the Cuba seed is taken and cut up, the leaf and the stem together, and used by smokers; in fact the tobacco cannot be purchased for less than twenty-five, thirty, or forty dollars now. It is used by a great many smokers in preference to the Cuba cigar.

The Senator from New Hampshire, instead of following the House provision which taxes smoking tobacco thirty-five cents, just the same as manufactured tobacco, (and in reality just as valuable tobacco is put up for smoking purposes as for chewing purposes, and indeed it is generally the case now that a superior article is put up for smoking purposes, and a great many persons use it with pipes in preference to cigars,) instead of laying the same tax on tobacco manufactured either for the purposes of smoking or chewing, has reduced the tax on smoking tobacco manufactured with all the stem in from thirty-five to twenty-five cents. I understand that for smoking purposes it is almost as good manufactured with the stem in as it is without. He provides that if manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been stripped from the stem, it shall pay a duty of twenty-five cents per pound. All I have to say is that if the manufactured tobacco is taxed thirty-five cents this ought to be taxed, I think, twenty-five cents; in fact it ought to be taxed on some qualities higher, but, inasmuch as he has put in fine-cut shorts here, perhaps twenty-five cents is enough.

I agree with the Senator from Michigan that upon refuse tobacco called fine-cut shorts twenty-five cents would be too high perhaps; but it is not the case with this smoking tobacco. A large quantity, in fact the larger quantity of the smoking tobacco now is made of very superior tobacco cut up with the stem in it, and especially of fine tobacco grown from the Cuba seed the first year. The second or third year I understand it is pretty much like our tobacco that is grown in this country; but for the first year the stem is very small and it is a valuable tobacco.

I think it would be well enough to retain the proposition at least so far as smoking tobacco is concerned; but the fine-cut shorts might be separated and the tax on them reduced to fifteen cents as the Senator from Michigan suggests. I am not conversant with that refuse tobacco called fine-cut shorts, and it may be, as the Senator says, much less valuable, but it would be very dangerous to separate smoking tobacco and reduce the tax upon it, because large quantities of tobacco will be cut up with the stem in, the finer article now selling in the leaf probably for fifty cents a pound, and will be branded "smoking tobacco," and the inferior tax will be levied upon it.

I pass no opinion now on the tax here proposed. I simply state that if a tax of thirty-five cents be retained on manufactured tobacco, and I understand that to be the intention of the committee on tobacco manufactured for chewing purposes, this tax ought to be retained on smoking tobacco.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think the Senator from Missouri is under a misapprehension in regard to this matter. Chewing tobacco is not only cut, but manufactured; it is sweetened with licorice and other ingredients, so as to prepare it for the mouth. The smoking tobacco is cut dry. There can be no misapprehension between smoking and chewing tobacco. They are as unlike as it is possible to have the same article made. The Senator, I think, is under a misapprehension in another respect, and that is that any considerable quantity of this valuable tobacco is ever cut for smoking. The amount is infinitesimally small; and had the question been put to me I should have said none at all was cut. Detroit is, I believe, the second or third city in the Union as to the amount of manufactured tobacco, and I do not believe a single pound of this valuable tobacco was ever cut there into smoking tobacco. It is the low grades of tobacco, tobacco worth to-day not to exceed five cents in the leaf, it is the damaged tobacco, tobacco which having gone through what is called the process of sweating has deteriorated instead of having improved; that is the kind of tobacco which is used for smoking purposes; and I should say that throughout the whole United States there is not one pound of the valuable tobacco cut where there is five hundred pounds of the inferior grade cut.

I think the Senator is under a misapprehension. He certainly is, so far as my knowledge and experience go. I still think that a tax of twenty cents a pound would yield a greater revenue, for that is what I am after. Show me that fifty cents will yield a greater revenue than fifteen, and I will vote for fifty. I want what will yield the largest amount of revenue to this Government, but I am honest and sincere in the conviction that an excise of twenty cents a pound will yield a larger revenue than twenty-five cents, and I think that even a lower rate would yield a larger revenue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 1, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the Senate No. 57, to amend the charter of the city of Washington; when the Speaker signed the same.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. SPALDING demanded the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the regular order of business, to call the committees for reports, beginning with the select committee on a bankruptcy law.

Mr. JENCKES, from the said select committee, reported back, without amendment and with the recommendation that it do pass, bill of the House No. 424, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. CRAVENS. That bill has never been considered by the select committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island states that he reports the bill from the select committee.

Mr. CRAVENS. I make the point of order that the bill has never been considered by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Rhode Island, who is a member of the select committee, states that he reports the bill from that committee. The Chair has no means of ascertaining the deliberations of the committee and is bound to receive the report.

Mr. JENCKES. Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in introducing into this House a subject for its action which is entirely unconnected with political or partisan questions. It relates solely and entirely to the business and men of business of the nation. Its consideration at the present time is demanded by every active business interest. It is a subject which we can discuss without acrimony, and differ upon without anger. If a division is had upon it, the lines will not be those of party. It is a green spot amid the arid wastes of party strife, and one to which the fiery scourge of civil war has not yet extended. It presents unusual claims upon us at the present time, when all the business interests of the country are in a state of constant agitation. The life of the nation is in the prosperity and energy of its active men. While they are encouraged, and their rights and interests protected by just legislation their efforts will continue and the nation will endure.

Mr. Speaker, this measure is called for by the direct language of the Constitution:

"Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

The Constitution also precludes the States from legislating upon the subject, by depriving them of the power of passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. The grant of the power implies its exercise as a duty. The power granted in the first clause of the sentence has been exercised since the early days of the Constitution, uniformly, constantly, and the laws enacted in pursuance of it are still in force. The power which is now invoked has been exercised intermittently, at long intervals, to meet special emergencies in the business of the country, and the laws have been repealed before they have formed even the basis of a system of legislation.

What is now proposed is to enact a law with a different purpose from the ephemeral laws which have preceded it, and which shall form the basis of a permanent and uniform system of legislation and jurisprudence on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the country; that there shall be no longer upon this subject one law in Maine and another law in Wisconsin, a third in California and a fourth in Kentucky, and so on throughout all the States, but one law for all, which the citizens of the United States, inhabiting each and all the States, may acknowledge, live under, and enjoy, and feel it to be as stable as the Constitution upon which it stands. All that we can now propose is the basis of such a system. A nation like ours can hardly find precedents, and must seek out rules and make laws for itself. The experience of other States and nations must be carefully explored, and their systems and the tendencies of their systems fairly studied, before their laws and jurisprudence can be copied and adopted into ours. The fact that all the attempts to frame a system which should meet the requirements of the Constitution have been failures, have made your committee most careful in consideration of this subject and to explore into and seek out the principles upon which a permanent system should rest. We have not sought to avoid the rocks upon which other navigators have been wrecked, but rather to find and make them the basis of the structure which we wish to rear. The principles of the laws of trade and commerce are like the light-houses and beacons which guide the mariner upon the seas, and these principles we ask to be held up before all who adventure upon the perilous ocean of business.

It has been shown by actual count that more than nine tenths of those who enter upon commercial life fail during their early career. How beneficent, how wise, how necessary is it, therefore, to enact laws which shall be their guide from such disaster or to save them from the ruin which it brings. Every commercial country has such legislation. There is none that can be found without laws upon this subject since the system of bankruptcy was introduced into the jurisprudence of the Roman empire and made universal by the Christian emperors. No country of the Latin race has been without it. The Teutonic nations have adopted it, and in England it has been the law for nearly three centuries. The framers of our Constitution deemed the passage of such a law a matter of course. They foresaw the great field which American citizens would occupy in the business of the world, and in the same clause of that great instrument they provided both for welcoming the industrial and commercial adventurers from other countries, and also gave power to make provision for the casualties that might arise from the spirit of adventure which must ever govern those who would develop the resources of a new and great country. The wise foresight of our fathers has been overlooked, forgotten, or willfully ignored. Now, in the midst of civil war, when all the business interests of the nation are afloat upon a sea of uncertainty, when the States have found that their imperfect legislation on the subject of insolvency has become, under the prohibitory clause of the Constitution, of little use to the citizens of the United States, we are called upon to carry into effect this great unexecuted provision of the Constitution.

The bill before you intended to be a thoroughly practical one. It contains no theories; it anticipates no undiscovered emergencies. It deals with the fact called bankruptcy. Every one knows what that is. It is insolvency beyond the reasonable chance of recovery. The signs and proofs of it are well known. The first principle of all such systems of laws is, that when that fact occurs, the administration of the bankrupt's effects belongs to his creditors and not to himself. Coupled with this is also the merciful provision, that if the insolvent surrenders all his property for such administration, and shows that he has been honest and faithful in conducting his affairs, he should be discharged from the obligations which by accident or misfortune he has not been able to perform. If hopeless insolvency be commercial death, then the bankrupt laws open to the honest bankrupt freedom from his debts, and the road to a new commercial life.

In this country there neither is nor can be any privileged class who should enjoy the benefit of such a system of laws. All are liable to insolvency, and all are equally entitled to relief. If time permitted it would be interesting to give the history of the English bankrupt laws, which were originally confined to traders, and which have been gradually enlarged to include all persons, like the one which we now report.

The tests of this insolvency beyond reasonable hope are of two classes:

I. The bankrupt's own admission of it.

II. The proof of the facts, which are the best evidence of the insolvent's hopeless condition, and which are conclusive of it unless explained by equally satisfactory evidence.

The bill therefore contains provisions both for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy.

In the course of true, healthy, honest business, the person who finds himself in a condition of hopeless insolvency, whatever may be his occupation, should at once call his creditors together and submit to them what he should do for their mutual interest, and both creditors and debtor should unite upon some plan which will secure the rights of each and all. But unfortunately under the common law, and under that law as controlled and regulated by the laws of the several States, such a notification from the debtor would only prompt the creditor whose claim was soonest due to seek the privilege which legal proceedings for the collection of his debt would give him, and the debtor would either be deprived of his property by process of law, or deprive himself of it by assignment in favor of some of his creditors to the entire exclusion of others. Those who receive nothing will give the debtor no discharge, and the law as it stands in nearly all the States makes the debtor upon the verge of insolvency, and his creditors, common enemies, with such melancholy results as we see all over the land.

The bill now presented is believed to be the first attempt in this country to bring the failing debtor and his creditors upon a ground of negotiation and settlement equally beneficial to each. The bankrupt act of 1800 was for the benefit of creditors only. It was a careful digest of the English statutes of bankruptcy to that date, without any study as to their adaptation to the exigencies of business in this country. Any lawyer or man of business, by even a cursory examination of its provisions, can see the causes of its failure.

The bankrupt act of 1841 was substantially for the benefit of debtors only. It was reported originally as a purely voluntary system. In the course of discussion certain amendments were ingrafted upon it which seemed to favor creditors, but which were soon found out to be almost entirely illusory. This objection to the law was well taken in the debate before its enactment, and was one of the causes, if not the main cause, which induced its sudden repeal.

The points aimed to be secured by the bill now reported are:

1. The discharge of the honest debtor upon the surrender of his property.

2. The protection of the creditor against the fraudulent practices and reckless conduct of his debtor.

I presume the first question that every one will ask, for it is the question which has caused the greatest difficulty to the committee, will be, how can this be done with the present judicial system of the United States without great and inordinate delay and expense? The failing of the former laws was in a great degree owing to the inefficient and cumbersome machinery by which they were attempted to be carried into effect, and to the want of uniformity in the proceedings and practice. The answer to this question will be found in the first twelve sections of this bill. The district courts are made courts of bankruptcy. All initial proceedings must be had in them. If the judge cannot dispose of the cases in a reasonable time, he may have an assistant. But experience has shown that nine tenths of the business in courts of bankruptcy and insolvency is of a mere formal character. Heretofore this class of business has wasted the time of the courts, and no substantial benefit has been obtained by the appointment of commissioners, who exercised an undefined and in a great degree an irresponsible jurisdiction. Appeals from their decisions filled the courts. This system wasted the time of the courts, the funds of the bankrupt's estate, and brought the system into disrepute.

The committee have proposed to remedy the faults of the old system by the creation of a class of officers called registers. They are authorized to transact all the business of the court when there is no opposing interest. If they find an opposing interest in any case they are authorized to state the question in writing and certify it into the court for the decision of the judge. They are the hands and the eyes of the court, but are not clothed with its powers or its discretion. They are to be paid a limited salary out of a fund to be collected by fees, and their interest as well as their duty is to discourage litigation.

The first idea of such officers originated in Massachusetts and was incorporated into their insolvency law. It was copied thence into the bankrupt law of England of 1861. The committee have adopted and modified it to make it applicable to the wants of this country, which are far beyond those of any individual State, like Massachusetts or England. The uniformity of proceedings and practice under the law are secured by a provision for general rules which shall be applicable to all the judicial districts.

Under the bankrupt law of 1841 every district judge was authorized to make rules for the practice in his courts. Each of them exercised this power. The consequence was that instead of the country's having a uniform system of bankruptcy there were as many systems of practice as there were districts.

The uniformity of practice under the proposed bill will be secured by a code of rules to be established by commissioners appointed by the Supreme Court. Before they take effect they must have the sanction of one of the judges of that tribunal. It is impossible to make provisions in any statute for all the details of proceedings and practice in the courts, and it is essential that uniformity should be secured in all the courts of the United States. It seemed best to the committee that all such rules should be framed and carried into effect under the highest judicial sanction.

The committee have adopted the system of creditors' assignees, and have rejected all the cumbersome machinery of official assignees, accountants, registry of courts, and accountant generals. Insolvency is a matter between the bankrupt and his creditors, and can best be managed by them under the direction of the courts.

In the respects just named this bill differs from former laws. Every question raised by litigants contesting the bankrupt's discharge must be heard and decided by a responsible judge in open court, upon an issue made up by the justice or stated by one of the registers of the court. It may be taken for granted that no question will then be raised which is not one which ought to be thus heard and decided. The interests of the parties would be opposed to delay or to the presentation of frivolous questions.

The mode of proceeding in voluntary bankruptcy will be found in the thirteenth section.

The powers, duties, and obligations of assignees will be found in sections fourteen to twenty-one, inclusive. It is sufficient to state that they are at all times under the control of the creditors and of the court.

The proof of debts, the protection of the fund, the rejection of fictitious debts and of fraudulent claims, the examination of the bankrupt, the distribution of the estate, the limitation of preferences, and the requisites to procure a discharge are also provided for, and will be found within sections twenty-two and forty-eight.

The limitations upon the discharge will be found in sections thirty-six and thirty-seven.

In sections thirty-eight and forty-eight will be found two important provisions. One is an allowance to the bankrupt out of the fund, if he is an honest debtor, so that he may not be turned adrift upon the world without a dime if he has honestly surrendered his effects for administration and distribution by his creditors.

The other gives him an opportunity of meeting his creditors, and if they are satisfied of his integrity and ability, to permit them to wind up his affairs under a trust deed with the same effect as if the proceedings had been conducted throughout in the court of bankruptcy.

Here the debtor and his creditors meet upon the common ground of obligation and duty which underlies all these systems, and this provision compels obedience to the dictate of duty.

There are creditors who systematically refuse a discharge; men who profess to be Christians with Shylock's principles. I have met many of them, and I presume many of us have. It is to prevent the tyranny of such creditors that laws like this should be passed.

Consider the effect of this conduct upon those who have met with misfortune in business. If they have dealt with one of these Shylocks they have no hope of relief. All the other creditors may be willing to receive the proffered dividend if satisfied of its fairness, but none desire that one shall have an advantage over the rest. The consequence is that the debtor continues to secrete and hold his property, to cover it up by the ingenious network of fraudulent contrivances and conveyances that no court, in the absence of a bankrupt law, and in the face of the strong swearing of the debtor and his friends, has ever been able to break through. The debtor hides himself behind all sorts of subterfuges. He loses all sense of mercantile honor; he borrows the name of some irresponsible person, behind which he may use his secreted capital; he advertises himself as agent for his father, son, or, in some States, even of his wife. All these false principals stand ready to help him by positive testimony, and the debtor commences and carries on a career of fraud from which there is no honorable escape.

Or if he possesses integrity and ability, those very qualities are a disadvantage in any attempt to procure a discharge. The creditor says to him, "Some day you will recover yourself, or your friends will set you up in business, and then I can secure my debt." The qualifications for success are thus made to increase the penalties and sufferings of misfortune.

The proposed system establishes a sound basis of business and regulates credits. The reason is obvious. This law will underlie all the local laws governing the relations of debtor and creditor, and all will know the terms upon which they deal with each other. When it shall be understood that there can be no preferences upon the eve of failure, no seclusion or abstraction of property for the benefit of the debtor's friends or relatives, no transfers which cannot be inquired into, no settlements by an insolvent upon his wife or children which cannot be reached and declared void through the courts of bankruptcy, and when, at the same time, it shall be understood that the debtor who finds himself in failing circumstances, and comes forward and meets his creditors, and shows that he is entitled to his discharge and can procure it by a surrender of his effects, I venture to assert that fraudulent bankruptcies will be as few in this country as they are in other countries, under wiser and better commercial systems. Indeed I believe much fewer; for I have a strong belief in the wisdom and honesty of the American people.

Under this system of voluntary bankruptcy and of composition deeds, I believe that after a reasonable time proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy will be void, except in cases of attempted fraud. But it will be perceived by reading sections forty to forty-seven that such proceedings are provided for, and that they are complete and thorough. They meet and obviate every objection which was raised to the bankrupt act of 1841 by its opponents, and which gave a partisan character to that law.

This bill includes corporations. It has a complete system of involuntary proceedings, and provides for composition settlements, and is of unquestionable constitutionality. These were the grounds which gave the opposition to the law of 1841 a party character, and they no longer exist. There is now no good reason why corporations should not be included under a general bankrupt law. They are subject to bankruptcies, and State laws must be enacted for their relief. Why should these artificial persons have a privilege different from natural persons? Whenever there is a personal liability for the debts of the corporation, we may be sure the stockholders will not claim such privileges either for the corporation or for themselves.

This bill is also self-sustaining, and may become a source of revenue.

It may be objected to this bill that it is retroactive or retrospective. I maintain that it is not retroactive or even retrospective. It is applicable to the business of the country as it is, and to the men of business in their present actual condition.

With regard to proceedings in involuntary bankruptcy, there can be no question. No person can be proceeded against except for causes happening or continuing after the approval of this bill. Acts of bankruptcy are facts, and such facts or events happening after this bill shall become a law, can alone become the basis of involuntary proceedings. These facts must be proved, as required in the bill, before any warrant can issue for the seizure of the bankrupt's effects. But with regard to voluntary proceedings the filing of the petition is declared to be an act of bankruptcy. Before the petitioner can entitle himself to a discharge, he must bring himself by competent evidence within the provisions of the bill. His debts have accrued. His property may have been applied honestly under State laws to the payment of his debts. He may now have no assets. He may be indebted to the assistance of his friends for the means of applying for the benefit of the law. The debts which he has long owed without means of payment may be discharged in these proceedings.

But in what sense is this bill retroactive or even retrospective upon such obligations? The bill applies to the present fact. A person in the position described could not be proceeded against under this bill, because he is not capable of committing an act of bankruptcy. He has not been capable of doing so since he parted with or was deprived of his property. The only mode in which he can commit an act of bankruptcy under this bill is to file his petition for relief. That petition applies to his present condition. He thereby becomes a bankrupt, subject to the provisions of this bill, and must in all respects comply with its provisions before he can receive his discharge. If a bankrupt law like this had been passed immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution it would have operated upon the then state of business in the country, and would have been retroactive and retrospective in every case of voluntary application in the same manner as proposed in the present bill. Every case of voluntary or involuntary application hereafter for many years must operate upon debts incurred before the passage of this bill.

Such proceedings in no sense impair the obligation of contracts. No contract has been entered into since the adoption of the Constitution which has not been subject to be discharged by the operation of a bankrupt law which Congress might pass at any time.

Why should this state of things continue? Of what advantage can it be to creditors or to the country that so many tens of thousands of the active men of this country should be held in thrall? They bear upon their limbs no visible chains; they have no masters who will yield them food for their toil, yet they are in the power of those who may sweep off their earnings at any time, and in some States may incarcerate their persons in prison.

Although this actual imprisonment of the person has been abolished, except for temporary purposes, in most of the States, yet in all there still exists that life-long incarceration, more terrible to the honest and sensitive mind than the other, in the chain network of insoluble debt. For crimes the term of imprisonment is limited by law, the bolts of the jail or the penitentiary are driven and unloosed, and the penalty is paid. But for debt there is no release in life. The Roman law of the twelve tables, de corpore debitoris in partes secundo, by which the relentless creditor could obtain a dividend of his debtor's body, if not of his effects, passed away with that code.

The law formerly in force by which the creditor could keep his debtor in prison for an indefinite period, without relief, has been abolished in all Christian countries. But there may be a punishment of death without the knife, and an imprisonment without the bolts and bars of the jail. When in this country one enters the gates of hopeless insolvency, all his life must be passed within the imprisonment of mercantile dishonor, the pain of uncanceled obligations, the surveillance of creditors, and there is no release except by death. Who enters here may thereafter write over such habitation as he may have during the remnant of his life, the motto that the poet found inscribed over the gates of hell:

"Who enters here abandons hope."

To him—

"Hope cometh not that comes to all."

Whatever may be his talents, whatever his skill, the result of long business experience, whatever his opportunity, so long as creditors stand unwilling to release him, his life is one continuous thrall, without the power of relief by his own exertions, and beyond the aid of his friends. Why should this be, and for what good? To what end? Do the public gain by it? Do the creditors? No one can answer in the affirmative.

How many thousands and tens of thousands now stand waiting the action of this Congress for the relief which is due to them! Never was there an occasion when the passage of a law like that now reported was so necessary, nor the demand for it so urgent. Thousands were wrecked in the panic of 1857 who have never yet regained a firm foothold in any business. Thousands more were stranded in the repudiation of southern debtors in 1860, ruined beyond retrieval. Many of these were old men, who saw large fortunes swept away from beneath their feet, and found themselves amid the quicksands of hopeless insolvency ere they could make a trial-balance of their books. Many of these we know, aged men, and see verified in them the description of the caprices of fortune:

"It is still her use

To let the wretched man outlive his wealth,
To view with hollow eye and wrinkled front
An age of poverty."

And many of more vigorous years, the young members of ancient houses, are borne down by a weight of debt beyond their strength, condemned throughout their lives to eat the bitter bread of penury, and, unless we intervene, without hope. What to them are the guarantees of the Constitution? Why should they love the Government and yield it a hearty allegiance? Many, indeed, have gone forth to the war for its support, to lay their bones upon battle-fields, or to return to a life-long servitude and degradation. The fault is here and not with them or with the Constitution if they owe it slack allegiance. Upon this subject the Constitution is as it should be. Thank God, it needs no amendment to declare this emancipation. It rests with Congress alone to say whether more than a hundred thousand of the most intelligent, most active, and most patriotic men of the country should have the opportunity of liberating themselves from their bondage of debt, and walk free in the exercise of those rights which the immortal Declaration declares inalienable.

The power to make this declaration of freedom stands written upon the face of the Constitution. With the cry of these hundred thousand in our ears, and of the thousands more dependent upon them for subsistence; with the present state of the nation before us, in which no one is so blind as not to see that when the ebb-tide of this factitious paper money prosperity comes, as come it must, the shores of the great seas of trade will be strewn with more wrecks than ever yet were seen in any panic or revulsion, does it not become the duty of this Congress to acknowledge its constitutional obligation, and exercise its power to remedy and anticipate these evils? How can we be excused for the non-performance of this plain duty?

Let no one say in excuse that the portion of the country he represents is agricultural and not commercial. Every section of the country is commercial. Do not the agricultural districts sell their surplus products? Do they not buy their needed supplies from the seaboard? Is not this commerce? All parts of this country, not now in arms against the constitutional Government, are so connected, interlaced, and interwoven with each other, that the prosperity of one part is the prosperity of all, and the neglect or injury of one part is to the injury of all.

Let us, then, by this beneficial measure unite in placing all upon a just equality, and, by the performance of the constitutional obligation, bind all sections more firmly together, make greater uniformity in these laws, and add to the resources of the country the labor and skill of thousands who now stand waiting in grief and without hope except from us, and take away from the hundreds of thousands who are now engaged in active business the fear that by the chances of war, the revulsions of business, or the senseless panics among speculators, they may become no longer of use to themselves or of service to their country. Let it be the honor of this Congress to lay aside for a day its party strife and fierce contentions, and, meeting on a common ground of mercy to the unfortunate and justice to the active business men of the nation, pass with unanimity a measure so fraught with beneficence to all, and for which they will receive the blessings of thousands. It is a measure of unquestionable good; it is demanded by the people; and it is authorized and required by the Constitution. Let it then become a law.

INSPECTORS OF STEAMBOATS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on bill of the House No. 426, to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Did this House or the Senate ask for the committee of conference?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This House.

The SPEAKER. Has the Senate acted upon the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has not.

The SPEAKER. According to the Digest, the House asking the conference leaves the papers with the other House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I supposed that the House asking the conference had the papers. I am not clear as to the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

"In all cases of conference asked after a vote of disagreement, &c., the conferees of the House asking it are to leave the papers with the conferees of the other."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the report.

MILITARY ROAD IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BOYD, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution authorizing the President to construct a military road from Rolla, Missouri, to Springfield, Missouri; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SEWERAGE AND DRAINAGE IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. STEELE, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution as to sewerage and drainage in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time by its title; and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

THE BANKRUPT BILL—RESUMED.

Mr. SPALDING. I would ask the Chair if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. SPALDING. Then I desire to know what is the position of the bankrupt bill?

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time now?"

Mr. SPALDING. I wish, by the permission of the House, to say that the committee desire to challenge a critical examination of that bill, and therefore they propose to continue its consideration in the morning hour for discussion, and if there is no member now ready to go on, I hope the subject will be passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope this bill will be disposed of as soon as possible, and be taken out of the way, so that other committees may have an opportunity to report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to enter a motion to postpone the bill until the second Tuesday in December next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that will not be done. If no other gentleman desires to speak, let us pass the bill now. It has been printed for a long time, and members have had an opportunity of examining it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope the motion of the gentleman from Indiana will not carry. This is an important bill, and ought to be passed at this session.

Mr. SPALDING. I will ask for a vote upon the engrossment of the bill now.

The SPEAKER. The vote must be first taken on the motion to postpone.

Mr. SPALDING. Well, sir, I demand the previous question on the motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the previous question, if ordered, will extend only to the motion to postpone.

Mr. SPALDING. Very well; I ask the previous question on that.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

On the motion to postpone there were—ayes 42, noes 63.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Baxter, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Boyd, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Grier, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalfsbeisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Leazer, Littlejohn, Loan, Mallory, Marcy, McClurg, McDowell, Morrill, Morrison, Anas Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Potham, Price, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Srouse, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, and Wilson—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. The SPEAKER. It has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate have agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the redemption and circulation thereof.

Also, that the Senate have passed bills of the House of the following titles with amendments; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 383) to incorporate the Home for Friendless Women and Children; and

An act (No. 290) for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott.

Also, that the Senate have passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

An act (No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing; and Joint resolution (No. 51) relative to the claims and letters patent of William Wheeler Hubbell.

Also, that the Senate have agreed to the amendment of the House to the title of the bill of the Senate (No. 218) to repeal the first section of a joint resolution therein named.

Also, that the Senate have passed a bill (No. 289) for the relief of Ida Hoffman, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

WASHINGTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, reported a bill from the Committee for the District of Columbia to amend the charter of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time, recommended to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF SUBSISTENCE.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enable persons in the civil service to purchase fuel and subsistence stores from the commissary department at cost; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

DEPOSIT VILLAGE.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill in relation to the village of Deposit, Delaware county, New York; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

NATIONAL CURRENCY.

Mr. HOOPER, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, reported that the committee, after a full and free conference, had agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows: that the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the fifteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, to strike out the words "the bonds," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "in excess of bonds beyond one third of the capital stock, and;" so that it will read:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall prevent an association that may desire to reduce its capital or to close up its business and dissolve its organization from taking up its bonds upon returning to the Comptroller its circulating notes in the proportion hereinafter named in this act, nor from taking up any excess of bonds beyond one third of the capital stock, and upon which no circulating notes have been delivered.

That the House recede from its nineteenth amendment, to add in section twenty-two after the word "issued" the words "or the amount of capital stock of the associations organized;" so that it would read:

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That the entire amount of notes for circulation to be issued or the amount of capital stock of the associations organized under this act shall not exceed $300,000,000.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the thirty-sixth amendment of the Senate, which is to add, in the thirty-first section, after the word "Albany" the word "Leavenworth."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the thirty-seventh amendment of the Senate, which is to strike out after the word "San Francisco" the words "and Portland," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "Buffalo and Providence, Rhode Island;" and agree to the same with an amendment, to strike out the words "Buffalo and Providence, Rhode Island," and insert in lieu thereof the words "Washington city."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the thirty-eighth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, to strike from the Senate amendment the words "at a rate of exchange for all cities west of the Alle-ghany mountains not exceeding one quarter of one per cent., and for all cities east of the Alleghany mountains," and to insert after the words "at par" the following:

And nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent all the shares in any of the said associations, held by any person or body corporate, from being included in the valuation of personal property of such person or corporation, in the assessment of taxes imposed by or under State authority, at the place where such bank is located, and not elsewhere; but not at a greater rate than is assessed on other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of said States: Provided further, That the tax so imposed under the law of any State upon the shares of any of the associations authorized by this act shall not exceed the rate imposed on shares in any of the bank organizations under the authority of the State where such association is located.

So that the section will read:

Sec. 32. And be it further enacted, That each association organized in any of the cities named in the foregoing section shall select, subject to the approval of the Comptroller of the Currency, an association in the city of New York at which it will redeem its circulating notes at par. And nothing in this act shall be construed, &c.

Mr. HOOPER moved the previous question on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask unanimous consent to put a question to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

There was no objection.

Mr. NOBLE. I wish to know how the bill stands in reference to the right of States to tax these banks for State purposes.

Mr. HOOPER. It leaves the right to the States to tax these banks at the same rates as they tax other moneyed property in the State.

Mr. GANSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it authorizes the tax to be imposed on the body-politic or simply on the shares.

Mr. HOOPER. It is to be imposed on the persons holding the shares, at the place where the bank is located.

The question was taken; and the report was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced an act relative to the construction of a bridge across the Hudson river at Albany, New York, for postal and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to submit a report in the case of James H. Birch, contesting the right of Austin A. King to a seat upon this floor from the sixth congressional district of Missouri.

Before making that report, I desire to state to the House that this case is kindred in its nature to the case of Bruce against Loan, already decided by the House. The Committee of Elections came to the same conclusion in this case as they did in that case, but the committee accept the decision of the House in that case as instruction to them in this one; at least they look upon it as a res adjudicata. While the opinion they have formed in this case is the same as that they reported in the case of Bruce and Loan, nevertheless they do not desire to reopen the discussion of these questions. They have submitted their views to the House, but the House has come to another conclusion.

It is proper for me to state in addition that in this particular case the testimony, all of it, or nearly so, was found to be irregularly taken—not in strict conformity to the provision of the statute. But that whole matter is within the control of the House. I may say that it does not present a stronger case of military or other interference than that of Bruce against Loan.

Now, the House having decided after deliberate discussion, the committee have changed their conclusions on the subject, and instructed me to report back the papers in the case of Birch against King, and to move that they be laid upon the table.

Mr. BIRCH, (contestant.) I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw the motion to lay upon the table, so that I may make a statement.

Mr. DAWES. I will withdraw it so that the contestant may make a statement in reference to his being heard; but, as this motion is made under direction of the Committee of Elections, I am not at liberty to withdraw it altogether. I will leave the matter to the House. If the House think that the contestant should be heard in the case, they can so decide. While I have no personal objection, still, acting under the instruction of the committee, I can only withdraw the motion to lay upon the table temporarily.

Mr. BIRCH. Mr. Speaker, having had an intimation a few days ago that the committee would reach such a conclusion as is now reported by its chairman, I have prepared as well as I could, out of courtesy to the House that I might not utter a sentence unfit for its hearing, an exposé of this case, the reading of which will occupy an hour or an hour and a half. Not having had the opportunity, or having failed to cultivate the opportunity, of becoming acquainted with gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, I trust that I may rely upon their courtesy, while I do not know the rules of order and proceeding here, to so pilot this report that I may be allowed to read the exposé that I have prepared. I desire to say that upon that statement I am willing to risk my future standing with gentlemen upon this floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it be in order, I will move that the contestant have the usual time to be heard on his case.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay upon the table is not debatable.

Mr. DAWES. I leave the matter with the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the motion be divided.

Mr. BIRCH. I have not finished what I desire to say in the way of preface.

According to every essential element of your past adjudications, this case is contradistinct from the case from the seventh district of Missouri which was decided a few days since. I make that statement most deliberately, under a sense of the courtesy which has sustained me here for six months awaiting your action, and in view of my future relations to this House by their final vote upon this case. I take the risk of being mistaken as well as the risk of satisfying the House that there never was such a case here; and I trust there never will be another. But perhaps I should be out of order if I proceed in this vein of remark.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not in order now; the motion is to lay upon the table, which is not debatable.

Mr. GRINNELL. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to move that the contestant and sitting member have leave to print their remarks.

The SPEAKER. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would hardly be showing sufficient courtesy to the contestant.

The question being taken on the motion to lay the papers on the table, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the case, and upon that question the contestant is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BIRCH took the floor.

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will allow me, I would like to have an understanding as to the point to which the argument shall be addressed in this case. The committee has reported that the testimony taken by the contestant has not been taken in accordance with law. This House decided in the case of Blair vs. Knox, on the 11th of March, that no testimony should be received by the Committee of Elections except that which was taken in pursuance of and in accordance with law. Now the committee has reported that this testimony has not thus been taken, and I submit to the House whether or not the merits of those depositions should be gone into until the point as to their admissibility shall have been adjudged by the House. I admit that the House may overrule the decision of the committee upon that point, and I admit that the House may agree to take into consideration that testimony which the committee has said has been taken without any authority of law.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the questions now to be debated by the House are as to whether the committee shall be discharged from the further consideration of all that evidence, and all the questions growing up under it.

Mr. KING. The point I wish to ascertain is, to what question the argument is to be directed.

The SPEAKER. The contestant can speak to any question pertaining to the election, the question being upon discharging the committee from the further consideration of all this evidence.

Mr. KING. Can the merits of these depositions be gone into in the arguments now made without the House first determining whether it is testimony?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes it can, whether evidence or not. The question is, "Shall the committee be discharged from the further consideration thereof?"

Mr. BIRCH. In reply to what the gentleman has said, I have but to say that I shall argue the question here precisely as I argued it before the committee, who supposed that the evidence had been taken in such a manner as to ascertain the truth, and upon that adjudication founded their report. I believe I might assume that upon the question of admissibility of the depositions and their entire credibility there was no substantial division in the committee.

I will now proceed to read what I have prepared, trusting to the indulgence of the House to allow me to conclude my remarks if they should exceed the hour allotted to me, particularly as it will be seen that I shall in no respect trifle with the dignity and indulgence thus invoked. I have made the argument as compact and condensed as I could possibly do from the records of the committee. If they had reported the facts in this case as they did in the case from the seventh district of Missouri, I would have asked but half an hour for my commentary upon those facts, but as I am compelled to read from the depositions in order to make myself understood, I must of course rely on the fairness, justice, and manhood of the House to permit me to read what I have thus prepared. I will proceed, therefore, directly to what I have to say on this case; previous to which, however, and before proceeding to avail myself of the permission which has been accorded me, it is deemed appropriate to thus respectfully record my appreciation of the Committee of Elections, to whom I have so long borne the relation of a contestant. They heard me courteously, intelligently, and, as I doubt not, impartially; and I hence ascribe such division as was apparent upon their ultimate finding to a want of perspicuity in my own imperfect presentation of the case, which it is trusted I may in some measure supply in my more matured and deliberate argument to-day. To this it will be of course excusable to add that should anything escape me unfit for the House to hear it will be neither from impulse or inadvertence, but because the deliberate cautiousness of even a written exposition has failed to sufficiently chasten the manner of presenting the wrongs of which I am here the humble yet accredited representative. Trusting to be appreciated and borne with accordingly it is deemed proper to premise that the duty thus briefly denoted would have been respectfully recoiled from, after the action of the House upon a previous case from my State, had it not been felt that the case now pending had been in no substantial respect prejudged to my disadvantage, but the exact reverse. If, therefore, I can succeed in propitiating the attention of the House to the preliminary distinction which I propose to present between the two cases I shall not despair of such subsequent consideration of the vitiating record which I shall read as will demonstrate that upon all the elements of your past adjudications the pretended "election" I am here to contest should be branded as at least a nullity.

Perhaps I cannot better "inaugurate" the preliminary distinctions thus briefly alluded to than by referring to the opening sentences of the speech of the gentleman from the seventh district, [Mr. LOAN,] whose case was considered and passed upon on the 10th of last month. Whatever difference of opinion may have prevailed in respect to the vitiations which were alleged against his election, he could at least advance to the discussion of them in the defiant consciousness that he was neither personally nor officially tainted with the dishonor of having incited them; and so of the gentleman from the fifth district, [Mr. McCURR,] whose case remained to be disposed of. In that respect (as will presently be seen from the testimony) the cases are so wholly unlike, as upon that ground alone to justify a different finding, particularly when the argument as to the augmented political majority for the gentleman from the seventh district, as evidenced by the result of the subsequent judicial election, will be seen to absolutely disapply in the present case.

The distinction is no less radical and conclusive in several additional and concurring respects, which will be briefly glanced at in this connection, in order to be resumed and verified from the record (if necessary) in appropriate subsequent connections. Thus, it was argued, in practical avoidance of the overawing which was complained of in the seventh district, that not only had a large majority of its votes been polled in the congressional election, but that the entire increase in the subsequent judicial election would have been insufficient if added to the congressional vote of the contestant to have overcome the majority of the sitting member. Now, sir, while all this was at least as fairly arguable in that case as any argument could be, predicated upon the proverbially small vote of a judicial election in comparison with a political election, it will of course suffice to demonstrate that the exact reverse was true in the case under consideration, in order to suggest and enforce a finding the exact reverse. I refer, therefore, thus early to the record (page 5) to demonstrate that while the presidential vote in my district was 20,760, the congressional vote was but 9,370, "less than a quorum," according to our language here. Of this minority the congressional vote of the sitting member was 4,243, being a plurality over the contestant of 1,336; while it will be seen by the official certificate, which I hold in my hand, that even the increase in the judicial vote over the congressional vote not only overcame that plurality, but that the party whose candidate the contestant was in the congressional canvass outvoted the congressional party of the sitting member 4,130 votes in the subsequent judicial election. It will not, of course, impair the point thus established against the sitting member, when it comes to be listened to from the record, that between the period of these two elections he abandoned his congressional party and sought to become a leader in my party! That portion of the testimony may indeed additionally suggest the every-day fairness of remitting him to the ordeal of a new election upon our now common platform, instead of countenancing him in the betrayals and assumptions which constitute alone the aggregate of his pretensions here.

The cases will be found wholly dissimilar in another important aspect, which is this: it cannot be argued in this case, as it was in the one from the seventh district, that as there was no threatening or overawing previous to the election the testimony should expend itself in the exclusion of the particular poll at which it establishes a special violence. In this case it will be seen from the testimony that the overawing was commenced and prosecuted systematically for weeks preceding the election, that it was at the incitation and with the judicial and military coöperation of the sitting member himself, and that it but naturally culminated on the day of the election. Of course not only every lawyer, but every intelligent gentleman, who will do himself the justice to reflect upon the difference which will be thus established from the testimony as to the modes of intimidation which were resorted to in the cases respectively, will not only concur in the distinction I have suggested, but when it shall be shown from the testimony in this case that the overawing was collusive and systematic, collusively inaugurated, and publicly and overawingly encouraged by the sitting member as a judicial officer, and thus coöperatively prosecuted throughout the district for weeks before the election, and "on the day of the election, with menace and violence, such as would deter a man of ordinary firmness from approaching the polls and tendering his vote;" when it shall be demonstrated from the testimony that the language thus quoted from the speech of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is as applicable to the district at large in this case as it was to particular precincts, in the case he was then arguing, I shall expect his in-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 166.

genuous concession that upon his own theory and in his own subsequent language, "that election is void."

There are still other points of difference in the two cases, prominent among which will be noticed the inability of the sitting member to get into our record any such testimony as was dwelt upon in the previous records in regard either to the character of my witnesses or my supporters. No raising of secession flags, no tearing down of the national banner, no holding back at any time from duty in the loyal militia, but the exact reverse, if necessary, will be demonstrated in respect to my outlawed "sympathizers" as we pass along. Invoking, therefore, a continuance of the courteous attention with which I have been thus far honored, I will proceed to so address myself to the record in this case that unless it be the understanding and determination of the dominant party that such and similar outrages upon the freedom of discussion and the ballot shall be systematically excused or encouraged, such action may, at least, be proposed as to elicit the official facts in the case, should my own recital of them be in any sense impugned in the reply of the sitting member. This, I take leave to add, will be left entirely to gentlemen of the dominant party; to those, if any, who may feel that there is a distinction in the cases; since with them alone exists the power to redress the wrongs which I will proceed to make manifest. If they propose no further or additional consideration of the case my more immediate friends and myself must fain be content to carry our appeal to the country as best we may. It is but added, therefore, in this connection that if I shall be able to demonstrate from the record that upon every principle of past adjudications this case enforces and demands a different judgment to that which the majority have rendered in the previous case from my State, I shall fain rely upon gentlemen of that majority to so shape the final issue as to elicit a direct vote upon the merits of the controversy which has so long detained me here.

I have prepared for this purpose what has seemed to my friends upon this side of the House an appropriate resolution; but as they concur with me, not merely that the result of the controversy depends upon the distinctions to which I have adverted, but that courtesy as well as justice demands that such a resolution, if presented at all, should proceed from such gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House as I may be able successfully to impress with those distinctions, I will simply read it for information or reflection, and proceed without further preliminary to the record of the case:

Resolved, That the election under which Austin A. King occupies a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixth congressional district of Missouri was not "free and equal," in the sense ordained by the constitution of that State, and that the said seat is hereby declared vacant.

Without in any sense distrusting the ultimate action of the House upon such a resolution, it is deemed sufficient to premise that the constitutional guarantee therein alluded to was not only successfully held up in my State as a counterpoise and an answer to all the specious arguments in favor of the rebellion then and yet pending, but I may add, without immodesty, as a citizen whose residence and associations for the last six and thirty years entitle him somewhat to speak the sentiments of its staid and considerate men, that you have it more in your power to strengthen the true Union sentiment of the State by giving practical and public effect to that guarantee, in a case like the present, which admits of no dispute, than you could do by either penalties or arms.

Coming, therefore, without further preliminary to the consideration of the record in the case, from which it will be seen that every exception which was taken to the previous one is either met or avoided in the present one, it is of course conceded that the great practical issue is, whether the "judicial and military terrorism," which is charged by the contestant, was of a character which so overawed a portion of the qualified voters of the district as to have brought about the return of the sitting member in contravention of that guarantee. Unless, therefore, the testimony in the case shall bring it fairly within the exception recited by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Urson,] when reading from the rulings of the committee in the case of Wing and Bidle—unless, in the language of that report, "corruption shall appear sufficient to destroy all confidence in the purity and fairness of the whole proceeding"—I shall of course submit to a verdict against me of having raised here a "false clamor," instead of having presented a true indictment against the sitting member.

As already stated, it appears from the deposition of the secretary of State, at page 5 of the printed testimony now upon your tables, that the aggregate vote of the district at the presidential election in 1860 was 20,760, while the aggregate vote for Congress in 1862 (the election here in controversy) was but 9,370. Of this minority vote of the district, the sitting member received 4,243, the contestant 2,857, and two other candidates the remainder. It further appears from the testimony that the sitting member became a candidate for Congress shortly after he had received the appointments of circuit judge and aid-de-camp to the commander-in-chief of the State militia; and that he gave out his purpose to hold on to his judicial station, as he did to his military position, until the regular recurrence of the judicial election, which was a year after the congressional election. The testimony of the colonel of his own county regiment is to the effect, in this connection, that in consequence of the positions he thus held in the judicial and military departments of the State government, his opinions were "but naturally listened to with consideration and deference in respect to the military operations of the times"—"that all the principal orders which were issued from his headquarters, in respect to subsistence, assessments, impressments, enrollments," &c., had, at least, his ready and entire concurrence—and the record will be seen to be such throughout as to identify him inextricably with the overawings of the State military authorities, in this and other portions of the district.

When to this it is added, as will presently be seen, that the colonel already alluded to has felt constrained to acknowledge, in response to the direct interrogation of the contestant, (page 8,) that the whole course of the public speaking and less public conversations of this candidate, aid-de-camp, and judge was apparently calculated and designed to overawe that class of voters who had been enrolled under military order No. 24, and constrain them to either change their votes against their free will or to abstain from voting at all, and when it will be seen by those whose patience and attention I may be able to retain that such testimony abounds throughout the record in respect to that and other counties of the district, the inquiry which will doubtless suggest itself to every ingenuous juror in this case will be, whether there was anything in the fact of such a military enrollment which could be legitimately held to interfere with the voting prerogative of the citizens. So much of that order, therefore, as is deemed pertinent to this inquiry is here reproduced, as follows:

[General Orders, No. 24.]

HEADQUARTERS MISSOURI STATE MILITIA,
ST. LOUIS, August 4, 1862.

General Orders No. 23, from these headquarters, dated July 28, 1862, is hereby revoked.

All the loyal men of Missouri, subject to military duty, will be organized into companies, regiments, and brigades, as ordered in General Orders, No. 19, from these headquarters, dated July 23, 1862.

All disloyal men, and those who have at any time sympathized with the rebellion, are required to report at the nearest military post, or other enrolling station; be enrolled, surrender their arms, and return to their homes or other ordinary places of business, where they will be permitted to remain so long as they shall continue quietly attending to their ordinary and legitimate business, and in no way give aid or comfort to the enemy. Disloyal persons, or sympathizers with the rebellion, will not be organized into companies, nor required nor permitted to do duty in the Missouri militia.

It will be seen by reference to the testimony on page 32 that the practical effect of this and subsequent orders was that the men thus enrolled in the military service were to be mounted, armed, and subsisted (where necessary) by those who were to be enrolled on what came to be denominated "the sympathizing list"—a mere military arrangement, which it is not further the province of the House to here consider than as it may be shown from the testimony that the sitting member took advantage of—to judicially misimpress and overawe that class of the people in respect to their right to vote. The point, therefore, to be kept mainly in mind is, that the absolute duty of enrollment under this general military order was explicit and imperative—so unequivocally so, not only according to the terms of the order itself, but by the official testimony, as to leave neither the enrolling officers nor the people any discretion whatever in regard to those who, had at any time sympathized with the rebellion, however, then "protesting (as they have since abundantly proven) their loyalty to the Government of the United States." Upon this cardinal point the testimony of one of the enrolling officers, which I will read from page 19, is as follows:

"I have resided in the town of Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri, for about eighteen years last past, and am a judge of the county court of said county. I have been provost marshal of said county since the 12th day of August, 1862, and yet am. In connection with that office, I had the duty assigned me by Lieutenant Colonel Swearingen of enrolling the citizens of said county on what was called the 'loyal and disloyal lists.' On the loyal list it was my duty to enroll for military purposes all persons between eighteen and forty-five years of age, (being male citizens,) and on the (so called) disloyal list it was my duty to enroll all male citizens, of whatever age, who had at any time sympathized with the southern rebellion. I had no discretion in the matter, nor had the people."

I respectfully desire that this sentence be borne in mind, should the contestant here (as in the committee-room) attempt to draw a distinction between voluntary and involuntary enrollments upon this sympathizing list. Having fully analyzed his testimony in that respect, I shall be ready (if necessary in replying to him) to demonstrate that if he did upon some occasions attempt such a distinction, as it may be argued from his testimony that he did, the distinction could only have been conceived and presented in aid of the same judicial fraud and overreaching which constitutes the principal issue between us. I respectfully suggest, moreover, that if he will have the fairness to read all that his witnesses say, (as I shall read all that mine say,) it will be seen that not one of them was present during all of either of the speeches to which my witnesses testify, and that hence there is no discrepancy in the testimony. To this I but add, in this connection, that in the testimony which I shall read in conclusion, as to the judicial construction which he put upon the right of these same sympathizers to take the oath and vote in the judicial election, the sitting member will be made a witness against himself in respect to his judicial misteachings (and consequent overawings) in the congressional election.

In respect to the enrollment, the witness continues as follows:

"The enrollment for the county was made, therefore, as directed in General Schofield's Order No. 24, and the explanatory circular of Brigadier General Hall, dated September 26, 1862. The said disloyal enrollment was not completed before the election which was held on the 4th of November last, nor have I yet completed it. The number enrolled up to the time of election was about four hundred. During the period of said enrollment Brigadier General Hall was commandant of the military district in which this county was situated, and hence I acted upon his orders in connection with those of General Schofield."

With regard to the speeches of the sitting member, of which I will presently produce a perfect cloud of testimony, this witness deposes as follows:

"I heard a portion of the speech which was made by Austin A. King in the court-house in the town of Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri, on the 13th day of October, 1862. He was very distinct in his expressions, and in conveying the impression that if any man who was enrolled on the disloyal list—so he phrased it—presumed to vote in the election then approaching, and did so, he would perjure himself, and be indicted by the grand jury. He brought this over several times, varying the phraseology, but still holding out the menace or fear of indictment to those who were enrolled disloyal and attempted to vote. After the making of this speech I was conversed with by several persons, at different times, as to the right of sympathizers to vote. A number agreed with Governor King, and one of the militia, belonging to a company stationed at Halesville, was very earnest in his declaration that King had stated the law correctly, and that such sympathizers ought not to be allowed to vote, and would not be allowed to vote. In the enrollment of the county, as a general rule, every man whose sympathies were regarded as being with the South was entered on the so-called disloyal list, although protesting his loyalty to the Government of the United States."

In other words, the enrolling officers followed out the imperative direction of the Order No. 24, and would not permit those who had at any time sympathized with the rebellion to serve in the State militia, although protesting that they were then loyal to the Government of the United States. Yes, sir; then loyal—then willing and anxious to be enrolled on the fighting list, instead of the subsistence list—even then willing to take the soldier's oath of loyalty, as well as subsequently, at the election, to take the voter's oath of loyalty, but overawed to feel that the only way to avoid the menaced indictments of their judge was not to vote against that judge for Congress.

While upon this point I will come presently to even stronger depositions than the one I have just recited—showing at once the judicial overreaching and the judicial insincerity by which the sitting member dishonorably terrorized himself into the seat he has so long contrived to occupy among you. I will for the present resume my classification by counties, to the end that each member of the House can decide for himself, county by county, as I pass along, upon the validity of such an election as the one here in controversy.

Going back, therefore, to the county of the sitting member, it will be seen from the deposition, at page 17, that in a public speech which he delivered at Russellville, shortly before the election, he stood forth in the judicial and military panoply with which he was invested to exasperate the soldiery to the outlawry of his competitor for Congress, whom he denounced as being "as grand a traitor as Jeff. Davis ever was," and "declared, in continuation, that any man who voted for him ought to be placed upon the disloyal list!" The witness thus continues:

"At that point of his speech, Lieutenant (or Adjutant) Henry, who was upon the stand with him, in full uniform, and who was also recognized as an assisting enrolling officer, rose from his seat, waved his hat above his head and proclaimed aloud, 'Yes, Governor, and I will place or see to it that every man is placed upon the disloyal list who does vote for him,' or words to that effect. I left the speaking shortly after this, and from conversations with and among the people directly afterwards, became satisfied that such a speech from the judge of the court, accompanied by such a threat from a high military officer, would operate very much to the disadvantage of Birch in the election, and it did so. Some who I knew had intended to vote for Birch, before listening to the speech and the menace, changed their purpose and finally voted for King or Samuel, under the fear with which they acknowledged that the speech of the judge and the threat of the adjutant had inspired them, with respect to their personal safety and that of their property if they voted for Birch, whilst others, as I understood and believe, did not vote at all. Having been at the election in my township, (which is one of the heaviest in the county,) and mingled as usual in conversation with my acquaintances, I have no hesitation in expressing the opinion that Birch would have gotten at least twice as many votes as he did if it had not been that the people were intimidated and overawed by the speeches of the judge and the threats of the military, who were understood to be his partisans; and I concur in the opinion I have heard repeatedly expressed by well-informed citizens in different parts of the county, that if the election had been an untrammelled or a free one Birch would have carried the county."

Throwing out in this connection (as I have already intimated) the consideration of another deposition concurring with the foregoing, it appears from still another deposition, (at page 40,) that in this county, as in others, its military organization and police was in the hands of the partisans of the sitting member; and it is expressly testified to by the colonel of his home regiment that "it was understood and expected that such and similar means (as those above recited) would avail to bring about such an ultimate influence, by intimidation, as to prevent Birch from carrying the county." Observe, gentlemen, I am quoting the reluctant admissions of a witness who had been the neighbor, the friend, and the partisan supporter of the sitting member; and I respectfully demand of you, upon your oaths and your honor, as judges and as Representatives, whether a certificate of election thus conspired for and thus ignobly won shall longer entitle its possessor to claim among you the immunities of an equal or a peer? Am I replied to that this is but a single county, and that the majority of 498 which he there obtained by means so lawless and dishonoring should alone be deducted from the poll of the sitting member? I answer, not merely that the same will presently be proven in respect to other counties, but that by reference to the testimony of the same regimental commander it will appear that a similar reliance upon the workings and effect of military intimidation was entertained in respect to the district at large, and that the sitting member received as many votes as he had at any time calculated upon, and more than it had been thought would suffice to elect him! That I may avoid all risk of injustice in respect to a point so delicate and conclusive, the testimony of the witness in this regard will be here recited at length, from page 8, as follows:

"I was colonel of the enrolled Missouri militia of Ray county during the canvass for Congress in the year 1862. Judge Austin A. King was aid-de-camp to the Governor and an assistant inspector general, and as such, in connection with his position as a lawyer and a judge, was but naturally listened to with consideration and deference in respect to the military operations of the times. My recollection is that all the principal orders that were issued from my headquarters, in respect to subsistence, assessments, enrollments, &c., had at least his ready and entire concurrence; and being here expressly interrogated as to whether his whole course of public speaking, and his less public suggestions and conversations, in respect to the right of voting in my county, was not apparently designed and calculated to overawe that class of voters who had been enrolled, under Order No. 24, on what was called the sympathizing or disloyal list, and either constrain them to ultimately change their votes against their free will or to abstain from voting at all, a regard for truth admits of no other reply than that it was. I heard Lieutenant Henry, who was employed as an assistant enrolling officer, and who was known and recognized as a supporter of Governor King, (as I then was,) declare openly and repeatedly that any man who voted for Birch ought to be enrolled on the disloyal list, and otherwise dealt with as a disloyalist; and it cannot be denied that it was understood and expected that such and similar means would avail to bring about such an ultimate influence over the people, as, by intimidation, to prevent Birch from carrying the county, which his friends at one time expected he would do.

"A similar reliance was also entertained in regard to the district at large. From expressions I heard from Governor King, from time to time during the canvass, and particularly from a remark which he made when the returns were received, (in which he claimed that all the loyal men of the district voted for him,) I am confident he received as many votes as he had at any time calculated upon, and even more than it had been thought would suffice to elect him. It is deemed but just to myself, and to both the parties herein concerned, to add that from the political course of the Governor since the election, I am as much opposed to him now as I was once in favor of him; and that such, within my own knowledge, is the feeling of a large proportion of those who most prominently and earnestly supported him in the canvass of 1862, and whom he then affected to regard as the only true Union men of the district. I need scarcely disclaim the exercise of any undue favoritism (as I then looked at it) in the election referred to, or withhold the opinion that it was the apprehension of military punishment instead of any real danger, which had the effect of overawing such portion of the supporters of Judge Birch as ultimately gave way before it."

So much for the county of Ray, the home of the sitting member, to which I have given precedence in the arrangement and classification of my testimony simply because it was his home, and as such would be but naturally looked to as denoting the plan of the campaign, and furnishing "the key-note" upon which his partisans were to act throughout the district.

Passing next to the county of Carroll, over which he also continued to preside as judge, and where the opinion is likewise intelligently expressed in the testimony that a majority of the electors were in favor of the contestant for Congress, as they had been at the previous election between the same candidates for the convention, the testimony will at once dishonorably and vitiatingly disclose why it was that the contestant received but seven votes for the seat here in contest, leaving to the sitting member a majority of 625 of those which were permitted to be polled! It will be seen upon page 11 that when I was about half through the speech I was addressing to the electors assembled in the court-house, I was peremptorily forbidden to proceed further in it by the military commandant of the post, who was a partisan supporter of the sitting member, and by whom I was also forbidden to even attempt to fill my three remaining appointments in other portions of that county. (Submitting parenthetically to the representative honor and manhood I am privileged to address, whether there is even one of you who would consent to the absolute ignominy of occupying a seat here upon a certicate which had been won in overawing repression of the elective good will of his people in conspiringly preventing his competitor from assigning before them the reasons why he would support or oppose particular public measures just as you all do here, the additional outrages under consideration will be resumed from the record.) On the day following a public meeting seems to have been held, the leading members in the organization of which are proven to have been then the military partisans of the sitting member, and to have included the sheriff of his court and the subsequent foreman of his grand jury! At this improvised meeting, it will suffice to recapitulate from the proceedings (pages 11 and 12) that, after specifically indorsing the congressional candidacy of the sitting member, and bestowing a correspondent approval upon the previous day's suppression of all further discussion of the issues involved in the canvass, they no less lawlessly announce their edict against a free election in these words:

"Resolved, That we recognize in said Birch a decided secessionist, and shall for all purposes treat his supporters as secessionists."

For a purpose which will presently become apparent it is proper to recite in this place, from page 11 of the printed testimony, the names of the officers and "spokesman" of this meeting, as follows: chairman, William Sumard; secretary and speech-maker, George Pattison; committee-men, Samuel Winfrey, Samuel Turner, O. J. Kirby, James Minnis, Levi Shin, James O'Gorman, and David Utt. To the basely slanderous outlawry thus publicly proclaimed against my friends and myself, as well as to the kindred fulminations in the public speech of the sitting member in his own county, it is my good fortune to refer, in refutation, to the entire record of our controversy here, including, of course, my cross-examination of his own witnesses. From that record it will be seen that the imputations upon my loyalty have no other support than the mere calumnious assertions of the sitting member and his then military partisans, and these will of course no more be confounded with the testimony here than they were in the committee-room. It will hence, of course, suffice to demonstrate that such proceedings, carried forward under auspices which denoted at least a judicial immunity, had but the natural effect they were designed to have, as testified to by the commandant of his own county regiment not only in regard to that county but to the district at large. To assume nothing, therefore, as to the number who were influenced by such a process of intimidation to change their votes, it will be seen by a comparison of the congressional with the presidential vote of this county, that there was a falling off of nearly one half, and that in a community where less than two years previously I had been honored with a majority of 80 votes against him, when he was not an aid-de-camp or a judge. He did not scruple to so prostitute these high official stations, as by the inspiration of an official terrorism, to essay the distinction which he here enjoys, and which he had been premonished would be differently bestowed by confidence and good will! Lest, however, the extremity to which he may feel himself reduced should suggest the reading of the unsupported calumnies of this mob assemblage of his military partisans at Carrollton as a justification for the lawlessness with which they foreshadowed the terrorism they inspired, it is deemed at least pardonable to recite from the record the testimony of the senators and representatives who heard my current speeches in the adjoining counties, which is as follows:

"We heard the speeches delivered by Judge Birch in our respective counties during his canvass for Congress. Some of us so far concurred in his sentiments and opinions as to support his election, while others of us supported one of the other candidates. We concur, however, that there was nothing in his utterances or sentiments which we regarded either as disloyal to the Government of the United States, or as transcending the legitimate range of discussion involved in the canvass; he was then prosecuting for a seat in Congress."

This joint deposition having been taken at the capital of Missouri during the session of its Legislature, and including, among others, the names of the senators and representatives from the county of the sitting member—and there being no testimony in the record that the contestant spoke otherwise in his canvass than the sitting member has voted here—will it not obtrude itself upon the practical understanding of every member of the House that these exasperating denunciations against me were but the collusive pretexts for the systematic outlary you are here called upon to repair and redress? It was not in this case, as was suggested in extenuation of an alleged impulsive patriotism in the previous cases, but it was the calculating and systematic strategy by which one portion of the people were to be appalled and practically divested of their franchise, to the end that the candidate in whose interest it was conceived and executed might thereby obtain the certificate of a Congressman while wholly unable to obtain the vote of a Congressman. When it is borne in mind that to be thus banned by the military and judiciary as a "traitor" or "a secessionist" was equivalent in that district to such oppressions and perils that even the bravest might hesitate to incur such enmities as foreshadowed the revenges of military assessments, imprisonments, and assassinations, could it be possible to have even devised a more effective system of coöperative and all-embracing intimidation, or one more emphatically to be reprehended and redressed, than that which is developed in the record before you?

That the meeting at which these outrages were so distinctly and unredressively foreshadowed was essentially a partisan and a military one, satisfactory testimony will be found in the deposition of a witness who resided in another county, and who was hence not afraid to testify, for the reason which I have satisfactorily established before the committee for having failed to procure direct or resident testimony as to this and several other counties of the district. At pages 15 and 16, Williamson P. Gibson testifies, as follows:

"From the nature of my business I have been a good deal in and through the counties of Ray, Carroll and Charlton during the past year; have sojourned considerably in Carrollton and its vicinity, and have become acquainted, personally and otherwise, with the sentiments, opinions, and callings of a number of the leading men in different parts of the county.

"Question by contestant. Do you know the public positions which were held, respectively, by William Sinar, George Pattison, Samuel Winfrey, Samuel Turner, O. J. Kirby, James Minnis, Levi Shain, James O'Gorman, and Lieutenant David Utt, on or about the 1st of October, 1863?

"Answer. Having been in Carrollton shortly after a public meeting had been held, in which Judge Birch and his friends were denounced as secessionists, my recollection is that all these names were mentioned as having been leaders in that meeting, as friends of Governor King, and that in some manner or other they all belonged to the military police of the county, and that therefore the resolutions and declarations of the meeting would be carried out. I am not personally acquainted with all the gentlemen, but during subsequent visits to Carrollton I have learned that Sinar, Winfrey, and Shain constituted the board of military assessors; that Minnis was the provost marshal for the county; that Kirby was the adjutant of the regiment of enrolled Missouri militia for that county; that Utt was lieutenant in one of the companies, (not Stanley's); that O'Gorman was a private in Stanley's company; that Turner was (as he yet is) the sheriff of the county; that Pattison was a candidate for the Legislature, and was elected. I am satisfied that the information I have received upon this subject is correct, and that the proceedings of that meeting had the crowning effect they were intended to have, in deterring the friends of Judge Birch from making any further effort in his behalf, and of keeping them from the polls on the day of the election.

"Question by contestant. Have you heard such an expression of opinion among the people of that county as to have yourself formed an opinion as to what would have been the relative strength of King and Birch had the election been a free and fair one?

"Answer. All with whom I have conversed upon the subject, including one of the prominent friends of Governor King, expressed the opinion unhesitatingly that the political position of Judge Birch was more acceptable to a majority of the people of the county than King's was; and that he would have received that majority had the people felt that they were free to vote for him, without danger at the polls or otherwise. Such also were the opinions I have heard similarly expressed in passing, on the same business, through the adjoining counties of Ray and Charlton, and I concur in those opinions. In the election canvass, Judge Birch seemed everywhere to have the countenance of the constitutional or pro-slavery party, while the support of Governor King seemed to proceed mainly from what was termed the radical party, though he and they seem to have become radically antagonistic within the last few months.

"Question by contestant. Have you heard Captain Stanley converse recently in respect to the part he took against Birch, when in command of Carroll, as published in connection with the proceedings of the meeting you have alluded to? If so please state the substance of his conversation.

"Answer. I have heard him speak of the part he thus took against Birch, and say he would not do so if the thing was to do over again. This was not long since, and was spoken by Stanley in connection with the course King was pursuing toward the radicals, who claim that he has deserted them after they had elected him. Stanley does not command at Carrollton now, but does at Utica."

It having been previously established that the persons thus identified were, respectively, the chairman, secretary, and committee-men of the meeting under consideration; nothing need of course be added in respect to the object it was intended to accomplish, and which it did accomplish. But when in connection with this it is taken into consideration (page 40) that Pattison, who was the spokesman and secretary of this unlawful and indictable mob, was appointed a year afterwards by the sitting member to be the spokesman or foreman of a grand jury, which had been summoned by the sheriff of his court (another committee-man) as the last one which was permitted by the limitation law of our State to even investigate this widespread defiance of our election laws; and when it is seen by the deposition of the prosecuting attorney, at page 39, that the judge was everywhere significantly silent in his charges to the grand juries in respect to these audacious outrages upon the freedom of election, and that consequently no indictment was anywhere found against any of his supporters and sympathizers—when all this is seen and reflected upon, the duty of redressing this all-embracing and demoralizing public crime in the only manner which pertains to the national dignity and authority would seem too imperative for either party parley or additional elaboration.

Passing, therefore, to the county of Saline, it will be seen by a comparison of the dates which are mentioned by the witnesses, respectively, that the extended publication which was ordered to be made of these military proceedings in Carroll had been "just in time" to beget a corresponding avowal of violence toward the supporters of the contestant in other counties, of which the following depositions may be permitted to speak for themselves.

William H. Lightfoot testifies as follows:

"About the middle of October last Lieutenant Colonel William A. Wilson, in command of the militia of Saline county, put up at the 'Sedalia House,' of which I am clerk. The conversation turning upon the subject of the congressional election then pending in the sixth congressional district, Colonel Wilson publicly declared his intention to arrest any man in Saline county who voted for Judge Birch, as a traitor, and punish him as a traitor."

And Eli L. Beeding, as follows:

"I am a merchant, and reside at Cambridge, Saline county, Missouri, and have resided in that place and vicinity for the last nineteen years. On the day of the election I was at Marshall, (the county seat,) and went to the polls, with five other gentlemen, to vote. A ticket had just been read out for Mr. Samuel and the State and county officers, when I presented myself and remarked that I would vote the same ticket, substituting only the name of Judge Birch for Congress instead of Mr. Samuel. Upon saying this, one of the judges of the election replied to me that if I voted for Birch I would be put in prison before sundown. I asked if that was the fact; and upon his replying very earnestly in the affirmative, I told him I would, under those circumstances, vote for Mr. Samuel; and myself and the five other gentlemen cast our votes accordingly. Judge Birch seemed to be the accepted candidate of the constitutional or pro-slavery party of my county, and I entertain no doubt whatever that, in a free election, he would have greatly outvoted Governor King."

It is deemed but necessary to add in this connection, that the congressional vote in this county was 543, (of which I received but 52,) against a presidential vote of 1,964 votes; of which more anon.

I will direct your attention in the next place to the county of Caldwell where, also, the sitting member continued to be "the judge;" and here, too, it will be quite sufficient to permit the deposition of a single unimpeached and intelligent witness to speak for itself. It reads as follows:

"I reside at Kingston, Caldwell county, Missouri; am a physician and surgeon by profession, and the proprietor of a drug store in Kingston. I have had ample means of understanding the public sentiment of my county in respect to the recent congressional election between James H. Birch and Austin A. King, and repeat the opinion I have so often and undoubtingly expressed that but for the judicial and military terrorism which was brought to bear against him, Judge Birch would have received a majority of the votes of that county. I was present and listened to the speech of Austin A. King, one of the candidates for Congress, and then and yet the judge of this judicial circuit. That speech was delivered on the first day of the October term of the Caldwell circuit court, being, as I believe, the first Monday in October last. At many points in that speech he used language of great severity in reference to that class of citizens whom he suspected of being unfavorable to his election, denouncing them as rebels, disloyalists, and sympathizers, who had forfeited their right to vote, and would not be permitted to vote. It was distinctly stated in his speech that those who had been or should be enrolled on the disloyal list, or as southern sympathizers, would not be allowed to vote; or if they should attempt it, and even succeed in doing so by having to take the preliminary oath, they would perjure themselves, and would be liable to indictment by the grand jury of the county, and punished accordingly. These and similar statements and denunciations were made in the presence of the enrolled militia then stationed at Kingston, and were followed by the most unequivocal menaces on the part of said militia toward those citizens, whom in many instances they very unjustly charged with being disaffected or disloyal. Persons in many instances who had always been orderly and law-abiding citizens, if suspected to be friendly to the election of Judge Birch, were thus insulted, intimidated, and oppressed by said militia or with their countenance in divers ways. The sole object seemed to be to deter them from coming to the polls to cast their votes agreeably to their wishes; and they were so deterred almost in a body. I was myself of the number; and cannot be mistaken in what I am stating. I had previously for simply extending to Judge Birch the courtesies of a gentleman and former acquaintance been most rudely insulted and mistreated by the military friends of Governor King while simply attending in the most quiet and orderly manner to the business of my profession.

"For many weeks pending the election contest it was publicly stated by the friends of Judge King, and by the military who were in his interest, that Judge Birch was a rebel, and that all of his friends were such, and could not live in the county, and would be banished the county or put out of the way; and since the election, some of the best citizens have left the county, or are preparing to do so at great sacrifices, in order to avoid, if possible, the fearful consequences which they have been made to apprehend. Judge Birch had himself narrowly escaped secret assassination at the hands of two of the military friends of King, (as was witnessed and believed by myself and two other gentlemen who happened to be riding with him away from Kingston, after he had spoken in reply to King, at the October court,) and so notorious and so desperate was the open partisanship of this class of the friends of Judge King, that scarce any man felt himself safe in being even suspected to be the friend or supporter of Judge Birch. A reign of unparalleled terror was thus inaugurated and kept up until after the election was over, resulting as already stated; every feasible means having been apparently resorted to by Judge King and his friends to frighten, harass, and intimidate every citizen who was even suspected of being opposed to his election to Congress.

"As already stated, it was by the inspiration of an almost universal terror throughout the county that the friends of Birch were either silenced and kept from the polls or, in many instances, overawed and constrained to vote for King. Instances of the latter description came under my personal observation on the day of election at Kingston, and still other instances have been reported to me by the parties themselves. Others, friends of Birch, less intimidated than the great body of them had been who stayed at home, came to Kingston to vote for him, but relinquished the idea and returned home, after hearing and seeing the condition of things by which they were overshadowed and deterred. Men with but little property and large families were made to fear that it would be pressed or taken from them by the military if they voted for Birch, and men of larger means that they would be additionally assessed; and all this, it was argued, would be but naturally upheld by King, as the continuing judge. I may safely add to this, (such had been the conduct and such the denunciations of a portion of the militia,) that the additional fear of assassination, conspiring with the fear of indictments, rendered the election in my county the most 'quiet and orderly' I ever witnessed, but it was emphatically the quiet of despotism upon the side which had all the arms of the county in their hands, and of submission upon the side which had been wholly disarmed, and who consequently felt themselves at the feet of their intolerant oppressors, who everywhere denounced and prevented either a fair or a full election. If I have, in hastily throwing together the foregoing statements, spoken too warmly, it is because the outrages to which I have adverted are yet fresh in my memory, and that of hundreds of my countrymen, who were proscribed and overawed as I have attempted to describe. And the only regret for which I feel myself responsible is, that my pen is inadequate to more fully describe the condition to which we were reduced. It will, perhaps, suffice to add that it was such, in all its concurring circumstances and surroundings, that our candidate for Congress received but thirty-two votes in the county, one or two of which (alone) were cast at the county seat; and that, as already stated, he was, in our estimation, the preference and the choice of a majority of the legal voters of the county."

Having thus grouped together the testimony which has specific relation to four out of the ten counties of the district, it is deemed appropriate to the simplification of the issue to draw attention at this point to the fact that by the rejection of the poll of these counties alone, it would leave the contestant with a majority of 214 votes in the remaining counties of the district—the vote of those remaining counties not thus unquestionably invalidated being officially certified as follows:

	Birch.	King.
Charlton.....	277	330
Clay.....	592	139
Clinton.....	453	273
Jackson.....	128	354
La Fayette.....	14	450
Platte.....	877	583
Totals.....	2,343	2,199

Such being the aggregate footings of the election, and such, of course, sufficiently suggesting, at least, its recomittal to the people, such additional testimony as I may be permitted to throw together by the courtesy of the House will be with a view of additionally demonstrating that the judicial and military overawing which is charged upon the sitting member and his partisans was not only collusive and systematic, but operated to the practical exclusion of indefinite thousands whose only crime consisted in preferring that the contestant, instead of the sitting member, should represent them in this national forum. As this, however, furnishes but an additional or a cumulative reason why such an election should at least be stamped as a nullity, I of course cast myself upon the courtesy of the House, in the hope that I may be patiently listened to for that purpose while reading from a few pages more. They will have relation mainly to my own county, where the sitting member was also "the judge," and where my majority was cut down to 193 instead of "at least 400," as it will presently be listened to—it probably would have been had it not been for the "judicial and military terrorism" which I have charged upon the sitting member, and which is additionally disclosed in the following testimony.

At page 20 John W. Moreland corroborates the testimony of Judge Vignini, which I read half an hour or more ago, as follows:

"I am a resident of Clinton county, Missouri; am the representative elect of this county to the next General Assembly of the State; joined the military service in company of three years' United States volunteers in November, 1861, and was honorably discharged on the 10th of August last, on account of physical disability. I was present at the opening of the October circuit court for the county of Clinton, and heard Austin A. King, a candidate for Congress, and being at the time, as he yet is, the circuit judge for this judicial circuit, make a speech as a candidate aforesaid. Among other things, he declared that the rebels had no rights which any honest man ought to respect; that the men who had enrolled on the disloyal list, as he phrased it, ought not and would not be permitted to vote; and that if they did vote they would be guilty of perjury and would be indicted. The whole tenor of his speech was calculated to inflame the militia then in camp and under arms, and to incite them to interfere at the elections and prevent men from voting. I subsequently heard leading officers and members of the militia declare that no man enrolled as a sympathizer should vote. The impression which he (King) seemed anxious to make upon the people was, that no sympathizer would be permitted to vote, or, if he was permitted to vote, he would be indicted for perjury, under his instructions to the grand jury; and this was believed by a great many."

On the same page and the following one James D. Vanhook testifies as follows:

"I am a physician and surgeon, and reside in the town of Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri. I heard the electioneering speech of Austin A. King at the October term, 1862, of the circuit court of said county. His views in relation to the settlement of our present difficulties were of a radical character, being opposed to all compromise until the rebels laid down their arms; while those of Judge Birch (whose speech I also heard) were in favor of an adjustment on the basis of the Crittenden compromise, or its equivalent. In other respects the spirit and tenor of King's speech was calculated to exasperate and excite the militia of the county, who were generally favorable to his election, against the men who were styled southern sympathizers, and who had been enrolled by military authority on what was called the disloyal list, (and who were understood to be favorable to the election of Judge Birch,) and to induce them to so interpose their bayonets at the polls or elsewhere as to prevent such sympathizers from voting. He stated in his speech distinctly that southern sympathizers had no right to vote, and that if they did vote they would lay themselves liable to be indicted at the next session of the grand jury."

On page 21 Henry Essig testifies as follows:

"I am a physician and surgeon, and reside in the town of Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri, and have resided there for the last twenty-six years. I heard Austin A. King make an electioneering speech at the court-house during the October term, 1862, of the circuit court of Clinton county. He was speaking as a candidate for Congress, and that portion of his speech which related to the present disturbed condition of the country was calculated to deter those persons who were denominated southern sympathizers from voting at the November election, (then approaching,) particularly those who were enrolled on what he (King) denominated the disloyal list. His object seemed to be to incite the militia (who were generally in his favor) to interfere in such a manner as to prevent southern sympathizers from coming to the polls or offering to vote; but seeming to fear that this might not be sufficient to keep them away, he labored to impress it upon the audience that all of that class who did vote would commit perjury, and would be liable to indictment, and that they would be indicted. I cannot, of course, recall his precise expressions, but they were of the purport above stated, and the emphasis, countenance, and gestures with which he accompanied his expressions could leave no doubt upon any one that he designed that this class of voters should be overawed from voting, from the double fear of the militia and the court of which he was judge. Judge Birch (who was one of the competitors of Judge King for Congress) was regarded as a Union man, and was voted for accordingly by Union men, (myself among the number,) while the more just and liberal ground which he took in respect to the manner of restoring the Union gave him the general countenance and support of what were called southern men or southern sympathizers, or, as Judge King called them, disloyalists. He was emphatic in his declarations that rebels had no rights, and hence had no right to vote; and he used the term 'rebel' and 'southern sympathizers' on the disloyal list as synonymous, when inveighing against their right to vote."

On the same and the following page, Columbus Jones testifies as follows:

"I am a farmer, residing about three miles from Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri. It was my misfortune, at the commencement of the present political troubles, to kill a citizen, who was a secessionist, in an affray growing out of a dispute upon questions involved in the present civil war. Judge King was then practicing law, and I employed him to defend me. At our last circuit court (in October last) he took me aside, after he had made his speech as a candidate for Congress, and after calling my attention to the balance I was owing him as his fee, entered into conversation with me about the election. In that conversation he stated to me with great earnestness that a southern sympathizer had no more rights than a slave; that they had no right to vote, and would not be allowed to vote; that they were rebels, and if they did vote they would perjure themselves. He said the militia would be on hand; and it was through them that I understood him to mean that the rebels or sympathizers would not be permitted to vote; but that if any of them did vote they would perjure themselves and be handled for it. I was not in the court-house when he made his speech; but from the whole drift of his conversation to me I was given to understand that it would not be safe for a southern man to attempt to vote, much less to actually vote. After King's speech I heard several militiamen say that they would back him in his views; that a rebel or a sympathizer had no right to vote, and should not vote. The militia from all parts of the county were then encamped at Plattsburg."

On pages 22 and 23, William Morris testifies as follows:

"I reside in the town of Plattsburg, Clinton county, Missouri, and have done so for the last twenty years. I was a candidate for a county judgeship at the recent election, and mingled much with the people, privately and publicly, in all parts of the county. I have no doubt, from all I saw and heard, that a great number of people were deterred from voting in the recent election—enough, had they all voted, to have given Judge Birch at least four hundred majority for Congress in this county. The reasons, in my opinion, why so many staid away from the polls were mainly referable to the declarations of Governor King and the militia, impugning the right of southern sympathizers to vote, and threatening them with the consequences. Quite a number told me they would go forward and offer to vote, but that they did not want to be insulted and refused. I heard the speech of Governor King, (Austin A.), who was a candidate for Congress, at the October term of the Clinton circuit court. The attendance was large, including a number from several of the adjoining counties of the district. His speech was extremely ultra, especially in respect to that class of citizens who were denominated southern sympathizers, who had to be enrolled on what he called the disloyal list. He said such men had no right to vote, and would not be permitted to vote; or that if they were permitted to vote they would commit perjury and be liable to indictment and punishment accordingly, and that all that would be properly seen to. There grew up, in consequence, a general impression that it was not safe for a southern sympathizer to vote, especially for Birch, for whom, it was generally understood, they were inclined to vote; and, as I have already stated, I am satisfied that many staid away from the polls entirely, especially at the Cameron precinct, where I was on the day of the election. On the morning of the election I went into Cameron with John Snow, one of the judges of the election. He remarked, in the course of conversation as we went to town, that so far as he was concerned, no man who sympathized with the South, or ever had done so, could vote at the Cameron polls, of which he was one of the judges. There was a squad of militia in town, understood to be there to 'look after the election;' and, as already stated, it was understood that sympathizers would not be allowed to vote, or that if they did vote they would be liable to indictment. I staid there until about two o'clock, up to which time Judge Birch had received but one vote."

On the same page, George W. Davis testifies as follows:

"I am a farmer, residing in the neighborhood of Miller's Mill, a voting precinct in Clinton county, Missouri, and was at the election which was held at that precinct on the 4th of November last. Only between sixty and seventy votes were polled there at that election. At the previous election, two years before, 221 votes were given there. From my general acquaintance with the people of the township, my opinion is that Governor King received the votes of all who were favorable to his election, while great numbers of those known to be friendly to the election of Judge Birch refrained from going to the polls at all. Having heard the speech that was made by Governor King, at the court-house in Plattsburg, some four weeks before the election, together with what was understood to be the purpose of a portion of the militia, and having also heard many of the people talking on the subject before the election, I am confident that many of the friends of Birch were deterred from coming to the polls, at that precinct, from fear of the consequences (judicial and military) which might result to them from voting for him. A squad of the enrolled militia belonging to the township (all friends of King) were there, with their arms, &c., for what purpose I do not know; but the understanding that they were to be there contributed, among other reasons, to deter great numbers of citizens, as already stated, from going to the election at all."

"Several who voted for Judge Birch yet fear that they are to be indicted for voting, and to be tried before King, as judge; for such was understood to be the menace held forth in his speech already alluded to."

Referring to the official testimony on page 24, where it will be seen that at this precinct the sitting member received 35 votes to my 29, (out of a presidential total of 221,) I read from the testimony which will explain it, as follows:

John R. Black:

"I am a farmer, and reside in the township in Clinton county, Missouri, of which Miller's Mill is the voting place. I was friendly to the election of Judge Birch to Congress, and would have voted for him at the election which was held the 4th of November last; but from what I heard that Judge King had said in his speech at Plattsburg about sympathizers having no right to vote, and that if they did vote they would be liable to indictments for perjury, I did not go to the election at all. This I know was the case in my neighborhood generally, where the people were almost unanimously for Birch, but were afraid to vote for him, and did not vote for him, from fear, as already stated. I think it entirely safe to say that but for the terrorism and apprehensions which were created by the public and private declarations of King, who was judge of the circuit court, and was understood to intend to hold on to that station for nearly a year after the election, and who, it was understood, would instruct the grand jury to find indictments against all 'sympathizers' who voted, Birch would have gotten at least two or three votes to King's one at that voting place."

James P. Arterburn:

"I am a farmer, and reside in the township of which Miller's Mill is the voting place, in Clinton county, Missouri. I live about four miles from the residence of John R. Black, whose deposition has just been read to me by the notary. What he states of himself and his neighborhood is true of myself and neighborhood, every one of whom would have voted for Judge Birch for Congress, but that we were afraid to do so for the reasons stated by Black. Before the speech of Governor King we had all intended to vote for Birch; but after that speech, which I heard, we all concluded it would be unsafe for us to vote, and staid away from the polls accordingly."

That I may be relieved of all necessity to canvass the judicial interpretations thus intimidatingly foreshadowed by the sitting member, whereby entire neighborhoods of my supporters were overawed from the polls in the congressional canvass, I proceed to demonstrate, in the last place, from the testimony of the same unimpeached and intelligent witnesses, that the venerable judge himself had reached an opposite and correct conclusion with respect to the rights and duties of the same class of citizens, after he had deserted the party which elected him to Congress, and when he was seeking to have them beaten in the judicial elections of the following year. Upon this point William Morris testifies as follows:

"Question by contestant. As you have previously given testimony in respect to Governor King's speech when he was a candidate for Congress, (in respect to the qualifications of voters,) please state whether you heard his speech a year afterwards, (a few weeks ago,) when he was addressing the people from the same stand in favor of one of the judicial tickets which was voted for on Monday last; and if so, was his language and his teachings substantially the same, or substantially different?"

"Answer. I heard a portion of both speeches, and never heard two that were more essentially different in respect to the right and duty of the people to give their votes. His Congress speech was of a character (as stated in my previous deposition) to create the impression that it was unsafe for any of the so-called 'southern sympathizers' to vote, (while he continued as judge,) while his judicial electioneering speech was of a character to encourage them all to vote. And I think I can safely say that no one was afraid to vote at the recent election in this county who was entitled to a vote under the convention ordinance."

Upon the same point, the representative of the county testifies as follows:

"Question by contestant. Having stated, in the depositions which you gave in this case on the 12th of December last, of which this is intended as a continuation, the substance of Judge King's denunciations against 'southern sympathizers,' and of his declarations in opposition to their right to vote, and the consequences they would incur if they did vote, will you please state whether you also heard his speech from the same stand, and upon the same points, on the first day of last October court; and if so, did he maintain the same sentiments and opinions which he put forth in his congressional speech, or opposite ones?"

"Answer. I listened to both speeches with great attention, and they were wholly unlike, both in the sentiments he expressed in regard to the southern sympathizers, and their right to vote. In his last speech he was exceedingly earnest in urging them all to vote, as otherwise the radicals might succeed in electing their ticket for judges, which, he argued, would lay the foundation for the utter ruin of the country. He repeatedly proclaimed that southern sympathizers had the same right to vote that the radicals had, and that it was their highest and most urgent duty to do so; and that if any person interfered with them in any manner, (emphasizing the remark,) either before or after the election, for voting for just whoever they pleased to vote, they would be made to suffer for it most severely and undoubtedly. His whole speech, indeed, was so totally different from what his congressional speeches had been, that the remark was quite common, directly afterwards, that he was at last aiming to ride the same horse that Birch had all along ridden; and in many respects it seemed clear that they had come to occupy a common platform."

Judge Vignini testifies as follows:

"Question by contestant. As you have stated in a previous deposition the substance of Governor King's language (in his speech) when he was a candidate for Congress in October, 1862, please state whether he held the same language in his speech in October, 1863, in respect to voters and voting in the then approaching judicial election?

Answer. He did not hold the same language or anything like it. On the contrary, it was a common remark, among those who heard him, that he had at last got on to Birch's platform as to the right to vote, as well as several things else. He warmly urged the people (sympathizers and all) to turn out and support the anti-radical ticket, assuring them that they had the right to vote just as every one else had, and that if any person interfered with them in any manner for exercising that right, either before or after the election, they would be punished for it with a vengeance; but that there really was no danger that any person would dare to so molest or interfere with them. The whole tenor of his speech in this respect was as different in tone and emphasis from his congressional speech as it could be; and the effect was that with the exception of half a dozen or less who were excluded by the express terms of the convention oath for having been in arms since the 17th of December, 1861, no one seemed afraid to vote in the election just past."

William P. Hooper, as follows:

Question by contestant. Please state whether you heard the speech made by Judge King when he was a candidate for Congress in October, 1862, and also his speech in opposition to the radical ticket for supreme court judges in October, 1863; and if so, please state the resemblance, or the want of resemblance, in respect to the right and the duty of that class of people who are called 'southern sympathizers' to vote.

Answer. I heard what he said in both speeches upon that subject, and was astonished at the change which his opinions seemed to have undergone in the course of the year. The convention oath remained the same, and the rights and duties of that class of the people whom he denounced as 'southern sympathizers' were, of course, the same, yet in his Congress speech he held up to them the penalties of perjury and military punishment to deter them from voting; while in his speech against the radical candidates for judges he vehemently urged them to vote, assuring them of their perfect right to do so, and that they need not apprehend the slightest danger from any quarter. I certainly never heard two speeches that seemed to me more entirely opposite in their tenor and teachings; and such was the general opinion of those who heard both speeches, and who have since conversed with me upon the subject.

"I am the clerk of the county court and the keeper of the election records. The vote in this county at the judicial election on Tuesday last was greater than its proportionate vote in the previous judicial election; whereas the congressional vote at the last election was several hundred short of the vote in the previous election for a Congressman."

And John Cox, as to the manner in which he spoke in his own county, as follows:

Question by contestant. Did you hear King make a speech at Richmond on the day of the election for the supreme judges, on the 3d of this month? If yes, how did he speak in respect to the right of southern sympathizers, as they were called, to vote?

Answer. He very earnestly exhorted them all to vote, alleging that they had the same right to vote that other citizens had; and he also called upon the refugees from Jackson and Cass counties, who had fled into Ray under the order of General Ewing, to come forward in like manner, and cast their votes against the radical ticket, which he spoke against with great bitterness and disrespect, both politically and professionally."

As comment upon such a record would be but little short of a contempt to the understanding of the House, I will copy but a single deposition to demonstrate how it was that the terrorism complained of extended to the ranks of the militia itself, and that if such and similar overawings are to be indorsed instead of rebuked at the hands of those upon whom the Constitution devolves the duty to "judge of the elections" under which we meet each other here, the position of a Congressman will cease to command even the prima facie consideration which should be accorded to the real Representative of the people. In other words, the mere military commandants will soon become everything, while the people and the soldiery, who fight the battles and feed the armies and pay the taxes of the Republic, will become practically nothing.

At page 34, Edward Brooking testifies as follows:

"I reside on the eastern edge of Clinton county, Missouri, near the line of Caldwell and Ray. In a running conversation between two of my neighbors and myself, concerning the unfairness and terrorism of the election, and in which I repeated what I had heard concerning an extra stack of hay which it had been said would be assessed against one of Birch's friends because he had voted for him, these neighbors replied that that was nothing; that they themselves had preferred Birch as their candidate, and would have voted for him if things had not got so tight that they were afraid to do so, and hence did not vote at all, or words to that effect. Both those neighbors were in service in the enrolled militia at the time of the election, and one of them has since enlisted in the volunteer or regular service. This conversation with these two militiamen took place shortly after the congressional election last year; and I have reason to believe that there were several others in my neighborhood who were similarly afraid to vote for Birch, and hence did not vote at all."

As every man who knows the meaning of "extra duty and no promotion" will but readily appreciate the point of the foregoing, it needs, of course, no additional explication. As little need it be explained that the same considerations will generally deter the soldier from even testifying to the displeasure of his commander; and that thus "the iron wheel" is preserved intact. It is the supervision and the repression of this House alone that can turn aside this fruitful affluence of corruption and oppression; and this can only be done by the stern rejection of every ballot which was not "free" in the sense ordained by the Constitution which you have severally sworn to support.

I come, lastly, in the absence of local testimony from the remaining counties, to the deposition of a witness upon whose judgment and candor I was induced to rely in selecting him for the service which is testified to, as follows:

Question by contestant. Please state whether you canvassed this congressional district for Judge Birch during his race for Congress in 1862. What was the object of that canvass; and what then were, and yet are, your opinions in respect to its then probable results?

Answer. I was engaged in distributing the circulars of Judge Birch and his notices to address the people as a candidate for Congress, in the various counties in the sixth congressional district for nearly three weeks, during the month of September, 1862. I was induced to undertake this service for the judge, in order not merely to serve him in that particular respect, but to obtain such a view of the canvass for him (as his friend) as might probably be relied upon in respect to its results. I found, in passing through the district, that he was everywhere regarded, and would be supported, as the candidate of the constitutional pro-slavery party; and I did not hesitate to express the opinion to him, on my return, that, if there was no military interference against him, he would beat Governor King at least eight or ten thousand votes. I am yet of the same opinion. Mr. Samuel was then scarcely counted in the canvass; and the support of Governor King seemed to be almost exclusively by the radicals, including the newly-organized militia. There were symptoms of military interference against Birch as I passed through the district; and the fear was then even entertained, in some places, that it would take the public shape it afterwards assumed; but the judge did not seem to think it would be possible for his adversaries to get it up to such a pitch as to defeat his election; nor did I."

That the opinions thus entertained may have such circumstantial corroboration as they are entitled to from other portions of the record—referring to which the case on my part will be closed for the present—it is deemed sufficient to state that in the county of La Fayette, where (as in several other counties) I was unable to obtain any legal testimony beyond the official vote on file in the office of the Secretary of State, the falling off from the presidential vote was 2,064; and that of the comparatively few votes that were given in that county, the sitting member received 450, and myself but 14. For the single purpose I have in view, it will be unnecessary for me to read, in this connection, the authorized official statements, which not only "unearthed" the sitting member before the committee, but gave him the lead, in this county as elsewhere, in the repression of the popular voice, which was everywhere impatient to repudiate and consume him. It will hence suffice to repeat that, while his entire vote in the district was but 4,243, its aggregate falling off, between the presidential and congressional election, was 11,390.

If, therefore, upon the whole record in this case, there be not developed such a concurrence of vitiations as to invoke against them the marked discountenance of the House, it needs no moral seer to predict the status of your future associates in this thence dishonored forum of the American peerage.

It is but added, therefore, that having reserved for my rejoinder or conclusion the explication of such additional facts and circumstances as may become necessary to the harmonious elucidation of the entire record in this case, I shall intermediately trust to the intelligent action of the House to discriminate, if necessary, between what is replied from the testimony and what is not.

That being the only additional favor which I ask at the hands of this dignified national judiciary there remains to be rendered but the tribute of a respectful and self-respecting thankfulness for the patience with which you have listened to me, and to commit the case of my outraged and overborne constituency to your upright and intelligent decision.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PRICE. I object to an extension of the time.

Mr. DAWES. I renew my motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the time will be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.) How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BIRCH. I have read eighteen pages, and there are ten still to be read. I will not ask over half an hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the contestant finishing his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I would remind the gentleman from Iowa that this is the first instance at this session when such an objection has been made to a contestant proceeding under similar circumstances.

Mr. PRICE. I will say in reply to the gentleman that I would have no objection to hear this gentleman talk, or any other for that matter, if it did not occupy the time of the House and of the country. But the speech is not benefiting the House or the country. There are not a dozen gentlemen listening to this speech. I propose to go on with the business that appertains to the legislation of the country. Let the gentleman print the balance of his speech. I will even buy the book, if necessary. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. If the sitting member does not desire to reply to the contestant, I will renew the motion to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. KING. I do desire to reply, but I am willing to wait until the House decides whether the contestant shall have more time or not. I shall not ask for more than my hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust there will be no objection to the contestant finishing his remarks.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. His motion is to lay the whole subject upon the table. If that motion be carried, will it not leave the sitting member in his seat?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly, that will be the result of it. But if the sitting member desires to reply to the contestant, I do not feel it quite right for me to shut him off. I am prepared myself to dispose of the case now. The Committee of Elections have not desired to discuss this matter, and it would have been more agreeable to them to have disposed of it without discussion. But after the House has permitted the contestant to speak, the question whether the sitting member shall reply is hardly within my control, and I think I ought not to make the motion to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his motion?

Mr. DAWES. I do for that purpose, but not for any other.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that there is no objection to the contestant printing the balance of his speech.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. UPSON. I would like to inquire of the contestant how much longer time he wants to finish his remarks?

Mr. BIRCH. I have only ten pages of manuscript left, and I think I can read them in half an hour. I will read as rapidly as I can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa withdraw his objection to the contestant proceeding?

Mr. PRICE. No, sir; I do not withdraw it.

Mr. BLAINE. I move that the contestant have leave to print the balance of his speech.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I have objected to that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the time of the House is of such importance that we ought to dispose of this case at once.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the contestant is allowed to go on and finish his remarks I will withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. UPSON. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin is not in order. He was not entitled to the floor to make it.

Mr. DAWES. I yielded the floor to the sitting member. I thought that after the contestant had had an hour it would be hardly fair for me to move to lay the whole subject on the table without the consent of the sitting member. The gentleman from Wisconsin, therefore, hardly had the floor to make his motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts had taken his seat when I made my motion, and I was duly recognized by the Speaker.

Mr. DAWES. I took my seat with the remark that I would yield the floor to the sitting member.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Missouri, the sitting member, did not take the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] desire to proceed now?

Mr. KING. I want the House first to determine in regard to the contestant being allowed to proceed with his speech.

Mr. DAWES. One word more. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin if these parties have not both been treated properly by the Committee of Elections. They have treated them both alike. They would have been content that the whole case should be disposed of without debate; but inasmuch as one of them has debated the question for an hour, it is right that the other should be heard. I did not agree with the position occupied by the sitting member; but I think that he has a right to be heard if he insists upon it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the sitting member does not care to be heard I will insist upon my motion. If he does I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. KING. I will say this: that if the gentleman insists upon his motion to lay the report on the table, and the House lays the report on the table, as a matter of course I do not care to be heard. It would be somewhat gratifying to me to reply to some of the remarks of the contestant, but I will forego that. If, however, the House refuses to lay the report on the table, I then desire the floor to reply to the contestant.

Mr. DAWES. If the House refuses to lay the report on the table the sitting member will then of course be entitled to the floor. I will now yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] to reply to my question.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I believe there is no complaint whatever made of the Committee of Elections for the manner in which they have treated this case. But this is the first instance in which a contestant claiming a seat on this floor has desired to extend his speech beyond an hour that he has not been permitted to do so. I think the same common courtesy ought to be extended to the gentleman whose speech is now cut off in the middle.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he remembers the case of Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts?

Mr. DAWES. The Committee of Elections have directed the motion to be made, and I now renew the motion, to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I raise the question of order that the gentleman from Massachusetts yielded the floor, I rose, was recognized by the Chair, and moved that the House adjourn. I submit that that is the motion before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. ARNOLD in the chair.) The Chair overrules the question of order. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield the floor to ascertain whether the sitting member desired to speak, and for no other purpose.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. But the gentleman from Missouri did not rise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise this question of order, that the gentleman from Massachusetts moved to lay the whole subject on the table. Upon that motion the House voted and declined to lay the report on the table. No business has intervened since that motion was put, and it is not now in order to renew the motion.

Mr. DAWES. What we have been doing for some time seems very much like business. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Will it be in order to appeal from the decision of the Chair overruling the question of order raised by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE?]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late, another question of order having been raised and decided by the Chair.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I appeal from that decision.

Mr. DAWES. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HARRINGTON. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 7, nays 84; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, and Schenck—7.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Donnelly, Driggs, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Higby, Holman, Hooper, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Marcy, McClurg, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Noble, Charles O'Neill, Otis, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—84.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it be in order I will withdraw the point of order submitted by me, and I hope some reasonable limit will be agreed on for this debate. It seems to me the time of the House is too valuable at this period to be spent in this way.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I must object to my colleague withdrawing his point of order.

The SPEAKER. No action having been taken on the appeal, the gentleman has the right to withdraw his question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it.

Mr. DAWES. Now, understanding that the sitting member desires to address the House for a short time, I will withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. It was the understanding that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KING] was not to claim the floor while the motion to lay on the table was pending. If that motion did not prevail he was to have the floor; but if it did prevail he did not want the floor, for then he would have his seat.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman from Missouri made such a statement, but he now asks the indulgence of the House for a few remarks, and under that appeal I have withdrawn my motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I hope the motion will not be renewed, but that the House will vote on the question of which of these gentlemen is entitled to the seat.

Mr. SWEAT. I desire to make a suggestion to the House. I think the contestant will be satisfied to have the rest of his speech printed. If in order, I move that the privilege be extended to him.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that privilege will be granted.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to allowing the contestant to print the remainder of his remarks?

There was no objection.

Mr. LE BLOND. Under the rules established in contested-election cases, is not the contestant entitled to the closing speech if the sitting member makes his speech?

The SPEAKER. There is no standing rule on the subject. There have been two election cases in which that rule was adopted by unanimous consent; but in the absence of unanimous consent the gentleman must be confined to the hour rule. The contestant has spoken his hour, and therefore he is not entitled to the close.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the rule in the Barrett and Blair case.

The SPEAKER. That was done by unanimous consent on the suggestion of Mr. Phelps, of Missouri. It was also done twice during this session. In this case no such arrangement was made, and it is therefore governed by the rule of the House, which is that a member cannot speak longer than an hour, and cannot speak twice on the same subject while any other member desires to speak.

Mr. SWEAT. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the contestant be allowed half an hour to reply.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. DAWES. I think that in a case where the committee submits it without discussion, if the parties are permitted to speak one hour each, that is all that can be asked of the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, if I had consulted my own feelings I am sure that, seeing what has transpired in the House I would have agreed that the contestant should have the time he asked to conclude his speech. And I state now that if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will withdraw his objection I will yet give way, and give the contestant an opportunity to do so. I have no objection, though it may be unfair to me, that he shall print a speech which I have not heard delivered, and which, therefore, I cannot reply to. I now ask the gentleman from Iowa if he is still disposed to stick to his position.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, once for all I will say that my sole object in objecting to the contestant concluding his speech was to save time. I have been sick at heart with the manner in which the time of the House has been squandered. I knew when I made my objection that I would be misunderstood, and that it would be attributed to wrong motives. I am only sorry that I did not commence objecting at the beginning of the session to any extension of time, for a man who cannot tell his story in an hour cannot tell it at all. [Laughter.] That is my opinion. I do not withdraw the objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I approve the gentleman's determination, and hope he will interfere in every such case that arises.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, this case is very different from any that has been presented to the House. It is a personal attack upon me. If it was only to be heard by the people of my district, I would not condescend to reply to any remark which the contestant has made. He commenced his canvass for Congress in June, and brought it down to November. I never met him, I never went to hear him, I never saw him, to counteract one single word that he ever uttered to the people of my district, although it was detraction and abuse of me from beginning to end. Why? Because I had lived among those people more than twenty-five years, and he had been there yet longer. I met him twice: once at his own county town, when I was there holding court. I came in contact with him then for the first time; and I met him two weeks after that at the Liberty court, where my duties called me. That was the second time I met him. These were the only times I ever met this contestant in the canvass. I knew what his course was. I have his circulars here in which he made the most outrageous misrepresentation of my true position that could possibly be concocted. But I paid no attention to them.

The burden of his charges was judicial and military tyranny. I have said, and I say now without fear of contradiction, that I have presided over that circuit for some fourteen years, and that never, until it escaped from the lips of this contestant, have I ever heard that I ever was charged with judicial corruption.

Now as to my military career. My heart has been in the defense of my country. I was against the rebels. I was against the rebellion. In the dark days of 1861 I said that it was necessary we should have troops. The rebels had possession of the whole country, my own county as well as others. I had a son in command of a regiment of what were called six months' men. It was found necessary to raise three years' men. He ascertained that he was unable to leave his men, he being in command of raw recruits. I volunteered my services to raise his regiment. I applied to General Schofield, not to be commissioned, not to be a division inspector, not to be an aid, but to help my son to raise his regiment and to put it into the field. I applied to General Schofield that when I had recruited a company I might muster them in and make an end of it. He said that he would arrange the matter; that he would get the Governor to appoint me an aid, with the rank and title of colonel of cavalry. He said further, that when the Governor should appoint me an aid with the rank of colonel of cavalry, he would appoint me division inspector, and that under the law I would have the right to muster into the service of the United States. General Schofield went to Governor Gamble and obtained a commission for me. He then brought it to me and appointed me division inspector, with authority to recruit a regiment. Here I have it under his own authority, in his own handwriting. I received it in the month of December, during the winter of 1861-62, the coldest winter with perhaps the exception of last winter which we ever had in Missouri. The country was full of rebels, and I was admonished by my friends not to undertake to raise a regiment. They told me that I would be killed. I could not get a Union man to travel around with me to raise a regiment. I circulated a printed notice that I would be at certain places to receive recruits. I went through the different counties with a servant to guide my mules. By the 1st of March I had a regiment ready. They were not mustered in until April, because the Government was unable to furnish them clothing and outfits.

So far as my duties were concerned they were ended in March. I have never held any position since. True, I have not said to Governor Gamble to revoke my commission. He knew that since then I have not been aid to the Governor. I have had nothing to do with the military since that, but I am proud to know that the military—and I have yet to learn that they ever thought otherwise—looked upon me as their friend when I became a candidate for Congress. I am proud to know that I had their sympathy and support.

Now, I ask this House where the evidence is that the military interfered with the voting of any man in my district? There is none whatever. And I say further that there was no military order emanating from the commander of that district. General Curtis was in command, and he did not, so far as I have learned, interfere directly or indirectly with the elections in that State.

But what did our Governor do? At the instance of somebody, I know not who, he issued an order that men should be detailed at the various places of voting, not to see whether disloyal men voted, not to see that they did not vote, but to protect all legal voters, under the constitution and under the ordinance of Missouri, in voting just as they pleased. Although I did not ask for the order, I saw no objection to it; and I have never heard that on the day of election in my district any military man in any county or any precinct ever undertook to question the right of any man to vote. There was no military order fixing the qualification of voters. The ordinance of the convention of Missouri fixed the qualification of voters, and the judges of elections had the right to judge of those qualifications. What were those qualifications? The oath required to be taken by a voter was read before this House in the case of Loan and Bruce, and I will not trouble the House by reading it now. It prescribed the qualification of voters. Every voter had to take it, and there was no question as to whether a voter should take it or might vote without taking it, as every man, loyal or disloyal, had to take it. Under the ordinance of Missouri every man who came forward and took that oath was entitled to vote.

Now, it is said that I shaped my course so as to prevent men from voting. That is not true.

Well, this ordinance, as to the qualification of voters, says that any man who takes a false oath shall be subject to indictment for perjury; and further, that the judges of the court should give that ordinance in charge to the grand jury. Well, Mr. Speaker, I always tried to do my duty while a judge, and I simply said to the grand jury, "Here is the ordinance in reference to the oath to be taken by voters, and it is made my duty to bring it to your consideration; and therefore I give the ordinance in your charge." I was bound to do that. The judge is not obliged to present to the grand jury a great part of the criminal law, but I generally gave the whole criminal code in charge to the grand jury, for every offense criminal by our laws was indictable.

There was such a turmoil and strife in Missouri at that time that no man who was not there can imagine the state of excitement and the many wondrous opinions that men got up. The country was full of constitutional lawyers, some interpreting the law and constitution one way, and some another; and they were constantly asking me what is to be done with the man who takes this oath falsely and votes. I said upon the stump that if he takes the oath falsely he is liable to be indicted; but after all, said I, it is a matter of conscience with the voter; but if he takes it he is entitled to vote. It is a matter of conscience with him, and I do not see how you can indict a man who will take the oath in that way. I urged further that it was their duty to vote, and that I wished them to vote. This is what my witnesses prove that I said to the people. Am I to be held responsible for what Dick told Tom that I said, and Tom told Jim, and Jim told somebody else? Not one in ten of these men heard my speeches; one heard one portion, and another another portion, and there are several of them that are unworthy of credit; and if I had believed that the testimony taken by the contestant would be admitted here, their evidence could have been disproved.

Now, sir, let me relate to the House the manner in which this testimony of events at Russellville in my county was obtained. The depositions which I took show that they were taken on the 10th of March, 1862. The deposition which the contestant took in reference to what I said at Russellville was taken in the November following. When he was at Richmond cross-examining my witnesses, he took Colonel Black out and asked him if he was at Russellville on the day I spoke. "Yes," said the colonel, "I was there." "Did you hear Judge King speak?" "I did." "What was the purport of his speech in reference to the matter now under consideration?" "Governor King made no such declarations as you charge upon him; he did not threaten that anybody should be put on the disloyal list; Lieutenant Emery was not upon the stand with him, but after the candidates had done speaking he made a speech."

Now, Lieutenant Emery is a very clever young man, but afflicted with a good deal more zeal than discretion. He came down pretty heavily on Birch, and rebels generally, and he did talk something of what ought to be done with men that would vote for Birch. Colonel Black has stated that when Lieutenant Emery came down from the stand Governor King reprimanded him, took him to task, and told him that he regretted that he had heard such remarks fall from his lips. I did so, and told him that I wanted it understood that I was not responsible for such remarks, although he had been speaking very favorably of me. "Well," said this young lieutenant, "I do not ask you to be responsible; I am responsible for what I say myself." And everybody who knows the young man, knows that that is his temper, and perhaps his greatest fault is a little more zeal than discretion. Out in our country men talk as they please. We do not muzzle men; and if friends of mine say indiscreet things, am I to be held responsible? In our election discussions we generally go into what may be called committee of the whole, where every man has a right to speak, and if what a man says is not very interesting, he has hard work to get an audience. We have no previous question or hour rule there. I took the depositions of five witnesses, four of whom heard what I said at Russellville, and the contestant did not ask any one of them a single question in reference to what I did say. Why? Because he found that they would put me right. He waited until the next November, after I had left home to come on to Washington, to take the deposition of a fellow by the name of Cox, whom he suborned and took up into his own county to obtain his deposition. And who is this fellow Cox? I did not know who he was, but I have letters from responsible men in the township in which he lives who tell me that they can get fifty men to swear that what he states in his deposition is a lie, and that he is unworthy of credit anywhere. I can prove that by the best men in my county. I knew nothing about this deposition until the contestant inveigled it into the hands of the Speaker, and had it referred to the Committee of Elections.

But he took another deposition of a young man of the name of Ellis, a refugee, a man who raised the first secession company in my county, and who afterwards wrote a most treasonable letter to his brother-in-law in the southern army down in Mississippi, for which he was arrested; and if he had not broken jail he would now have been serving his time in the penitentiary at Alton or somewhere else. He broke jail, and the last I heard of him he was in the gorge of the Rocky mountains. No notice was given to me of the intention to take the deposition of Ellis. I have a copy of the letter from him written to his brother-in-law, in which he says: "I saw Judge Birch last week, and told him his proper place to be a candidate was for the congress at Richmond, not at Washington." That is the only truth in the letter.

I now want to state to the House how these depositions were got before the Committee of Elections. The law says that after the canvassers have declared the result of an election, any person desiring to contest the election shall give notice to the person getting the certificate within thirty days after the canvassers have declared the result; and the person receiving the certificate shall have thirty days longer to put in his answer, and then each party has sixty days to take depositions. After that time expires no deposition shall be taken in the case except by resolution of the House of Representatives. The time expired for taking depositions on 10th March, 1862. But the contestant was in such a hurry that, ten days before the result was declared by the canvassers, he notified me that he would contest my seat. The notice was served on me on the 12th of December, and the canvassers did not declare the result till the 12th. The contestant gave me notice at the same time that he would take depositions; and the only batch of depositions I care a straw about were those which he took the identical day the canvassers declared the result, on the 12th of December, 1862. I paid no attention to the notice. It was not in accordance with the law. The depositions were not, as the law requires, immediately sealed up and sent to the Clerk of the House. The testimony of the man who took them, and who was not authorized under the law to take them—a notary public—is that, at the request of the contestant, he laid them away subject to the order of the contestant. He put them in his safe, instead of sealing them and sending them to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. They lay there till the next May, when Jo. Hart, with his marauding band, passed through the county, went to the court-house, and among other things removed these depositions and took them to the brush. Finding, as the testimony shows, that they were private papers, and, as I say, that they would be of more use to his friend Birch than they could possibly be to him, he sent them back to Birch. Birch carried them in his pocket without being sealed up till they were worn sleek. He went to the Missouri convention and made a speech in which he said, "Here are depositions which I have taken, and which I intend to use at Washington ultimately, but it will do no harm to use them here." He quoted them, and they were printed in his speech and circulated through the State. This contestant has had them in his possession since they were so returned to him.

The contestant took a number of other depositions, but not a single one of them ever found its way to the Clerk of the House of Representatives. How did he get them before the Committee of Elections? I learn that he had procured my colleague [Mr. ROLLINS] to offer them. He went to my colleague and said that he would be obliged if he would give notice that he would contest my seat. I told my colleague that if he would offer these depositions I intended to object to their going to the Committee of Elections. This contestant finding that out, went to the Speaker, and with all that bland palaver manner which he is so capable of, said, "Here are my depositions. Mr. ROLLINS is out of his seat; I would be glad if you would take them and lay them before the House, that they may go to the Committee of Elections." The Speaker, not knowing what they were, as a matter of course laid them before the House, and I, sitting in my seat, somewhat a novice in legislative affairs, made no objection. If I had known as much then as I do now, I would have risen in my place to a question of privilege and brought the matter right up. But they were referred in that way to the Committee of Elections, and when I named the matter to the Speaker, he said he knew nothing about it, and I have no idea he did. He said to me that it was a good point to make before the Committee of Elections. I did not want the Speaker to tell me that, for I thought so and intended to make the point.

Well, as soon as I went before the Committee of Elections I filed the motion in a legal form to suppress these depositions. I will say I do not think the committee did precisely what they ought to have done with that motion. I have no desire to censure them, but I think they should have decided the motion for me or against me; I believe they ought to have decided for me; I am sure a majority of the committee would never have decided against me. They, in fact, only indirectly decided the question at all by referring the whole matter to the House with the statement that these depositions were not taken in accordance with law. Why, sir, there is not a justice of the peace in any township in any county in my district who would have hazarded his judicial reputation so far as to allow them to be read before him in any matter in controversy. If I had any indication that the committee would allow these depositions to be read in evidence against me, I would have asked permission to have taken depositions to counteract them, for it would be very easy to do it. But the committee did not so decide as to make it necessary for me to do it. Not knowing, however, whether I was to be assailed by legal or illegal testimony, I took the precaution to take the affidavits of several gentlemen, and I will read some of them simply to show the positions I took in that canvass.

"David P. Whitmer, of lawful age, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and the following answers makes to the interrogatories propounded by Joseph E. Black, agent of the aforesaid Austin A. King, contestee:

"Question 1. State whether you live in the sixth congressional district of the State of Missouri, and in the county of the residence of Austin A. King, contestee as aforesaid, and whether you heard the speeches of said King during the last canvass for Congress in said congressional district, during which Austin A. King, James H. Birch, and others were candidates to represent said district in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

"Answer. I reside in Richmond, in Ray county, Missouri, in the sixth congressional district in said State, and heard part of the speeches of said King, (who lives in the same county that I do,) made by him in the canvass above alluded to. I heard him in Richmond, in Carrollton, Kingston, Plattsburgh, and Liberty, but cannot say that I heard his entire speech at either place.

"Question 2. Have you read the charges preferred by James H. Birch, contestant as aforesaid, against Austin A. King, denying that the said King was legally elected to represent the sixth congressional district in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, and denying that the election was fairly and legally conducted, for reasons set forth in said charges?

"Answer. I have read what purports to be a copy of all charges, in the handwriting of said King, and which said Birch, now present, admits to be sufficiently accurate for all the purposes of this examination.

"Question 3. Did you hear the speeches of said Austin A. King in said canvass? If so, state whether there was anything in them justifying the charge of judicial or military terrorism; and if so, what.

"Answer. In the parts of the speeches of said King in said canvass, as I have above stated, I heard nothing, as I thought, justifying the charge of military or judicial terrorism.

"Question 4. State if you are an attorney in the judicial circuit in which said King presides as judge, and if you heard the charges of the said King to the grand jury in reference to and in connection with the troubles of the country; and if so, whether or not they were such as became an impartial judge, and such as gave general satisfaction to the people.

"Answer. I am an attorney at law, and was appointed circuit attorney within and for the fifth judicial circuit in this State about the time that the said King was appointed judge within and for the same, and I heard the charge of the said King at each court held since said appointment, with the exception of the court held at Kingston last spring, and I thought that said charges, as by him given to the grand jury in each case were such as became an impartial judge, and I heard nothing to the contrary but that said charges gave general satisfaction to the people, so far as I can now recollect. I know I have heard men of different parties commending said charges.

"Question 5. State what the said King said in his speeches to the people, while candidate for Congress as aforesaid, as to the duty of men entitled to vote, under the ordinance of the Missouri State convention, and their privilege to do so.

"Answer. I heard him say that it was not only their privilege to vote, but that it was their duty to do so, as it would be a step in the right direction.

"Question 6. What did said King say in his speeches in reference to his frequently being asked if disloyal men could vote, and what did he say was his reply, and what did he say about men being forced upon the disloyal list?

"Answer. I have heard him say frequently that he had stated, and advised persons, that men who were regarded as disloyal had a right to vote; and if my recollection now serves me right, I heard him make such statements in his public speeches in said canvass, and I heard him frequently say that men were often placed on the disloyal list against their will, and for which they were not responsible. But as to men whose names were placed on the disloyal list at their own request, I think he stated, substantially, that he did not see how a man could consistently take the convention oath and vote, who, by his own voluntary act, had placed himself upon the record as disloyal, but that it was a matter of conscience with them.

"Question 7. State whether the tenor of the speeches of the said James H. Birch were not calculated to obtain the favor of southern sympathizers, and to secure their votes, and did they not vote for him.

"Answer. I understood the speeches of Judge Birch, which I heard him deliver in said canvass, to be of such a character as to encourage men of southern sympathy to vote for him, and I can state that they were generally for him, and voted for him, so far as my observation extended, and I think they generally voted in my county.

"Question 8. Did you not consider, then, from the character of said Birch's speeches, that he wished, by the sentiments contained in his speeches, to curry favor with the southern sympathizers?

"Answer. I thought, from the tenor of his speeches, that he was soliciting the votes and influence of men of that class.

"Question 9. Did you not hear many southern sympathizers say the reason they did not vote for James H. Birch was because they had no confidence in him, although they were pleased with his doctrines?

"Answer. I can state that I heard such talk, but that I cannot now state who it was that made such statements.

"George W. Dunn, of lawful age, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and the following answers makes to the interrogatories propounded by Joseph E. Black, agent for the aforesaid Austin A. King, contestee:

"Question 1. State whether you live in the sixth congressional district of Missouri and in the county of the residence of Austin A. King, contestee aforesaid, and whether you heard the speeches of said King during the last canvass for Congress in said congressional district, during which Austin A. King, James H. Birch, and others were candidates to represent said district in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

"Answer. I live in the sixth congressional district of the State of Missouri, in the county of Ray, being the same county in which Austin A. King, contestee, resides, and I heard a part of the speeches made by said King in the last canvass for Congress, in which he and James H. Birch and others were candidates. I heard all of his speech in Richmond, and parts of his speeches in Kingston, Plattsburgh, and Liberty.

"Question 2. Have you read the charges preferred by James H. Birch, contestant as aforesaid, against Austin A. King, denying that the said King was legally elected to represent the sixth congressional district of the State of Missouri in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, and denying that the election was fairly and legally conducted, for reasons set forth in said charges?

"Answer. I have read what purports to be a copy of charges of the said James H. Birch, (the same being now before me,) in the handwriting of said King, and which said Birch, who is now present, admits to be substantially a copy of the charges.

"Question 3. Did you hear the speeches of said Austin A. King in said canvass? If so, state whether there was anything in them justifying the charge of judicial or military terrorism; and if so, what.

"Answer. I have heard the speech of said King in Richmond in full, and parts of his speeches in Kingston, Plattsburgh and Liberty, (as already stated,) and I heard nothing from him that in my judgment justified the charges of judicial or military terrorism. If he had resorted to either I would not have voted for him.

"Question 4. State if you are an attorney in the judicial circuit in which said King presides as judge, and if you heard the charges of the said King to the grand jury in reference to and in connection with the troubles of the country; and if so, whether or not they were such as became an impartial judge, and such as gave general satisfaction to the people.

"Answer. I am an attorney-at-law, engaged in the practice of law in the circuit courts of the fifth judicial circuit, being the circuit in which the said King presides as judge, and I heard the charge of the said King as judge to the grand jury in Ray county in full, and I heard parts of his charges to grand juries in some other counties, and what he said in said charges in reference to the troubles of the country, so far as I heard said charges, was, in my opinion, such as became an impartial judge, and I have heard the charges commended by Union men and men of southern sympathies. I listened attentively to the entire charge in Ray county, and heard nothing in it that I deemed improper. His references to the troubles of the country were such as I expected from an able and upright judge.

"Question 5. State what said King said in his speeches to the people while candidate for Congress, as to the duty of men entitled to vote under the ordinance of the Missouri State convention, and their privileges to do so.

"Answer. There is considerable difficulty in stating, so long after the speeches were made, what he said. The substance of what he said in his speeches to the people in reference to the right of the people to vote under the ordinances of the State convention, requiring an oath of the voters testing their loyalty and their duty to do so, was, that it was the right of every citizen of the State, possessing the necessary qualifications of age and residence, who could take the oath prescribed by the convention, to take the oath and vote, and that he regarded it as their duty to do so, and said it was a step in the right direction.

"Question 6. What did said King say in his speeches in reference to his frequently being asked if disloyal men could vote, and what did he say was his reply; and what did he say about men being forced upon the disloyal list?

"Answer. Said King in his said speeches said that he had frequently been asked whether disloyal men could vote, and he said that his reply was that he could not see how a man who had voluntarily enrolled himself on the disloyal list could take the oath prescribed by the convention and vote, but that it was a question for the conscience of the voter. He said that where a man had been placed upon the disloyal list by the enrolling officer against the protestations of the man who was being enrolled, this act of the enrolling officer ought not to deprive the man of his right to vote.

He said he did not think that an enrolling officer ought to force a man upon the disloyal list against his will, but that men ought to be encouraged in returning to their allegiance. He pointed out the inconsistency of a man voluntarily placing himself on the record as a disloyal man, and then taking the convention oath, which presupposed that he was at the time of taking it a loyal man; and said that the ordinance of the convention visited upon the party taking the oath falsely the penalties of perjury, but he (King) left it to his (the voter's) conscience.

"Question 7. State whether the tenor of the speeches of the said James H. Birch was not calculated to obtain the favor of southern sympathizers and to secure their votes, and did they not vote for him.

"Answer. The tenor of the speeches of the said James H. Birch was calculated to win the favor of the southern sympathizers and obtain their votes, (they were better pleased with his speeches than the speeches of either of the other candidates,) and most of the votes that he obtained in this county were of those called southern sympathizers. Some of them, however, voted for King, and some for Samuel."

That is what I said. Here was the order that loyal and disloyal men should enroll. Every man had a right to choose his position. And when a man said "Put me on the disloyal list," it was a declaration, in fact, that he was against the Government. It put him in a position to be suspected, but, nevertheless, if he saw fit to take the convention oath, I never said he ought not to be allowed to vote. I did say that I did not see how a man who declared himself disloyal to his Government could conscientiously vote, but that whether he would vote or not was a matter for his own conscience to decide. I say so now.

I read again from the testimony of the same witness:

"Question 8. Did you not consider, then, from the character of said Birch's speeches that he wished, by the sentiments contained in his speeches, to curry favor with the southern sympathizers?

"Answer. I thought he regarded his positions as being more acceptable to men of southern sympathies than the positions of either of the other candidates, and that he relied mainly upon men of that class for his election.

"Question 9. Did you not hear many southern sympathizers say the reason they did not vote for James H. Birch was because they had no confidence in him, although the sentiments of his speeches pleased them well?

"Answer. I think I have heard persons having southern sympathies, who praised his speeches, express a want of confidence in him, but I cannot now designate any one who did so."

It was, however, to a great extent, from that class of men that he obtained his votes. I do not mean to say that all the southern men voted for him. Many did not vote for him, not because they were afraid to do so, but because, as they expressed themselves to me, they had no confidence politically in him.

Now, sir, I desire to read one more affidavit.

"James W. Black, of lawful age, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and the following answers makes to the interrogatories propounded by Joseph E. Black, agent of Austin A. King, contestee:

"Question 1. State whether you live in the sixth congressional district of the State of Missouri, and in the county of the residence of Austin A. King, contestee aforesaid, and whether you heard the speeches of said King during the last canvass for Congress in said congressional district, during which Austin A. King, James H. Birch, and others were candidates to represent said district in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

"Answer. I live in the sixth congressional district in the State of Missouri, in the county of Ray, being the same county in which Austin A. King, contestee, resides. I heard some of the speeches made by said King in the last canvass for Congress, in which he and James H. Birch and others were candidates. I heard his speeches in Richmond, his speech at Lexington, and part of a speech at Russellville, Ray county.

"Question 2. Have you read the charges preferred by James H. Birch, contestant as aforesaid, against Austin A. King, denying that the said King was legally elected to represent the sixth congressional district of the State of Missouri in the Thirty-Eighth Congress of the United States, and denying that the election was fairly and legally conducted for reasons set forth in said charges?

"Answer. I have read what purports to be a copy of the charges of the said James H. Birch (the same being now before me) in the handwriting of said King, and which said Birch admits to be substantially a copy of the charges.

"Question 3. Did you hear the speeches of Austin A. King in said canvass? If so, state if there was anything in them justifying the charge of judicial or military terrorism; and if so, what.

"Answer. I heard the speeches of said King at Richmond, one at Lexington, and part of one at Russellville, Ray county. I did not hear anything introduced into those speeches that, in my judgment, would justify the charges of judicial or military terrorism.

"Question 4. State if you are an attorney in the judicial circuit in which said King resides as judge, and if you heard the charges of said King to the grand jury in reference to and in connection with the troubles of the country; and if so, whether or not they were such as became an impartial judge, and such as gave general satisfaction.

"Answer. I am an attorney-at-law, engaged in the practice of law at Richmond, Missouri, it being in the judicial circuit in which said King presides as judge. I heard the charge of said King, as judge, to the grand jury in Ray county, at the March term, A. D. 1863, and I heard nothing in this charge but what became an impartial judge. The impression it made upon the people, as far as I can learn, was a very favorable one. His reference to the troubles of the country was, in my estimation, such as should come from one clothed with the majesty of the law.

"Question 5. State what said King said in his speeches to the people, while candidate for Congress, as to the duty of men entitled to vote under the ordinance of the Missouri State convention, and their privilege to do so.

"Answer. So far as I can recollect, after the lapse of so much time since I heard the remarks of said King in reference to the right of the people to vote under the ordinance of the State convention, requiring an oath of the voters testing their loyalty and their duty to do so, was in substance as follows: that it was the right of every citizen of the State, (that was duly qualified in respect to age and residence,) who would take the oath prescribed by the convention, to take the oath and vote; and he regarded it as incumbent upon him to do so, and expressed himself to the effect that it was a step in the proper direction.

"Question 6. What did said King say in his speeches in reference to his being frequently asked if disloyal men could vote; and what did he say was his reply; and what did he say about men being forced upon the disloyal list?

"Answer. Said King in speeches that I heard took this position in reference to disloyal persons voting: that he could not see how a man who had voluntarily enrolled himself in the disloyal list could take the oath prescribed by the State convention; but if he came forward after voluntarily enrolling himself disloyal and voted, it was a matter that rested with his own conscience. In relation to men being forced upon the disloyal list, the impression left upon my mind from the speeches of said King, and from conversations I had with him when acting as enrolling officer, was that no man should be placed upon the disloyal list unless he placed himself there voluntarily. As I understood said King's views in this matter, men were to be encouraged in returning to their allegiance.

"Question 7. State whether the tenor of the speeches of the said James H. Birch were not calculated to obtain the favor of southern sympathizers, and to secure their votes; and did they not vote for him?

"Answer. The tenor of the speeches of the said James H. Birch was, in my judgment, of such a character as to conciliate the favor of the southern sympathizers, and induce them to vote for him. His speeches were more favorably received by them than the speeches of either of the other candidates. The most of the votes received in Ray county by the said James H. Birch were from southern sympathizers. Some of them, however, voted for King, and some for Samuel.

"Question 8. Did you not consider, from the character of said Birch's speeches, that he wished, by the sentiments contained in his speeches, to curry favor with the southern sympathizers?

"Answer. It was my opinion, on hearing said Birch's speeches, that he considered the views he took on the political questions of the day as more in accordance with the views of the southern sympathizers than the views of the other candidates, and that he appeared to rely, in a great measure, on this class of voters to secure his election.

"Question 9. Did you not hear many southern sympathizers say the reason they did not vote for James H. Birch was because they had no confidence in him, although the sentiments of his speeches pleased them well?

"Answer. I have heard some southern sympathizers say that they liked the speeches of said James H. Birch, but that they put no confidence in him. I could not at the present time point out who those persons were.

"Question 10. State what military position you hold.

"Answer. I hold the position of lieutenant colonel in the fifty-first regiment enrolled Missouri militia, and am at present in command of the military post at Richmond, Missouri.

"Question 11. Please state, if the only manner in which said King has been engaged in the military line was last winter in recruiting a regiment for the United States service under his son, Colonel Walter King, and if that regiment did not go to the southwest part of the State last spring, and has not been in this district since, and if said King did not, by his efforts, put the regiment in the field when it was thought no one else would be able to do it.

"Answer. The only manner in which I have known said King to be engaged in the military line was last winter in recruiting a regiment for the United States service under his son Colonel Walter King. This regiment went to the southwest part of the State last spring, and has not returned to this district since. It was the impression through this county that said King put this regiment into the field by his persevering efforts when no one else would have been able to have effected it."

Right here I want to say, in reference to the remark of the contestant that I changed my position in order to get into his party, that it is the last thing I should do. God forbid that I should ever seek to get into any party in which he is recognized. During his political career for the last thirty years he has belonged to every party known in Missouri, and he never belonged to one but to betray it. What party he belongs to now God only knows, for I cannot trace him at all. If I knew where he thought his interest was, I could tell. He split from the party to which I belonged in 1849, and went off with a band of men whose leaders have become traitors, and who then sought to break down and destroy the only great man Missouri ever had, Colonel Benton. But he was a man that Colonel Benton would not deign to meet in the canvass, though repeatedly invited to do so.

The contestant has been a standing candidate in my State for Congress now for more than thirty years! He has sought this position in the ranks of every party, and on every side of every question. He now ought to be content. He has achieved the privilege of making a speech in this Hall, and this has been the summum bonum of his ambition, which ought now to be gratified. He has strutted his brief hour on the stage here; he has loomed up, like the frog in the fable, to his largest proportions in the American Congress; and, although he has made a speech which would disgrace any other living man, he need have no fear that his reputation will be damaged by that or any other act which he may perform. It is a fixed fact. He has never gone through with a canvass without the man he was opposing refusing to speak to him or to allow him to speak to him. Why? There were no moral restraints upon his conduct during a canvass. He set out first to be a candidate for Governor. The convention said that the election should come on in August. He took it into his head to be Governor. He went to Price's army at Springfield. He was there on Christmas day. He saw General Price, Governor Jackson, and all the leading rebels of Missouri. What they talked over I do not know, but I have heard him say that he was given the privileges of the camp, and, by special invitation, dined with General Price, and helped him demolish a gobbler that day for dinner, and while the champagne was being indulged in, that this contestant was invited to go back and put himself upon the southern "chute." If they had elected him Governor we would have been in a worse fix than we were with Claiborne F. Jackson. I know both men, and I would take Jackson before the contestant. He announced himself as a candidate for Governor, and set out to make the canvass, making addresses all over the State. It was all the loyal men could do to prevent his being arrested. Finally he got down to the Springfield district. He there made a speech and was arrested for his treasonable speech and sent to St. Louis. After some time he was discharged by the provost marshal, but I do not know how.

As I have said he was a candidate for Governor. In June the convention met, and they concluded that it was best not to have the election for Governor before next November. There was no chance left for him then but to become a candidate for Congress. He at once issued a circular which I have here. I will not show the position he gave me, but it is false in every particular. He said that the St. Louis Democrat was saying that he ought to be arrested; that the St. Louis Union was "down on him," and so on. When I came to inquire into it I found that all the loyal papers of Missouri were doing the very thing of which he complains here to-day. Am I to blame for what was caused by his own misconduct? He was arrested because he was producing a spirit of insubordination.

But to pass on. This contestant throughout the canvass for Congress made several speeches; but, as I have already said in the opening of my remarks, I only met him at two places. I made a speech at Plattsburgh in which I said nothing calculated to arouse him. My constituents know that I did not shun him because I dreaded him. He got up in Plattsburgh after I spoke, and assailed me in such a way that I confess I made up my mind, as near as I could, "to skin him alive" at the Clay court. And I did it. I think I drew him to the life, and after I was through I told the people I had not to go abroad to prove the truth of what I said. I appealed to the old citizens of Clay county for the truth of what I said, and I was answered that I could prove it. I had denounced him as a traitor. He tried to make the people believe that I, although a slaveholder, was willing to sacrifice all their interests in reference to slave property, and was really an abolitionist. That was no new thing to me, because when they attacked Colonel Benton they classed me with the abolitionists. When I denounced the invasion of Kansas I was called an abolitionist. When I denounced the repeal of the Missouri compromise as injurious to our interest, I was again ranked with the abolitionists. And the contestant attacks me in a circular, because in some heated moment, when the question was asked, "What will you do with the negroes; will you give them up, or resist the Government when they attempt to take them from us?" I said "If to give up my negroes will restore the Government to peace and harmony, I will not only give up all the negroes I have, and all my other possessions, yea, but I will, at my advanced age of life, start the world anew, if to do so will restore harmony and peace to my country." That is what I said then, and that is the way I feel to-day. For that the contestant charged me with being an abolitionist. I was willing to bear all that.

I have a letter here showing that the contestant made a speech last October, a month before he came on here, in which he said:

"I hold out the olive-branch to this rebellion; if the rebels will take it, with all their rights to their negroes and everything else, then it will be right; but if they refuse to accept this, then I am for letting them go in peace. And I will never vote a man or a dollar of money to carry on this war as long as that proclamation of the President stands in the way."

Jeff. Davis wants no better offer than this.

I said I regretted that the proclamation was issued, and denied the authority of the President to issue it. I said it was not worth the paper it was written on only so far as it could be enforced by the Army and Navy of the United States. That is my opinion to-day. I believe the President could accomplish all he desired by his Army and Navy. I maintained before the people the right of our Army when it goes into the South to lay their hands upon everything they can seize, and to take away from the rebels everything which would strengthen us and weaken them. I quoted to sustain me the law of nations upon the subject. I contended that the rights of non-combatants should be respected. There were thousands and thousands of non-combatants in the South, and the President's proclamation did them injustice. But that proclamation I could not control, and I declared then, as I declare to-day, that although an attempt is made to enforce it, I would not therefore turn traitor to my country, but would get along with it the best I could.

With reference to the laws that had been or might be passed, I said that though they might be inexpedient or unconstitutional, yet until they are declared unconstitutional or are repealed by Congress they are the laws of the land to me, and I never publicly or privately uttered a sentiment against a submission to or support of any laws passed by Congress in reference to this rebellion. Many of them I found objectionable; but I said if they were of such vital importance in their nature I would endeavor to amend them here; and if unconstitutional, that those who had a right to make a case should do so and bring it before the Supreme Court of the United States; and that if the Supreme Court should declare them unconstitutional they would then cease to be the law of the land to me; if constitutional, I would feel myself bound by them. That was the position I took then, and that is the position I take now. No gentleman upon either side of the House will object to that. The decisions of that tribunal I am willing to stand by.

I have no opinions to change in reference to this rebellion. I have no terms to make with rebels with arms in their hands, and who are trying to shoot down me and mine. But when they cease their rebellion and come in and seek the benefit of the amnesty proclamation I cannot find it in my heart to want to scalp or murder or assassinate them. I will watch them when they lay down their arms, and no man who has been a prominent leader in getting up this rebellion will ever receive my vote for any office whatever, because we might get into a position where he might deceive me a second time. I desire peace, but I know of no way of getting it except by breaking the armed power of that military tyranny which has borne down and oppressed the South.

I am a southern man. Not a drop of blood courses through my veins that is not thoroughly southern. The remains of my father and mother, my brothers and sisters lie mouldering in southern soil. My relatives are all there, and I must be allowed to have some feeling for the South, but I scorn their treason, and detest and hate the traitors. I am for carrying on this war vigorously. Let the traitors lay down their arms and acknowledge the supremacy of the Constitution if they desire peace, and when they do that I will be ready to talk about terms, but not until they do it, for they are the aggressors.

I knew that General Doniphan heard several of my speeches during the canvass, and I wrote to him and propounded certain questions to him, telling him that it might become necessary for me to take his deposition. He tells me that he heard me speak at Plattsburgh on the question who was entitled to vote and who was not, and that he has read the depositions. I read from his letter. He says:

"I have placed your questions together, so that my answer may be brief and free from repetition. I heard your speech mainly at Plattsburgh on the day indicated. When I entered the court-room I was informed you had been speaking about fifteen minutes. I heard all your speech after I came, and also Judge Birch's. When I had been listening to you about twenty-five or thirty minutes you commenced answering some questions you said had been propounded to you touching the right of voting under the late ordinances of the State convention. I understood you first to assert that it was the duty and privilege of all legal voters to vote at the approaching election; that it would be a recognition of the provisional government and of the success of civil government in the State for a full vote to be cast. My recollection is that you then divided the citizens into three classes: 1. That all men who then were and had been engaged actively in the rebellion to overthrow the Government had the right to dangle at the end of a rope. 2. That those who in the enrollment of the militia (that was just terminating) had voluntarily enrolled on the disloyal list would have to take the convention oath of loyalty, and the ordinance made it perjury to take it falsely; but that as all men had a right to change, that you left it with the conscience of each to judge and act for himself, but such voting would have a very bad appearance. 3. That all voters who had enrolled on the loyal list, and all those who had been forced to enroll on the disloyal against their expressed wishes at the time, had the right to vote, and it would be the most effectual means of showing their loyalty by taking the oath and voting; that a military commander had no right or power to force any man on the disloyal list against his wishes, and that it was against the policy of the Government.

"I was at the courts of Ray, Clay, and Clinton at every term while you were judge. I never saw anythingavoring of unfairness or improper conduct. Your charges to the grand juries, several of which I heard, I thought eminently patriotic and applicable to our then distracted condition. I never heard or saw anythingavoring of terrorism, or using your official position to advance your political purposes. I have read the evidence of several gentlemen taken by Judge Birch, and regret that our recollections of the tenor of your speech should so far differ, for I know these gentlemen are as incapable of bearing false testimony as myself; but on the other hand it affords me real pleasure that my old and valued friend, Judge Dunn, (whose judgment and memory are seldom at fault), recollects your speeches substantially as I do.

"This is but a synopsis of your positions; of course in a short and hasty letter no more could be expected."

Sir, he might well say that, for he has lived in my circuit ever since I was made a judge in the spring of 1837, and I held the office until I was made Governor, and have lately held it for two years since that time. The whole country was in an uproar. The Governor of the State sent me a commission asking me to try and put our courts into operation. I wrote to the Governor that I did not want the position, as I intended to be a candidate for Congress. When the people of the circuit ascertained that I was about to abandon the office, I was importuned by members of the bar and by the people of the circuit to hold on to it on the ground that having been judge so long, I could do more to bring order out of chaos than any other man in the circuit. Under these circumstances I continued to hold the office. In the brief which this contestant has published he states that he had offered his services to the Governor for any position from that of county judge up to that of judge of the supreme court; but the Governor gave him no position; and why? Because he knew him too well.

I submit the case to the House, and leave it to be disposed of by the House as it may deem right.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the claim and letters patent of William Wheeler Hubbard;

An act (H. R. No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing; and

An act to repeal the first section of a joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service.

DAKOTA CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SCOTFIELD, from the Committee of Elections, made a minority report in the contested-election case of Todd and Jayne; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case from the sixth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. DAWES. I now move to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw that motion that I may offer a resolution as an amendment to the report.

Mr. DAWES. I cannot, inasmuch as I make this motion under instructions from the committee.

The question was taken on Mr. DAWES's motion, and it was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 45, noes 50.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That neither Austin A. King nor James A. Birch is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the sixth congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. UPSON. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table, and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 52, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Baile, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Coffroth, Cole, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, English, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Thayer, Upson, Wadsworth, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—52.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Boyd, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Thomas T. Davis, Denison, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Le Blond, Loun, Long, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Stiles, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, and Fernando Wood—36.

So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. FARNSWORTH moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. KING. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to offer a resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to yield; the gentleman has had his hour.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, is a motion to recommit in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, under the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will hear the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the report of the Committee of Elections in the contested case of Birch against King, from the sixth congressional district of Missouri, be recommitted, with instructions that the committee dispose of and decide the motion filed by the contestant King to suppress certain depositions taken by contestant Birch; and in deciding said motion the committee are instructed to exclude depositions not taken in pursuance of the law regulating testimony in contested-election cases.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I decline to withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I insist upon the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, which was first on agreeing to the resolution offered by Mr. FARNSWORTH.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the substitute, on division, there were—ayes 38, noes 58.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Ancona, Anderson, Baxter, Blow, Boyd, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Driggs, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Morrison, Pendleton, William H. Randall, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Stiles, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Fernando Wood—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Arnold, Baile, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blaine, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, English, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulbard, Ingersoll, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburne, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—72.

So the substitute was rejected.

The question then recurring on the motion to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the subject, it was put and decided in the affirmative.

Mr. DAWES moved to reconsider the vote by which the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I should like to know whether the gentleman proposes that there shall be any business transacted to-night.

Mr. WILSON. I propose that the session shall be held under the rules of the House.

BLAIR VS. KNOX.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will call up the contested-election case of Blair and Knox.

Mr. STILES moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ALLEY demanded the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

And thereupon (at five o'clock) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 2, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will require the unanimous consent of the Senate. The Chair hears no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

Mr. SUMNER presented twenty-three petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TEN EYCK, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 450) to provide for the repair and preservation of certain public works of the United States, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Fridgeon, of Detroit, Michigan, praying that an American enrollment may be granted to the Canadian-built propeller Michigan, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. CHANDLER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 397) to regulate commerce among the several States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 195) for the relief of Margaret L. Stevens, widow of General Isaac L. Stevens, reported it without amendment, and adversely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILKINSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 295) making additional grant of lands to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said State; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRUMBULL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 296) in relation to the fees and emoluments of the marshal, attorney, and clerk of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 297) making a grant of land to the Territories of Dakota and Montana, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of a railroad in said Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FORT PILLOW MASSACRE.

Mr. FOSTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to provide suitable relief for the widows and children of the colored soldiers in the service of the United States who were lately massacred at Fort Pillow; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. McDOUGALL submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire and report what legislative action, if any, is necessary in regard to the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain; and whether it be desirable, if the treaty continue in force, that the Pacific coast should be included in its operation; and that, in view of the foregoing, the committee be instructed to report to the Senate upon the commercial results of the treaty thus far.

NATIONAL CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That three thousand additional copies of the act to provide a national currency be printed for the use of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President of the United States had yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens, under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863;

An act (S. No. 248) in relation to franked matter; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 57) to amend the charter of the city of Washington.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and for the circulation and redemption thereof.

COLLEGE RANCHO.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 179, concerning lands in the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and reported to them favorably. It is a bill that will excite no debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The patent of the United States was issued on the 28th of February, 1861, to Joseph S. Alemany, as the bishop of Monterey, and his successors, for the tract of land or rancho known as Cañada de los Pinos, or College Rancho, situated in the county of Santa Barbara, California, "to have and to hold" the same to him and them "in trust for the religious purposes and uses" therein mentioned. The bill proposes to allow Joseph S. Alemany and his successors, as the grantees of the patent, to lease, mortgage, or sell the rancho or any part thereof, and to apply the proceeds under the direction of the Roman Catholic archbishop of San Francisco, and his successors in office, or other proper authority of the Roman Catholic church in the State of California, for the purposes of education anywhere within that State, anything in the patent or in the original grant or concession of the rancho, or other title whereby the same was acquired from and under the authorities of Spain or Mexico, to the contrary notwithstanding; and all trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants, precedent or subsequent, expressed or implied in the patent, grant, concession, or title to the contrary, and all breaches of the same, are by the bill waived, abrogated, discharged, dispensed with and released on the part of the United States, for the purposes of the act; and any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance of it is to operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish to say in explanation of this bill that it is a House bill which proposes to authorize the Catholic archbishop of California to sell a certain ranch or estate located in the county of Santa Barbara in that State, which was confirmed by the courts of the United States and a patent issued to him as an officer of that church, as the patent described "in trust for the religious purposes and uses" of that religious body. This bill proposes to authorize the archbishop and the ecclesiastical authority he represents to sell this property and to apply the moneys derived from the sale to the general purposes of education among their people in the State. As the grant was made with this condition it is deemed by them necessary to obtain this additional authority from Congress. That is all that the bill contains. There is no question in regard to it. I hope it will be passed without any more consumption of time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has this bill been before the Committee on Public Lands and been reported by that committee?

Mr. CONNESS. It is a House bill which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I observe that the last three or four lines of this bill are in these words:

And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

I do not like such provisions in acts of Congress. I know nothing about this case. My attention has just been called to it. If the bill simply proposes to surrender all interest the United States has got I have no objection to it; the United States do not want to claim anything about it; but to undertake to determine what may be the effect of this surrender on third parties, if there are any third parties, I think is a dangerous species of legislation.

Mr. CONNESS. I explained it when up before. This land comprises what is known as one of the old missions of California.

Mr. TRUMBULL. How much land is it?

Mr. CONNESS. That is not stated in this bill. I suppose it is several leagues. It is a Mexican grant comprising one of the California missions. When up before I stated that in the decree of confirmation by our courts the confirmation was made in trust for the religious purposes and uses of that Christian denomination. It was by reason of their religious organization that they were in possession of a title from the Government of Mexico to that land, and we, as we agreed to do, confirmed their title. They now ask for additional authority to dispense with that condition, so that they may apply the proceeds of the sale of those lands for the purposes of general education among their people; and, as a matter of course, it is provided in the lines read by the Senator that the title that they shall give under that sale shall be free from the restriction imposed in the act of confirmation. That is all there is in it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I suppose there is nothing in this bill except simply giving the jus disponendi fully where the party holds an eleemosynary trust, giving him the right to control it for the purpose of disposition or sale. He might possibly by applying to a court of equity get the same authority; but as the title is held by a patent under the United States, it is necessary for the United States to clothe him with the jus disponendi. There can be no possible objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think the Senator from California understood the suggestion that I made. I have no objection to this bill; I do not wish to be considered as opposing it if it is satisfactory to the Senators from California; but the suggestion that I made was that this grant is a Mexican grant, as I understand, confirmed by our courts; and, according to the terms of the grant as confirmed by the courts, it is coupled with certain conditions. That I understand from the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. In trust for the religious purposes and uses of that church.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a grant by the Mexican Government coupled with certain conditions and confirmed by the courts, if I understand the character of it. That being so, is it competent for the Government of the United States to change those conditions? If the bill simply provided that the Government of the United States released any title it might have, there could be no objection to it. If the Senator from California is satisfied that it is proper for the Government to release them from the conditions imposed in the grant by Mexico as confirmed by the court, I have nothing to say about it. That is the only suggestion I have to make in regard to it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The title in the archbishop of San Francisco is derived from the United States; it is held under our patent, and our patent defines the trust; and the reason for asking the legislation of Congress is to conform to that old maxim that governs the law, Cujus est dare ejus est disponere: he who makes the grant may direct and control it to a certain extent; that is, we can release these parties from the conditions that restrain them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. So far as we are concerned; but does not the bill go further than that?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not see any possible objection to it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The last clause of it provides:

And any conveyance or disposition made in pursuance thereof shall operate to pass the estate or interest conveyed or disposed of free and discharged from all such trusts, conditions, provisions, or covenants.

If it added, "so far as the United States are concerned," there could be no objection to it.

Mr. CONNESS. The United States could not discharge them from any other trust. There is no question as to the title of this land. The United States has parted with its title. It has patented the land to this religious body. They simply ask for a modification of the confirmation of their title, so that the proceeds of the land may be diverted in part from religious uses and purposes to educational uses and purposes. What objection can there be to that? It seems most extraordinary that there should be any objection; but it is our misfortune that no question can be presented here from our State that is not impeded by objections of this character.

Mr. HARLAN. My recollection of the character of this claim, I perceive, is erroneous from the statement made by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] It was examined, if I remember correctly, by the Senator from Oregon, a member of the Committee on Public Lands, not now in his seat, [Mr. HARDING;] and, if my memory is correct, he represented it as being a small church property in the country worth but a few hundred dollars, and that the proprietors desired to sell it and to invest the money in other property somewhere else. The committee saw no objection to authorize them to sell their property and reinvest the money somewhere else; but the Senator from California says that it includes several leagues of land.

Mr. CONNESS. I presume it does. I do not say that it is so.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I think not. I believe it is a small mission tract that is left there.

Mr. CONNESS. It may be a very small estate.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I believe it only includes the orchard and mission house.

Mr. CONNESS. But I cannot perceive how that enters into the question at all. The property is theirs, and it is simply for us to say whether we will modify the condition that was coupled with the confirmation of their title, and allow them to use it for educational purposes instead of religious purposes. That is all there is of it. It is not a question that we have much to say about on the modification of that condition. It is no matter about the extent of the estate; we have confirmed it to them; it is their property "for religious purposes." They ask us to modify that condition so that they may use it for the purposes of common education among their people.

Mr. HARLAN. I think it would be well enough to let it go over. I should like to look into it.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to that.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McDUGALL. I trust the bill will not be postponed. I do not see that anybody except the California delegation is interested in this matter.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to say this merely: this bill was referred by the Senate to the Committee on Public Lands, and to some extent I suppose the Committee on Public Lands is answerable for the character of information to be presented to the Senate to inform its judgment in order that it may arrive at a correct conclusion. As the chairman of that committee, I now state to the Senate that I am not satisfied that the committee was well informed as to the facts in the case, and I ask that the bill may go over until we may obtain the necessary information. If the Senate choose to act on it in advance of that information, of course I have no personal objection.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think my colleague was not well advised in regard to these mission lands. Under the act of 1824 nearly all the lands that had been held by the missions were granted by colonization grants to different proprietors, they reserving generally simply the garden, the church buildings, their orchard and vineyard. I think that in this case there is but a small amount of property, consisting of the mission buildings, a vineyard, and an orchard, in a part of the country where property is of very little value. Of course it has some value, and can be converted so as to be used for the purpose designed. I think there can be no objection to the bill, and I should like to see it passed at once.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from California states the case as the committee understood it at the time, that it was a small property in the country that ceased to be of practical utility for the purposes indicated in the deed of conveyance to them, and that they desired to dispose of that property that it might pass into the hands of private individuals and they be permitted to reinvest the proceeds for educational purposes elsewhere. It was in that belief of the facts connected with the case that the committee made the report. But the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] suggests that this probably will affect a large property, including several leagues of land. That was not the understanding of the committee, and hence their report was made on a false basis, and I desire to be informed now before the Senate is called on to vote on this bill as to the state of facts connected with the case. I am not opposed to the bill if the facts are as I understood them at the time the committee reported it, and I expect to vote in favor of the bill; but I wish to be informed first. As it was originally referred to the committee I suppose for the purpose of making the necessary investigations and laying the facts before the Senate, in order that the Senate might act understandingly upon an examination of the case, and give an enlightened opinion in their votes, I desire that it may go over for a day in order that we may get that information. If, however, the Senate are of a different opinion, I of course have no personal objection.

Mr. CONNESS. I regret very much the course taken by the honorable Senator from Iowa in regard to this question. Admit now, for the sake of the argument, that it does apply—I did not say that it did; I said that perhaps it did apply—to a larger amount of land than the Senator understood it to apply to: this bill simply provides that the condition that our courts appended to the confirmation, namely, that it should be held in trust by the archbishop of that church "for religious uses and purposes," shall now be modified by us so that it may be used for common educational purposes. Now, what is there in the suggestion of the Senator? I regret very much to oppose any request that the Senator makes as a Senator, much less as the honorable chairman of one of the committees of the Senate; but the Senator must see very clearly that it is almost impossible to get up a California measure here. The time and attention of the Senate are occupied with important business. I have struggled day after day to get up a measure of importance here, and when I do succeed in getting it up I find gentlemen, Senators from other States, understanding the question so much better than we do, that we cannot get action upon it, and it goes over. We ask for very little legislation for the State of California, very little indeed, and I think a spirit of wider generosity might be exercised toward us than we meet with here. I think it is properly and legitimately a matter of complaint that it is not so.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will suggest to the Senator from California that there is now in this city a gentleman who has charge of those mission grounds, who can satisfy the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands at any moment in regard to this bill, and it might be as well to let it go over now until to-morrow, as I do not think there will be any opposition to it then.

Mr. CONNESS. I will let it go over, and move to take up Senate bill No. 109.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to inquire if the title to this mission is complete?

Mr. CONNESS. It is complete.

Mr. COWAN. Has it been confirmed?

Mr. CONNESS. It has been confirmed.

Mr. COWAN. Then I should like to know whether this application ought not to be made to the Legislature of California?

Mr. CONNESS. The Legislature of California have nothing to do with it.

Several Senators. That subject is disposed of. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that it has not passed from the consideration of the Senate, but by unanimous consent it can be laid over.

Mr. COWAN. I think I had the floor upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. I believe the Senator from Pennsylvania took the floor from me.

Mr. COWAN. I want to understand this bill. If the honorable Senator from California expects us to vote adversely upon it, he had better allow us to understand it.

Mr. CONNESS. I was about to withdraw it. I am much obliged to the Senator from Pennsylvania and will give way; but I wish, with the consent of the Senate, although I see so many Senators on the floor, to call up another California bill. I have tried for several days to obtain the floor to call it up, and if the Senate will consent to the withdrawal of this measure, I move to take up Senate bill No. 109.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent the bill may be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to its withdrawal until I can say a word. The motion to postpone it, I believe, is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the pending motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That motion cannot be disposed of, I take it, until the Senate agrees to have it disposed of. It is not in the power of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was stating that it might be postponed by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Unanimous consent has not been given.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ascertain whether unanimous consent is given to its postponement.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object to it.

Mr. President, in the very few suggestions that I made in regard to this bill I did so more to call the attention of the Senators from California to it than anything else. I have no objection certainly to the bill. I supposed that they would be desirous to have the bill in proper form, and more so than anybody else; and in looking into the bill it occurred to me it was possible that it might involve some difficulty, and therefore I made the suggestion, not from any hostility to the bill or any disposition to interfere with California matters. It was in that spirit, and that spirit alone, that I called attention to it.

But it seems that the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] is not willing to permit members in this body to make suggestions in regard to a bill, and we are to be lectured in regard to our course here and as to what course we shall pursue, and the intimation is thrown out that somebody opposes a measure because it is a California measure. The Senator has neither warrant nor authority for making such insinuations. He may regard them as becoming. It may be consistent with his sense of public duty when measures are before the Senate, to suppose that members of the body are to be controlled by such considerations. I am sure they will have no influence upon me. I think the people of California, if they should ever look to the proceedings of Congress and at the action of an individual so humble as myself in regard to measures affecting that State, will have no reason to suppose that I was ever actuated by hostility to their interests. I think there is no reason for the imputation that Congress entertains any such feelings.

My objection to the bill going over was simply to reply to these remarks and insinuations of the honorable Senator from California. He will learn, if he has not already learned, at least so far as my course is concerned, that he will never accomplish his ends any quicker by attempting to cast imputations upon me for the course which I feel it my public duty to pursue in this body.

Mr. CARLILE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 238. It is the bill to which I alluded on Monday morning last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Illinois as withdrawing his objection to the postponement of the bill before the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; I have no objection now to its postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there any objection?

Mr. CONNESS. Before that is done I wish to say to the honorable Senator from Illinois—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the postponement of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I know that. It is my right to reply to the honorable Senator, I believe, in a few words.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California will pardon the Chair for stating to the Senate what is the question before the Senate, without interruption from the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from California understands that very well.

Mr. President, the language of the honorable Senator from Illinois applied to me comes nearer to a lecture than any I have delivered here. I think I was entirely warranted in saying that whenever a California measure comes up it does meet with objection. The Senator has no right to presume that I object to a full examination of every measure that is proposed here from California; but I submit that the objections taken this morning to this bill are of the character that I have described. We are near the end of the session; it is important to these parties to pass this bill and obtain the modification that I have mentioned of the conditions that are coupled with the confirmation of their title; the Senator from Illinois objects, and states in the same breath that he has no objection to the passage of the bill. Then why not let it pass? If there be objections to it, why not state them? I will inform the honorable Senator from Illinois that notwithstanding the curt lecture I have received from him this morning I shall regulate my conduct and my language here under my own sense of propriety and not with regard to the estimate that may be placed upon it at any time by the honorable gentleman. If it is the wish of the Senate that this measure shall go over now I have no objection.

Mr. HALE. Has it gone over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not. The Chair will ascertain whether there is any further objection to the postponement of the bill. The Chair hears no objection, and it is postponed.

LAND TITLES IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 50.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no objection to the postponement of prior orders, but I do think the bill referred to by the Senator from California ought to be taken up and acted upon. It is in relation to the perfection of the titles to property in the city of San Francisco, and also changing the mode of executing the surveys of private land claims in that State. It has been before the Senate I believe once or twice. The committee have labored on it for a long time, and have taken the advice of some of the best legal minds of California on the subject. It is a question of vast consequence to the people of the city of San Francisco at least, and of very considerable public consequence as the Committee on Public Lands think, and I think that that measure ought not to be postponed for the consideration of anything of less public interest. I do not know what the bill is that the Senator from New Hampshire desires to take up, but I do think the bill of which I have spoken ought to be taken up and acted upon at an early period.

Mr. CONNESS. If the honorable Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to take up that bill I shall be very much obliged to him.

Mr. HALE. The measure that I propose to take up is not a private matter; it does not relate to me or my constituents; it relates to a little concern in which the whole country is interested—the Navy of the United States. That has been supposed to be a matter of some consequence, and I have been trying for a month to get this joint resolution up. I have not the slightest objection to the Senator's bill.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator will permit it to be taken up now I shall not interfere with him again.

Mr. HALE. I gave way to the Senator the other day.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the Senator from New Hampshire I will move to take up Senate bill No. 109. It is of the importance that the Senator from Iowa has described. I have tried for weeks to get action upon it. It has been lying on our table for over two months. It has been twice reported favorably from the Committee on Public Lands, and I ask to have it considered now, if the Senator from New Hampshire will consent. I will not throw myself in the Senator's way again.

Mr. HALE. I will consent; but perhaps I may call upon the Senator sometime to give me a certificate that I am not opposed to the Administration by yielding on this occasion. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire withdraw his motion?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. Then I move to take up Senate bill No. 109, to expedite the settlement of titles to lands in the State of California.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, the pending question being on concurring in the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CONTRACTORS FOR DOUBLE-ENDERS.

Mr. HALE. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 50.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope that motion will not prevail. Yesterday there was pending a joint resolution for the relief of the State of Wisconsin; the discussion upon it proceeded for a considerable time; the morning hour expired while the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] was in the middle of his argument, and I think there is a propriety and right that that resolution should be completed before we take up a new matter in the morning hour. We can never complete any business satisfactorily if a debate is allowed to go on on one subject for a time and a speech is stopped in the middle, and then we abandon that and go on with other legislation for a week. We forget what has been said before, and the whole debate has to be gone over again. I now appeal to the Senator to let us finish the resolution that we had up yesterday. It has been discussed three or four times and it ought to be finished; especially the Senator from Vermont ought to be allowed to finish his speech.

Mr. HALE. I can only say that every word the Senator says about that resolution is true of this resolution, only that this is older than that; its consideration was broken off by an interruption longer ago than the Wisconsin case. I must insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 50) for the relief of the contractors for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats known as "double-enders."

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out all of the resolution after the word "that," where it first occurs, and to insert what I send to the Chair as a substitute:

All claims based upon or arising from the contracts of persons who contracted with the United States Government for the machinery and engines of the side-wheel gunboats commonly known as "double-enders" be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for examination and adjudication.

The resolution under consideration provides for the creation of a commission to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy to whom shall be referred the claims, or alleged claims, of certain persons who have constructed machinery for twenty-eight side-wheel gunboats commonly known in the Navy as "double-enders." It then proceeds to direct that after a report shall be made by these three commissioners and approved by the Secretary of the Navy, whatever amount shall thus be found, in the estimation of those commissioners, to be due, shall be paid out of the Treasury to these respective parties. What I propose is, instead of committing the investigation of this subject to three commissioners, who have no power to send for persons or papers, or to examine witnesses, and are in no way responsible to us, and who are not passed upon and approved by us in executive session, that the whole matter shall be referred to the Court of Claims who have the proper machinery for investigating a subject of this kind, and then when they report we shall have some tangible facts before us upon which to predicate our action instead of putting the whole Treasury of the United States into the keeping of three commissioners who may be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy.

I will say furthermore that I understand this is only the opening or entering wedge to further claims on the part of other contractors. This is to be followed by the contractors for the hulls of vessels, for the hulls and machinery of other classes of vessels; and if this shall be successful, as perhaps it may be, and I am not now going to say it ought not to be, we shall have the same rule applied not alone to the Navy but to the Army, and to every branch of the public service.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate had listened to the report of the committee which was read, which I hardly think they did—I do not believe it was heard by a single member—they would see the ground on which this claim rests.

I may be permitted to say at the outset that so far as I am concerned I am not acquainted with a single one of these gentlemen, except as they made themselves acquainted with me in prosecuting this matter before the Committee on Naval Affairs. When the subject was under consideration before, the Senator from Iowa asked if the committee had consulted with the Secretary of the Navy upon it. I replied that we had, and we had his answer, but I had it not in my desk at the time, and for that reason it was postponed.

The claim that these petitioners make is this: certain propositions for the construction of the machinery of these double-enders were issued by the Government; certain representations were made to them, and they accepted them verbally, and they went on and made large expenditures before the contracts were submitted to them in writing; I do not remember how many months; but at any rate they had gone so far on the verbal statement that it would have been ruinous to them to withdraw at the time the contracts were made. The contracts then were made, so far as the Department make any contracts; that is, they do not sign them themselves, but send them out to the party, and he signs them and returns them, and they are put on file. The contractors contend that when the contracts were sent to them they were entirely different in their character and requirements from what they understood when they entered into the contracts. The Secretary of the Navy, in answer to the application made by the committee, looks very hard against these claimants. As I have the letter I will read it, and also call attention to another letter of his in relation to the allegation of the petitioners on the same subject. Here is the letter of the Secretary:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, April 27, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, inclosing the petitions of contractors for the machinery and hulls of the double-end gunboats, praying an additional allowance upon their contracts, and asking whether, in the opinion of the Department, these claims justify legislative action, and requesting me to communicate to the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs such facts and suggestions upon the subject of the memorials as may seem to me proper.

The contracts in question were made under a public advertisement fully expressing all the requirements; and all the offers under this advertisement will be found on page 789 of the documents accompanying the President's message of December, 1862. From that exhibit it will be seen that the Department accepted the offer made by responsible ship-builders who were well acquainted with such matters. Some of the offers were at most exorbitant rates; and the average price, to which the petitioners refer is no guide as to the value, it happening that the lowest bidders were parties of great experience and known reputation.

The contract for the hulls expressly stipulates that when the vessel is fully completed and ready for the machinery the final payment shall be made, reserving only as much as may be actually necessary to finish the vessel; and the contractors were released from all responsibility and charge of every kind after such delivery of the vessel. Notwithstanding the statement in their petition, they were not subject to any expense of insurance or for preservative repairs. The amount retained from them was $5,000 only.

The hulls were all completed within the time specified in the contract and none of them were liable from delay. Whatever rise there may have been in materials or labor took place within the time contemplated by them for the execution of the work. All these parties voluntarily accepted the offer of the Department and applications were made for contracts on the same terms by other parties after the Department had agreed for all the vessels it wanted. The parties knew the vessels were to be completed in every respect for naval service, and their contract stated, as they say it does, that there were to be no extra bills on that account.

With regard to the steam machinery of these vessels, it is of a well-known type, and many of the petitioners had already constructed similar machinery for the Department. The specifications were so complete and the form of machinery so well known that it is believed the builders in this case, as they did in that just referred to, could without difficulty have made their own drawings. It is well understood that the estimate of cost is always made from the specifications. The advertisement was very full and the Department has exacted no more than what was expressed in it and the specifications. A considerable number of these engine contracts were taken after the work had been commenced by other parties.

The price and time offered by the Department were those of the lowest bid on the advertisement, by a large and experienced builder who is one of the petitioners. The terms were voluntarily accepted by the others and the time of completion has been greatly exceeded by all. It was fully understood by all these contractors that the Department wished the vessels at the very earliest day, and upon their agreement as to time the contracts for the hulls were made upon which their builders claim, on that account, to have suffered loss.

The Department makes and sanctions no contract with the understanding that its conditions are not to be complied with, and it always furnishes the fullest information as to the quantity and quality of its work, and the petitioners have on these points only expressed their own views and wishes.

These contracts were made with care and deliberation for the true interest of the Government, and only reasonable offers of experienced persons well known and competent to do such work were accepted. The Department has not increased the cost of this work by any action of its own, and if by any causes beyond its control these contractors have, as they state, suffered a loss, it is for Congress to exercise such liberality as in its wisdom it may see proper. This Department has no funds and has made no estimate to supply any such cost as this exercise of liberality will occasion, and it is unwilling to assume the position of encouraging additional expenditures after having taken all proper means to obtain the work on the best terms for the public interest.

I am, sir, very respectfully, &c.,

GIDEON WELLES,

Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JOHN P. HALE, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

When this letter was sent to the committee it was submitted to these contractors. The contractors alleged that they had written evidence from the Secretary himself that he had forgotten some of the particulars. I hold in my hand a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, or rather from B. F. Isherwood, chief of the Bureau of Engineering, dated September 12, 1862, and directed to one of the firm of Boardman, Holbrook & Co., of the Neptune Works, New York. Mr. Isherwood says:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING,
September 12, 1862.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 11th instant has been received in regard to the time of completion of the machinery of the two paddle-wheel steamers.

The Department, being fully aware of the difficulties under which all contractors for this species of work now labor, authorizes me to inform you that it will not exact a vigorous compliance with the strict terms of your contracts in regard to time and forfeiture for delay; but in consideration of this liberality on its part will expect you to remit no effort and to use all possible means to complete the contracts in the least time practicable.

The contracts you refer to as having been returned unsigned have not been received. When they arrive they will be sent back to you.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
B. F. ISHERWOOD,
Chief of Bureau.
Messrs. BOARDMAN, HOLBROOK & Co., Neptune Works,
New York.

In that connection I do not know the fact, but I will give the statement of the petitioners, that when they received the contracts they sent them back, saying it was impossible for them to proceed, and thereupon they received this answer from the bureau, stating—

"The contracts you refer to as having been returned unsigned have not been received. When they arrive they will be sent back to you."

As they allege, upon this showing the contracts were entered into.

Mr. President, these gentlemen—I think there are eighteen of them—comprise the great majority of those who are engaged in manufactures of this kind; the Government must rely upon them; and it is for the Senate to say whether it is necessary to the public welfare or the public interest or the public honor to deal too harshly with these gentlemen. They contend, as is said by the Secretary in his letter, that many of them had entered upon the work and proceeded far in it before the contracts were furnished to them. What is the proposition contained in this joint resolution? It is not to give these men anything, it is not to open the Treasury to them, but it is to refer the matter to the very Department that knows all about it, for the provision of the resolution is:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a board of competent persons to examine the claim of the contractors with the United States Government for the machinery of the side-wheel gunboats commonly known as "double-enders" for additional compensation for constructing the same, and to report to the Department what losses have been suffered by said contractors on their contracts, how far they are justly entitled to relief, and what, if any, additional allowances ought in equity to be made to them by the Government; and that upon the report of said board receiving the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to said contractors, severally, the sums adjudged to be due them in equity by said board, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That such additional compensation shall in no case exceed an amount which, compared with the price stipulated in the contract, shall be in due proportion to the excess in weight of the engines built over such as were contracted for, except for alterations in form or material made by express order of the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The morning hour having expired it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HALE. I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance—I have done my speech—if there is any objection to letting us take a vote on this resolution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Iowa will probably have something to say about it.

Mr. GRIMES. I have considerable to say on the subject. I am willing to say it now, though, if this resolution is to be proceeded with.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think we had better go on with the regular order of business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The special order will be proceeded with, unless postponed by special vote, and is now before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I move to postpone the special order for the purpose of considering this joint resolution. I think it is a matter that ought to be closed one way or the other.

Mr. CLARK. I will simply say that I hope that matter will not be permitted to supersede the tax bill. It is of great importance to dispose of it as early as possible. We are now losing money that the Government ought to have, and I am not aware that those parties are losing anything upon that bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CHANDLER to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty" in the seventh line of the amendment proposed by Mr. CLARK from the Committee on Finance, which was in section ninety-three to strike out from lines four hundred and forty-six to four hundred and fifty-two, inclusive, in the following words:

On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, and manufactured tobacco not otherwise provided for, of all descriptions, (not including snuff, cigars, fine-cut, smoking tobacco made exclusively of stems and not sweetened or otherwise prepared, nor shorts or other refuse separated from fine-cut tobacco in the process of manufacturing,) and on stemmed tobacco, thirty-five cents per pound.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco not herein provided for, from which the stem has been taken in whole or in part, or which is sweetened, thirty-five cents per pound. On smoking tobacco, manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, and on refuse tobacco known as fine-cut shorts, twenty-five cents per pound.

Mr. CLARK. I simply desire to say a word or two more in regard to this matter. The Senator from Michigan proposes to strike out the tax of twenty-five cents upon the highest grade of smoking tobacco and to insert twenty, and he thinks that by that course we shall get more revenue. Now, I desire to state that when we lose revenue by imposing a rate of taxation, we always lose the revenue from the lowest grades. For instance, we impose a heavy tax upon whisky. That heavy tax upon whisky does not affect the finer kinds of whisky, nor does it affect the drinking of that kind of whisky by the people who pay large prices for their whisky; but I am told it does affect the lower grades of whisky; that the people who would ordinarily drink the cheap kind drink beer and other drinks instead. It is precisely so in regard to this article of smoking tobacco, in my judgment. We have divided it into two grades, the higher and the lower, one at twenty-five cents and the other at fifteen. If by the imposition of the tax there is any falling off in the use of tobacco, it will be in the lower grade. People will get the leaf and manufacture it into smoking tobacco and use it instead of paying the smaller tax; but the gentlemen who use the better kind of tobacco will not object to paying the tax, and therefore we should retain this tax upon the higher grade.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator still seems to be acting under the idea that there is a considerable amount of this high-priced tobacco which is cut. Since making my few observations last evening I have talked with several persons, and they tell me there is absolutely none of the high grade of tobacco cut. The difference in the cost of this article upon which you levy a tax of fifteen cents and the ordinary kind of tobacco which is cut for smoking purposes is only two cents a pound.

Now, sir, if a tax of half a dollar a pound would yield a larger revenue than a tax of fifteen cents or twenty cents, I would go for a tax of half a dollar; but this matter of cut tobacco for smoking purposes, as I said before, has no science in it.

Any man who smokes can buy his leaf of tobacco and cut it with a jack-knife and make just as good smoking tobacco as any cutter in the United States; and they will do it. People will raise in their gardens their little plots of tobacco, and your revenue will actually be depleted by putting on the high duty that you now propose. The misapprehension on the part of the Senator, in my judgment, is in regard to the fact that this high grade is cut at all.

In England and France, as is well known, they put an absolute prohibition upon the product of tobacco. They do not allow a tobacco seed to be planted in their country. In this country you find tobacco grown all over the country. In every State in the Union there is more or less tobacco grown; and each man will grow and cut his own tobacco if you put a prohibitory tariff upon it.

I honestly believe that fifteen cents per pound would yield a larger revenue on cut smoking tobacco to the Government than thirty-five cents. I believe it would yield three times as much as a tax of thirty-five cents. But, sir, on the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] I gave up the proposition of fifteen cents and substituted twenty cents, and I hope that amendment will be adopted. I think it ought to be adopted. I believe it to be for the interest of the Treasury that it should be adopted.

Mr. CLARK. As the Senator from Michigan states that he has consulted with individuals since he moved his amendment, I desire to state that this matter was thoroughly examined by the Committee on Finance upon the best information we could get in regard to it. But after the amendment was moved by the Senator from Michigan last night I took especial pains to make inquiries of the best sources of information that were at my hand, and they were very good, and I learned entirely contrary to what the gentleman from Michigan learned: that the tax, instead of being lower, ought to be made higher if anything. I have seen gentlemen who have been in the tobacco business for twenty years, I have seen collectors from the city of New York who understand the tobacco business from the beginning to the end, and all the operations of these tobacco manufacturers and dealers to evade the tax, and I learn from them that this tax, instead of being lower, if moved at all, should be carried up. But I think the committee have placed it on the right grade, or perhaps as near right as they can make it. We cannot have a grade for every kind of tobacco. If a man will cut up a very good grade of tobacco for smoking tobacco, as is done, he should pay a higher tax. There are some grades, however, which are poor, which perhaps would not pay quite so high a tax as this; but upon the average, smoking tobacco will well bear the tax we have imposed upon it.

I desire to say further, that many leading men in the tobacco business in various parts of the country, in New York and Baltimore, understanding that this motion was made, and feeling that it would seriously affect the revenue, took the pains to send to me this morning to say that they had no part in it, for they did not desire the amendment made. I know the source from whence the gentleman gets his information. I have had the same access to it that he has. I have talked with those men, but their opinions failed to convince me, because they have been outweighed and counterbalanced by the opinions of other men. We cannot fix this tax to suit everybody. One man will want a tax of fifteen cents, another twenty, another thirty, perhaps. I have found men who, in adjusting this tobacco tax, have asked me to carry it as high as seventy-five cents a pound, and others to sixty cents. They were men, it would be ascertained very soon, who were in the interest of those who had a very large stock on hand, who wanted a very high tax in order to appreciate all the tobacco they had on hand. We have to take the information that we can get from all quarters, and act upon the whole information that we can get. I do not know how the Senate can be better informed, I mean in a body like this, than by following their committees. There are Senators, perhaps, who have a knowledge of the tobacco trade, and will think the committee are wrong in regard to it; but upon the best information the committee have, we believe the tax we have fixed upon to be the best on the whole.

Mr. POWELL. My impression is that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan ought to prevail. I have listened attentively to the argument of the Senators who advocate the taxing of this description of tobacco at twenty-five cents; but they have failed to convince me that it is right. They have failed to convince me that we would get more revenue by taxing it twenty-five cents than by taxing it twenty cents. I believe it would be beneficial to the revenue and to the tobacco interest to place this tax at twenty cents.

The Senator from New Hampshire tells us that this will be very fine smoking tobacco, and he tells us he has had a very large intercourse with persons engaged in this business. Sir, I have had some intercourse with persons engaged in this business, and they gave me information of a very different kind from that given to the Senator from New Hampshire. My impression is very distinct and very clear that the tobaccos which are used in the manufacture of this description of tobacco are not fine tobaccos. I will read the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire:

On tobacco manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, and not sweetened, twenty-five cents per pound.

We all know that the stem is by far the most inferior part of the tobacco leaf; we know that it is worked up into the most inferior kind of tobacco in use; and I put it to the Senate if a man who is making an attempt to manufacture fine tobacco would mix a very fine grade of leaf with the stem? If he would, he would destroy all the good qualities that are in it. I am advised that it is the lower grades of tobacco—what we call the lugs—that are worked up with the stem in this form. I do not believe that any sensible operator in tobacco would work up fine leaf tobacco with the stem in it, because if he did he would destroy the quality of the fine leaf by mixing with it the large fiber, the stem, which is the most inferior quality of tobacco when used in any form, either as smoking or chewing tobacco.

I believe that the position of the Senator from Michigan is correct. I believe you will get greatly more revenue out of the tax of twenty cents than out of the tax of twenty-five cents. He is very correct also in another thing, that if you make the tax on this inferior kind of smoking tobacco very high, persons will use the raw leaf by rubbing it with their hands or cutting it with a jack-knife. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will prevail. It is not my purpose to take up the time of the Senate by any elaborate argument on the subject. I have given my views to the Senate very briefly.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Kentucky fell into an error perhaps inadvertently, and perhaps he used the expression inadvertently, "this inferior kind of smoking tobacco." Sir, this is the very best kind of smoking tobacco, the highest grade.

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I do not think that any tobacco that is manufactured with the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, is the finest kind of smoking tobacco. I believe, to make the finest kind of smoking tobacco, you must take out the large fiber; you must take the finest leaf and work that up into it. That is my opinion about it, and I do not think I am mistaken.

Mr. CLARK. I think I can assure the Senator, upon good information, that in the manufacture of this tobacco, in perhaps the very best kind that is made—that is the fine-cut chewing tobacco—they cut up the stem; and we found it necessary to make an amendment to impose a tax on fine-cut, whether used in the stem or not. Now here are two kinds of tobacco; one with the stem in, the leaf and the stem together. It may be of the best kind of tobacco that is manufactured, the very best, if a man chooses to make it, and on that we propose to put twenty-five cents a pound, which is very low. On the other, which is made exclusively of stems, using up the stems, only fifteen cents. A man who is very nice about it, or a man who has been accustomed to use good smoking tobacco, will not hesitate to pay the tax, whether it is twenty or twenty-five cents. The Government, therefore, may just as well have the twenty-five cents. But if he uses the poorer kind, which pays fifteen cents, he will perhaps use the leaf. We cannot prevent that. We cannot impose a tax on the leaf, in my judgment.

Mr. HENDERSON. My State is very largely interested in this subject, though I have no interest whatever personally in it. I never owned half a pound of tobacco in my life, purchased with a view to sale. I once used it as a chewer and a smoker, but with that exception I have never had anything to do with it. I know something about its manufacture, because large quantities of it are manufactured in my State, but I have no interest in it personally, and never expect to have.

I have looked over the amendments suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, and, in my opinion, they are about as good as can be made on the subject as they now stand. The Senator from Kentucky falls into a very serious error in regard to the amendment that is now pending. He reads from the printed and not from the written amendment which is now pending. The amendment that is now before the Senate is this:

On smoking tobacco, manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, and on refuse tobacco, known as fine-cut shorts, twenty-five cents per pound.

The Senator from Kentucky is laboring under the impression that it is a tax on tobacco not sweetened. That is not so. There are two grades of smoking tobacco as now provided by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. As he very properly states, he intends to charge upon manufactured chewing tobacco of all grades thirty-five cents per pound. Then he designs to charge twenty-five cents per pound upon tobacco which is cut up and which may be used for smoking purposes. Then there is a third quality made exclusively of stems, for smoking purposes, upon which he proposes to charge fifteen cents per pound. As I stated yesterday, the very best quality of tobacco may be manufactured for smoking purposes; that is, the very finest quality of leaf may be cut up with the stems in it, and for smoking purposes, as I understand it, the stems do not injure it. I doubt very much whether fine-cut smoking tobacco ought to be placed below the grade of chewing tobacco. Therefore I think the amendment, as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, ought to be adopted.

Now, once for all, I desire to state this: I am very well aware that in my State the tax now proposed to be levied upon tobacco will be regarded as a very heavy and very burdensome tax by some persons; but I do not so regard it at present. In the present state of the currency of the country, with my desire to diminish the vast amount of that currency, I believe that a very heavy tax ought to be laid upon those articles that can bear it; and I am very well aware that tobacco is an article that can bear that tax. I would not propose any increase upon the rates suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not desire to suggest any increase of those rates, because I think they are large enough; I do not think they ought to be increased. The fact is, it will be regarded as a very heavy tax, as I have before stated, as it now stands. But, sir, it is necessary to lay the tax somewhere; it must fall upon something; and I think that the people of the West are so largely interested in the reduction of the volume of the currency that they can very well afford the tax proposed upon tobacco. While they lose in one respect, they will gain in another. I hope, therefore, that the amendment suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire will be adopted just as he has offered it.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Missouri and myself seem to be after the same object; but we arrive at different conclusions from the same premises. I will vote for the tax which will give the largest revenue. Satisfy me that a tax of twenty-five cents will yield more revenue than a tax of twenty cents, and I will vote for a tax of twenty-five cents. But the point is this: there is no necromancy about cutting smoking tobacco; it is the simplest process in the world. I can take an axe and a leaf of tobacco and make just as good smoking tobacco as any cutter in the United States can make. You put no duty upon the leaf. Any man can step into a grocery and buy one leaf, two, three, or a dozen, and cut them up with a jack-knife and he will have better smoking tobacco than if he bought the article that had paid twenty-five cents tax. You will utterly destroy your revenue from smoking tobacco and leave every man to purchase his leaf and cut it for himself. That is why I am in favor of reducing this tax. It is the tax that I am after, the largest revenue; therefore I say make the tax twenty cents a pound, because it will yield a larger revenue than a tax of twenty-five cents.

Besides, there is no reason why you should tax stems which cost say two or three cents a pound fifteen cents, and then tax the leaf which only costs four or five cents a pound twenty-five cents. The difference is too great; it will lead to fraud; it will diminish your revenue. I would prefer a tax of fifteen cents, as I first proposed yesterday, because it will yield a larger revenue; but, as I said before, at the suggestion of the Senator from Maryland, I gave up the smaller sum and adopted the larger one: I hope my amendment to the amendment will prevail. It ought to prevail as a financial measure.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator if there is not some danger in this respect if his amendment be adopted, making such a very great difference between smoking and chewing tobacco. Under the amendment either may be sweetened and perfumed, and the leaf may be used also with the stem; will there not be danger that the finest article of tobacco will be cut up and marked smoking tobacco, and used by chewers all over the country as chewing tobacco? They may use it either for smoking or chewing. This fine-cut is frequently used for smoking purposes. It is put up for chewing, but gentlemen purchase it and smoke it, which they may very well do. If this great difference be made, is there not danger of fraud on the revenue?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will answer the Senator, not the slightest in the world. Chewing tobacco is manufactured; it is prepared; foreign substances are mixed with it. Any man who ever chewed tobacco must understand that thoroughly. Smoking tobacco is simply ground up and made up tobacco.

Mr. HENDERSON. Sweetened and perfumed?

Mr. CHANDLER. Not at all. There is not a thing put in with it; it is simply cut tobacco; while chewing tobacco is mixed with licorice and divers and sundry other commodities, and manufactured into an article that some men are foolish enough to put in their mouths. There is no such danger whatever as the Senator apprehends.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have two reasons for supporting the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. The first is, representing as I do a large tobacco-growing State, I wish to prevent any frauds on the revenue; and the other is, that twenty-five cents per pound upon it now is not more than twelve and a half was when we first levied this tax two years ago; and I believe, as I said before, the object ought to be to reduce the volume of currency as rapidly as possible.

Mr. POWELL. I was laboring under a misapprehension that the printed amendment was now before the Senate. However, the amendment proposed in writing does not materially differ from that I read. The one as written, to which the Senator from Michigan proposes an amendment, is this:

On smoking tobacco, manufactured with all the stem in, the leaf not having been butted or stripped from the stem, and on refuse tobacco known as fine-cut shorts, twenty-five cents per pound.

My own impression is that the reasons I assigned against the printed amendment apply equally to this. I do not think with the Senator from Missouri that the thing is changed. It only inserts the word "smoking" before "tobacco," and strikes out the words "not sweetened," and introduces the words "on refuse known as fine-cut shorts." That is all the difference.

Mr. HENDERSON. It may be sweetened, and this may be a very fine article.

Mr. POWELL. It does not say it shall be sweetened.

Mr. HENDERSON. It may be.

Mr. POWELL. Yes; but I do not think there is any material difference between the two provisions, the one printed and the other written.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Davis, Doolittle, Hale, Hicks, Howard, Johnson, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sumner, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cowan, Dixon, Harding, Lane of Indiana, McDougal, Nesmith, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Wiley, and Wright—11.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill on page 145, line four hundred and fifty-three, by striking out the word "cut" after the word "on," and in lines four hundred and fifty-four, four hundred and fifty-five, and four hundred and fifty-six, by striking out the following words:

And not sweetened or otherwise prepared, and on shorts or other refuse separated from fine-cut tobacco in the process of manufacture.

And to insert:

And not mixed with leaf or leaf and stem.

So that the clause will read:

On smoking tobacco, made exclusively of stems, and not mixed with leaf, or leaf and stem, fifteen cents per pound.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest to the Senator to strike out the words "or leaf and stems." It would be sufficient to say "made exclusively of stems and not mixed with leaf," because it shows there is a distinction drawn between the leaf and stem.

Mr. CLARK. I want to use those words, because they may grind up the leaf and stems together and attempt to mix them unless we insert these words.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is included without them.

Mr. CLARK. I do not want them to mix any tobacco with these stems. This is smoking tobacco.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the words "fifteen cents per pound" the words "and on shorts."

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator that we have just adopted an amendment including shorts under the twenty-five cent tax. Shorts are in the other grade.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think it is a mistake if shorts are in the other grade.

Mr. CLARK. They are there.

Mr. CHANDLER. Shorts certainly cannot stand more than fifteen cents. They are the refuse or sweepings of the floor. I am told that large manufacturers find it very difficult to get rid of the shorts at any price. I will move the amendment to insert the words "and on shorts" before the words "fifteen cents per pound."

Mr. CLARK. We have just provided for fine-cut shorts, which are the same thing, under the twenty-five cent tax. Certainly we do not want to provide for them in both places, because that would only be a complication.

Mr. CHANDLER. If this amendment be adopted I will move to strike it out in the other clause.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there is nothing that opens a wider field for fraud than this matter of shorts. Some manufacturers can manufacture them very closely, so as to leave the mere refuse. Others can leave them with a great deal of very fine tobacco in, which makes a very good kind of smoking tobacco, and if we mean to protect the Government in that way we must impose a tax on shorts in the twenty-five cent grade, or else the door is entirely open for fraud.

Mr. CHANDLER. I beg the Senator's pardon. These shorts are the refuse of the fine-cut and are prepared for chewing. They are not suitable for smoking. It is true they sometimes smoke chewing tobacco, but it is not prepared for that purpose. I am informed by large manufacturers that these shorts accumulate very greatly upon their hands. One manufacturer told me that he had something like ten tons of them that had accumulated, and he could not get rid of them; they would not sell even for the duty you put upon them now. I think that is a very unjust discrimination. I hope the amendment to the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CLARK. There is no doubt that at times shorts and other kinds of tobacco will accumulate in the hands of certain manufacturers. For instance, a man gets one hundred hogheads of tobacco, and he is a manufacturer of chewing tobacco. He selects all that will do for chewing tobacco, and then he has the rest on hand. It is for the interest of that man to have the tax on refuse tobacco as low as it can possibly be made. I know very well the interest that the Senator represents. But there are other people who would select out the best kind and have a very excellent quality of shorts with a great deal of what you may call fine-cut in it; and if that is put into the low grade it will undoubtedly lead to fraud. You cannot have it in both places. It is necessary to put it into that grade which will protect the revenue. We thought at first of putting it into the higher grade of chewing tobacco, but afterwards, on a fuller consideration of the subject, we thought it had better go into the middle grade; that that was the proper place to put it, and we put it there. It is not a matter that has escaped the attention of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWARD. I desire to ask of the Senator from New Hampshire whether pure stems is the only kind of smoking tobacco which this bill recognizes?

Mr. CLARK. No, we have a grade very much better than that, which we have been discussing this morning.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the tax on it?

Mr. CLARK. Twenty-five cents per pound. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I simply desire to say now that all the provisions in regard to cigars will have to be amended, because, as they are left by the House bill, the assessor can fix two rates of tax, and they run one into another; but I am not quite prepared with the amendment at this time. I may desire, if the bill is not immediately passed, to call the attention of the Senate to it by and by.

Mr. CHANDLER. In line four hundred and sixty-four of section ninety-three, on page 145, I move to strike out "seven," and insert "eight."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the clause which he proposes to amend is itself an amendment, which has been agreed to in committee, and therefore it is not now subject to amendment. It will, however, be subject to amendment in the Senate on the question of concurring in that amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have a small amendment to propose of page 170, by inserting before the word "circulation," in line sixty-one of section one hundred and thirteen, the word "average;" so as to read "all newspapers whose average circulation does not exceed fifteen hundred copies."

Mr. POMEROY. We have amended that section once, and I should like to know how it stands.

Mr. BUCKALEW. We made it fifteen hundred copies instead of two thousand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. In line ninety-four of section ninety-three, on page 130, I move to strike out "one cent" and insert "two cents;" so as to make the clause read:

On ground coffee, and on all ground substitutes for coffee, or preparations of which coffee forms a part, and on all unground substitutes for coffee, a duty of two cents per pound.

We charge a very high duty on pure coffee, and there are a great many vile concoctions in the shape of ground coffee that are sold as substitutes for coffee. There is an immense profit on these products. Nobody knows what he gets when he buys them. They purport to be coffee when often there is not a single grain of coffee in a pound. These preparations will bear a duty as high as coffee and ought to pay as high a duty as coffee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know enough about the subject to say that the Senator is not right, and that the tax may not be raised somewhat; but in the course of the investigation upon the subject two years ago, when we passed the original act, the matter came under the examination of the Committee on Finance, and we became satisfied that all these substitutes for coffee were not so injurious to the community as many people suppose. We understand that the business is carried on by regular manufacturers; and what they buy is perfectly understood by those who purchase at retail. It is divided off into bins; one contains rye, another chicory perhaps, and so on through the various substitutes for coffee. Persons who want the article buy at a price according to the mixture that is made. None of them is unwholesome. They make a substitute for coffee which the poorer class of the community purchase and get along with very well. They do not have the pure article as people of more ability to pay have, but still they get an article which serves their purpose very well as a drink.

I understand that the cultivation of the article of chicory which is used very largely has already been commenced in this country. We now import a great deal of it, and it pays a very considerable duty; if I mistake not six or seven hundred thousand dollars; but I am not quite certain as to the amount. Instead of being injurious, it has been decided by medical examination to be in reality healthful and useful, and it serves a very considerable purpose.

Now if it is true—and I have every reason to believe it is true—that none of the articles which are used as substitutes for coffee are injurious, but on the contrary are beneficial and are only a cheaper kind which the poorer classes and those less able to pay use in place of coffee because they cannot afford the pure article as others can, it is hardly worth while to designate it as miserable stuff or to tax it beyond what it should reasonably bear as an article of manufacture. How far the tax can go without imposing a duty too onerous upon such a manufacture is a question for the Senate to consider.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is it taxed now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is taxed one cent a pound by this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Was it taxed by the former bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir; and the Senator from Michigan proposes to double the tax, on the ground, as I understand him, that the substitutes for coffee are deleterious articles and very profitable to the manufacturer and will bear this high rate of taxation on the manufacture. If his experience and knowledge are such that he can make that assertion to the Senate of his own knowledge, I really do not possess sufficient information to contradict him, although such information as the committees of both Houses had would lead them to suppose that a duty of one cent a pound on these articles is all that ought to be laid. It is, however, for the Senate to judge.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no practical experience in this matter, but I am informed, by those who know, that the profits upon these preparations are enormous. It is a very common thing now for a farmer to go to his grocer and buy say ten pounds of barley and two pounds of the very best coffee, burn them both, and grind them, thus preparing a very fair substitute for coffee. But when these preparations are made by the grinders of these substitutes and sold, the producers do not know what they get and do not know what they are paying for. That is well understood by the grinders, and they charge enormous profits. They assert that a preparation is one half coffee and charge accordingly, when it is not one tenth coffee. I am told by those who know and in whose judgment I have faith and confidence, that these preparations will bear a tax of two cents a pound.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move in the ninety-seventh line of the ninety-third section, on page 130, to strike out "one cent" and insert "two cents;" so as to make the clause read:

On ground pepper, ground mustard, ground pimento, ground cloves, and ground clove stems, ground cassia, and ground ginger, and all imitations of the same, a duty of two cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that would be hardly advisable. Is the Senator aware what percentage that would be on the manufactured article? These are all manufactures.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not aware what the percentage would be.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The bill throughout, with some special exceptions, is calculated at about five per cent. on manufactures. These articles are for convenience sold ground, and we put a tax on them because they are sold in that way; but if you raise the tax so high as not to make it advisable or to the interest of men to prepare them as manufactures, these articles will be prepared by people at home for themselves, and we shall defeat our own object by still stopping the manufacture, whereas by putting on a low duty we can get a revenue out of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. My attention has been called to this matter, and I am told that this is a very profitable branch of business and will bear a tax.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that one cent a pound on ground cloves would be very small.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Does not the Senator know that the duty on cloves which is paid by the importer is very high?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This is simply on the process of grinding, one cent a pound on the process of manufacture by grinding. The fact that the article is valuable does not make any difference in this view of the case, because the question is whether you will get something or nothing out of the manufacture.

Mr. GRIMES. Perhaps I ought to have preceded what I said by repeating a conversation which was occurring around me, that this would be a larger percentage than five per cent. on the manufacture of the article. I say it will not begin to be five per cent. on ground cloves, although it may be five per cent. on the article of ground mustard.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask the Senator if he knows how much is added to the value of a pound of pepper by grinding it.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not think there is much added except in the extraneous matter that is added by the men who grind it, just as there is in grinding coffee. That is the way the addition is made. If they ground it pure, there would not be anything added to it; but hardly any of these articles such as cloves are ground pure, I apprehend, although mustard may be ground pure. I imagine that with most of these articles foreign substances are mixed in the process of grinding. I am not particular about this amendment; I do not know that one cent a pound is too little; but in regard to the other proposition upon which we have just voted relative to ground coffee, I should like to put on five cents.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to amend the ninety-third section, in line four hundred and fifty-two, on page 144, by striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "forty-five." That is in the clause relative to manufactured tobacco. By an amendment adopted last night, there was an invidious distinction made between plug and cut tobacco. The duty upon fine-cut was raised from thirty-five to forty-five cents. The effect of my amendment will be to raise the same revenue from cavendish, plug, and twist that you now raise upon fine-cut. There should be no distinction between the two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the clause to which he refers has been already stricken out and another clause inserted in lieu of it, and therefore his amendment is not now in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I must wait until the bill gets into the Senate, I suppose.

Mr. JOHNSON. I propose to amend a part of the ninety-third section, which will be found on page 140, lines three hundred and forty-six and three hundred and forty-seven, by striking out the word "five" and inserting "three." As the clause now stands it imposes a duty of five per cent. ad valorem on quicksilver. I have very good reasons for believing that that will be a most ruinous tax. This interest can afford to pay three per cent., although there is some doubt about that. It is very important to the development of gold and silver in California, particularly of gold, that quicksilver should be made as cheap as it can be made, and in order to accomplish that it is necessary that the development of quicksilver mines should be encouraged rather than discouraged. It is possible that the large mines now in operation might be able to bear a heavy tax of this kind, but there are now being discovered in California, and Oregon too, I believe, certainly in California, a variety of other mines, which promise a fair remuneration to the discoverers if they can be worked at anything like a moderate expense, and it is very important to us that we should encourage them, so that we may compete with the quicksilver mines of Spain.

From information which I have, and on which I think reliance may be placed, considering the sources from which I get it, it seems to me that a duty of five per cent. is rather more than it would be politic to impose. The Senators from California, perhaps, are in possession of information on this subject, and I appeal to the one whom I have the pleasure to see before me on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. CONNESS:] the other Senator not being now in his seat, whether a tax of three per cent. would not be as great a tax as, under all the circumstances, this particular article should have imposed upon it.

Mr. CONNESS. As has been stated by the honorable Senator from Maryland, quicksilver is used very largely for mining purposes, and the tax of five per cent. here imposed, in addition to being a tax upon quicksilver, is also a tax on the production of gold and silver. There is no gold or silver extracted from ore without the use of quicksilver. There is one great quicksilver producing mine in California, the New Almaden mine, that we have all heard of. A tax of five per cent., although it would be a very heavy tax on them, I have no doubt the proprietors of that mine could well afford to pay. But it is unlike a tax on gold. While the value of gold is established by law, and any tax applied to it is so much taken away from it, and cannot be added to its value to the consumer, the contrary is the fact with quicksilver, and in that respect it is like any manufacture. If five per cent. should be imposed as a tax upon quicksilver it would simply be put by the producer of quicksilver upon its price, and added to the cost of the production of gold.

But the chief impolicy of the tax as it is proposed in this clause of the bill, is that while the proprietors of the New Almaden mine could afford to pay the tax, it would perhaps effectually stop many experiments that are being made in California in the production of quicksilver. There is a company in the Napa valley, not far from Napa, that have been operating for nearly three years past, and they are still in operation, but they have never produced any considerable amount of quicksilver yet. They are mining and producing the ore and endeavoring to reduce it. There are many others. A tax of five per cent. on them would have the effect, probably, of stopping their works.

I think that if the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance would give his attention to it, if the matter were allowed to be passed over now until we get into the Senate, the provision might be reconstructed so as to give us quite as much tax as the five per cent. amount, and a much more just one as applied to those engaged in experimental effort in producing quicksilver. My opinion decidedly is that this particular provision should be reconstructed. I have explained that the tax on quicksilver, whatever it may be, will be added to the cost of the production of gold, and to that extent it is an indirect tax on that production. I will say that I am in favor of indirect provisions for taxing that product, because I think it is the most unobjectionable way. I do not make so much complaint of that; but I suggest that a duty should not be imposed upon companies who do not produce quicksilver enough to pay their expenses. The experiments that are being made to produce quicksilver by other companies than the New Almaden, should be encouraged rather than the contrary, because that company now has a pretty thorough monopoly of the quicksilver in the American market, and in addition sends its quicksilver all over the world. If it be not voted upon now, I think the matter should be taken into consideration when we get into the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If this amendment be withdrawn now it can be moved again in the Senate.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Before that is done I wish to suggest an amendment that I desire to propose, in order that the chairman of the Finance Committee may consider it. I propose to leave this clause as it stands, but to add the words "on the gross proceeds less the cost of production, such proceeds and cost of production to be ascertained and determined by such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury." A tax of five per cent. would not be objected to if it was upon the results of the mine. The five per cent. as it stands in the bill is equal to fifteen per cent. on the net proceeds of the mine. Two per cent. on the gross proceeds would be six per cent. on the net. This interest has always been favored by the Mexican Government, and premiums awarded by the Junta de Minería of Mexico for the purpose of developing quicksilver mines, quicksilver being essential to the production of gold and silver. That has been considered a matter of policy on the part of the Spanish Government and the Mexican Government, and should be by our Government. A tax of five per cent. on the net proceeds would not be objected to; and I think the amendment which I have suggested is in such form as to accomplish that object. But even three per cent., as suggested by the Senator from Maryland, would be too much as a tax upon gross proceeds. The working of quicksilver mines is a very expensive business; and according to the best information I have, the five per cent. as it is in the bill would be about fifteen per cent. on the net proceeds. I suggest the amendment now; I do not care about taking it up until the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Maryland will withdraw his amendment, and we can consider the question after the bill shall be reported to the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well, I withdraw it.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose an amendment to the one hundred and second section of the bill on page 155. That section as it now stands imposes a duty of two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts of railroads and steamboats. I propose to amend the section so as to embrace all common carriers, to impose a duty of two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts of all persons and corporations engaged in carrying passengers or freight. This amendment if adopted will, in my judgment, add perhaps millions to the receipts of the Government under this bill, and I am quite aware that it will affect more largely my own constituents than the people of any other State; but such is my confidence in their patriotism and their willingness to contribute their full share to the revenues of the Government in this crisis, that I believe I shall secure their commendation rather than their censure for moving this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, to strike out all after the word "that," in line one of section one hundred and two, down to and including the word "respectively" in line twenty-one, and to insert the following in lieu thereof:

Every person, firm, company, or corporation, owning or possessing, or having the care or management of any railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal-boat, or other vessel, or any stage-coach or other vehicle engaged or employed in the business of transporting passengers or property for hire, or in transporting the mails of the United States, or any canal the water of which is used for mining purposes, shall be subject to pay a duty of two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts of such railroad, canal, steamboat, ship, barge, canal boat, or other vessel, or such stage-coach or other vehicle: Provided, That the duty hereby imposed shall not be charged upon any vessel exclusively engaged in carrying persons or property or both to or from any port of the United States to or from any foreign port.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would ask the honorable member from New York whether the description of common carriers embraced by his amendment, and not embraced by this section of the bill as it stands, is not already taxed in some other portion of the bill. I rather think so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Express companies are.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are common carriers.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are provided for by the next section.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will they not be included in this too?

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not own the roads or vehicles in which they transport goods.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the amendment be read again. I do not know that I understand it thoroughly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read again.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Now I submit to the honorable member from New York that that embraces express companies, which are already embraced in the next section of the bill as it stands. The express companies, most of them if not all of them, own the carriages in which they carry their freight, and at times they carry passengers, I believe. They own the boats in which they transport freight through the canals, and they use the cars on several railroads in which they carry the freight upon the railroads; and they are taxed in a succeeding part of the bill. They will be found to be taxed in the one hundred and third section on pages 156 and 157. If it be proper to amend the bill as proposed by the honorable member from New York, the express companies ought to be excepted in some way or other from that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think this amendment covers express companies.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot make myself understood. I know they are not described by this section of the bill as it stands, and are therefore only taxed by the one hundred and third section, which appears on pages 156 and 157; but as the Senator from New York proposes to amend by striking out the one hundred and second section as it stands, and proposes an amendment in relation to common carriers, he includes express companies, because he applies it to all companies who own the vehicles in which they carry freight, and as I have just stated that is the case with most of the express companies as regards the cars which they run upon the railroads. They pay the railroads for the privilege of running their cars, but the cars themselves are theirs.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can say "except express companies."

Mr. JOHNSON. "Except express companies as included in the next section."

Mr. HARRIS. I had proposed myself to amend the next section so as to make the duty upon express companies the same, two and a half per cent., as upon other common carriers. It seems to me there is no difficulty about that.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all I want to guard against, and that I am sure is the purpose of the Senator, because it is just in itself that they should not be taxed twice.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly not.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, I will suggest to him to amend this amendment so as to have a tax of two and one half per cent. on all common carriers upon whom no duty is assessed by any other provision of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was about to suggest such a modification to the honorable mover.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will remark that for one reason that may seem unimportant to Senators, it is better to leave the provision in two sections. There are many references in this bill to such and such a section of the bill, and any derangement of the sections may produce embarrassment. Therefore it is as well to have two sections, one in regard to common carriers, the other in regard to express companies.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I have no objection to; but I do not want express companies taxed twice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is the Senator as a lawyer apprehensive that if we should adopt the amendment and then leave the next section as it stands, the result would be to put five and one half per cent. on express companies, two and one half per cent. by this amendment and three per cent. by the next section?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am afraid of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Under no possible construction could it be done, because the two are distinguished by the act; but the Senator can reach it very well by simply saying "except express companies."

Mr. JOHNSON. That is what I propose. If we are about to adopt the amendment proposed by the honorable member from New York, I will make again a suggestion that I made some days ago in relation to this subject, and I think the propriety of the change which I am about to state will address itself at once to the Senate. By the section as it now stands and as it will stand if it should be amended as proposed by the honorable member from New York, you tax steamboats two and a half per cent. on their gross proceeds. There is a line of steamboats—and that is the case in other sections than in the section to which I am about to refer—that runs from Baltimore to Philadelphia and to New York by the inland water route. They go through the Chesapeake and Delaware canal and through the Delaware and Raritan canal, and they have to pay for going through each of those canals the tolls which those canal companies are authorized to charge and do charge. They pay, therefore, say in the course of a year in running to Philadelphia—it is much larger than the sum I am about to state, I am sure—several thousand dollars to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal; but before they pay it and as the fund with which they pay it, they receive it from their customers. A man who wants his goods carried from Baltimore to Philadelphia or from Philadelphia to Baltimore, and in the same way as between New York and Baltimore, and Philadelphia and New York, has to pay a sum made up of what the steamboat owner ought to receive and is to keep as profit for his own investment in his own boats and for his own disbursement, and in addition the amount that the owner has to pay to the canals through which his boat has to pass. He gets, therefore, from his customer when he leaves New York or where ever the money is paid, a sum made up of these two items, his own charge proper and a sum in addition to his own charge proper which he wants in order to meet the expense of going through the canal. It is true that that ought to be taxed in some form or other; but if you tax the owners of the boats upon their gross receipts, you tax in part what they pay to the canal proprietors, and then you have in another portion of the bill a tax upon the gross receipts of the canal, so that if the canal receives in the course of a year $100,000 from these steamboat owners you tax two and a half per cent. upon that $100,000 as against the steamboat owners and you tax the same $100,000 as against the proprietors of the canal, which is obviously a double tax. I had intended when the proper time should arrive—and it is not improper to suggest it now—to add to the section of the bill which contains the tax this proviso:

Provided, That steamers traversing canals in whole or in part, shall be allowed a deduction in the return of their gross receipts of such sum as may be paid by them for toll.

It seems to me that would be proper, because supposing now that they pay in toll one half of the gross receipts which come into their possession, your tax upon them of two and a half per cent. upon gross proceeds is virtually a tax upon them of five per cent. upon what belongs to them, and if you tax the canal proprietors two and a half per cent. on that half which they receive, you levy a tax of five per cent. upon that sum, which would seem to be unjust.

The injustice, if it be unjust, (and I think it is not what the Senate designs to do,) may be avoided by authorizing the companies whose steamboats go through the canals, and have to pay toll, to be allowed a deduction out of their gross receipts, of the amount which they may have to pay in the way of toll.

Mr. POMEROY. I like a portion of this amendment of the Senator from New York, but I think there are some portions of it that should be changed. It ought to be remarked that not all expresses are express companies. There are only perhaps five large express companies, and yet there are in this country nearly five hundred expresses. There are said to be four hundred and fifty expresses in this country and only a very few express companies, and this provision bears equally and hard on those small expresses that run for the accommodation of our people out of the cities a little way, and in the cities carry packages for the accommodation of persons who purchase goods. While I think the express companies can bear a tax, and perhaps a large tax, it would be very heavy on these small expresses, and these small expresses outnumber the express companies as one to one hundred.

Again, there is in this amendment of the Senator from New York two and a half per cent. tax upon the gross receipts of all the stage companies. In the old States stage companies have passed away; staging is done away with pretty much; but in the new States stage-coaches are quite an institution. Senators are aware that all the mails are contracted to be carried under what are called star bids; that is, the contractors can carry the mails without having stage coaches for passengers, but the people in the community insist in almost all instances that those who get a contract to carry the mail under a star bid shall carry it in coaches; and they influence them in various ways to put on coaches. Under this amendment of the Senator from New York the receipts of coaches for carrying passengers are to be taxed two and a half per cent., which will discourage the putting on of coaches, and in the new States in some instances perhaps will entirely destroy them.

Then in the third place there is a large stage interest that runs across the continent called "the overland stage." Two and a half per cent. on the gross receipts of that company, of course, would be very large. That is particularly objectionable at this time, because they are carrying that mail at a most enormous expense. They have to do their business in the western part of the country on a gold basis, and are receiving for compensation the currency of the country, which is very far depreciated below gold. Then, again, to support their stages, they are paying a most fabulous price now in the vicinity of the Rocky mountains in consequence of the great immigration there to the mines; they are paying more than ten dollars a bushel for oats and corn, and to put on the gross receipts of such a company as that two and a half per cent. would be most onerous and burdensome. But I do not care so much for that company as for the new States where we are trying to induce those who carry the mails to carry them in coaches for the accommodation of the people. The influence of this tax will be to drive the coaches off, and the contractors can carry the mails under star bids on horseback or mules. If they do that, the community will get none of the benefits of having coaches. I suppose the Senators from the old States where they have got through using coaches, perhaps will see no point in this.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suggest to the gentleman that in the town in which I live we have thirty coaches a week out and in.

Mr. POMEROY. In States where the roads are well made and where there is a regular established coach business, where it is not starting the thing anew, the stage-coaches may bear this extra tax; but in a new country where the population is so sparse that it is almost impossible to support a stage-coach, and where they have the right to carry the mail on the back of a mule, it will drive off the coaches entirely, and that will be a great inconvenience to our people.

Mr. GRIMES. There may be some companies in the State of Kansas that may be driven out, but I have never come across any such in that portion of the West which I have known, so far as my experience for about thirty years in staging has gone, and I have done a good deal of it in that time. They charge amply sufficient to afford to pay this percentage, and will be only inclined to add the percentage to the amount they have heretofore charged. I do not know a reason why stage companies should not pay their proportion of the revenue in this shape just as well as any other companies, just as well as railroad companies. Every other class of the community is compelled to pay its proportion.

Mr. POMEROY. I have been through the State of Iowa two or three times in stage-coaches, and I confess I think they can stand a tax there very well.

Mr. GRIMES. One of them is one of the richest companies and one of the most profitable companies in the world. I think they can afford to pay taxes as well as other people.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish simply to say in regard to this amendment offered by the honorable Senator from New York that I believe with him, that if adopted it will add a very considerable sum to the revenue—how much I do not know—and as I do not see anything wrong about it, I am rather under obligations to him for proposing the amendment. At any rate I do not see any such objections as would induce me to oppose it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I feel obliged again to bring to the attention of the Senate my constituents who are engaged in the manufacture of leather mittens—

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask the Senator if he does not propose to make a motion in reference to the next section, concerning the express companies.

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir; I will first attend to that. In section one hundred and three, I move to strike out "three" in line three and to insert "two and a half."

Mr. SUMNER. I venture to suggest to my friend from New York, while he is engaged in amending that section, to go still further and to decrease the tax to two per cent., which is what it was in the last act. The Senator is aware that the income tax in the bill now under consideration, applicable to express companies, is increased. By the clause under consideration it is proposed also to increase the direct tax upon express companies. The communications that I receive from my part of the country go to show that the business cannot bear this increased tax, being a double increase, first on the income, and secondly on this direct tax. I would suggest, while we have this subject under consideration, the propriety of reducing the tax from three per cent. to two per cent.; that would make it what it was made two years ago.

Mr. HARRIS. I think it is desirable to secure uniformity in these taxes as much as possible, to equalize them; indeed I think the bill in that respect is in some parts of it objectionable. I have offered this amendment to charge the same duty upon those engaged in the express business as upon other common carriers. It is for that reason that I have moved to make the duty two and a half per cent., the same as is proposed in the preceding section on other common carriers; I prefer, therefore, that it should be two and a half rather than two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York to strike out "three" and to insert "two and a half."

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to inquire whether the words "express business" embrace all the expresses of the country?

Mr. HARRIS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "Any person, company, or corporation carrying on or doing an express business" is the language.

Mr. POMEROY. That includes them all.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. In the one hundred and second section I think there should be an amendment in the twenty-third line by inserting the word "ferry" after the words "toll road." There are a great many little ferries in the country which earn nothing; they are a convenience to the community, but really bring in no income.

Mr. POMEROY. I think it would be an improvement to say "ferry-boats." There are a thousand little streams where we run a rope ferry to accommodate individuals; and some of our manufacturing establishments have conveniences to ferry across in hand-boats. Do you mean to tax them? A ferry-boat propelled by steam, or something recognized by the committee, I think properly should be taxed; but I do not believe we ought to go down and tax every one of these ferries.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator had read the provision he would see that his remark does not apply. It is, "any toll road, ferry, or bridge, authorized by law to receive toll."

Mr. POMEROY. I do not know but that these others are authorized to receive toll.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. This amendment will require that the same word should be inserted after the words "toll road," in the twenty-fifth line.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "ferry" will be inserted in that place in order to make the section consistent.

Mr. HARRIS. I now ask the attention of the Senate to the amendment I propose in relation to the manufacturers of gloves and mittens. On page 141, line three hundred and seventy-one of section ninety-three, I move to insert after the word "oil" the words "and kid;" so as to read "on oil and kid-dressed leather," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is already in the three hundred and sixtieth line a duty on kid of five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. HARRIS. The duty in the three hundred and sixtieth line I have no objection to; let that stand; that is on kid skins.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On kid "tanned or dressed in the rough."

Mr. HARRIS. There is a peculiar mode of dressing sheep skins which is called kid-dressing. It is a mode of dressing sheep skins for the purpose of manufacturing gloves.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that is hardly fair. I do not say that for the Senator, but for the gentleman whom he represents in this matter. That gentleman has been about here for the last three or four weeks; a very clever gentleman he is, I should think; I have not a word to say against him. He proposed, in the first place, to insert "kid." It is because it comes in competition with him that he wants it. He does not make it.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly he does.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why does he want the duty put on? He has been protesting against the duty all along.

Mr. HARRIS. I am going to offer another amendment in a moment to correspond with it.

The fact is that there is a county in the State of New York the inhabitants of which are chiefly engaged in the manufacture of gloves and mittens, a very industrious people, who are paying a very considerable revenue to the Government. This is the process: they take mostly sheep skins; they get such deer skins as they can, but they cannot get enough for their purpose. Most of these sheep skins are imported from the Cape of Good Hope, the south of Africa, and pay to the Government an import duty of fifteen per cent. now. They take the sheep skins and dress them; some of them are what are called oil-dressed, and they are manufactured into that article known in the market as leather mittens. Some of them are "kid-dressed, another mode of manufacture which gives them the color and appearance of gloves, and they manufacture them into gloves. There is the oil-dressed sheep skin and the kid-dressed sheep skin. The one is manufactured into leather mittens, the other is manufactured into gloves, a coarse kind of glove, but a glove that is sold and used considerably now, not as fine as the imported glove, but a useful glove. This is the article they are manufacturing. They purchase these sheep skins, they dress these sheep skins, and then they themselves manufacture them into gloves and mittens. Now, what they desire and what I on their behalf desire is that they shall be taxed upon their manufacture, upon their gloves and mittens. They take these skins from the importer, they dress them, oil-dress them or kid-dress them, and cut them up and work them up into mittens and gloves, and then put them into the market.

There is no reason in the world why they should be first taxed upon the skins that they have dressed and then taxed again upon their gloves and mittens. That is all there is about it. They are willing to pay one tax, and let Congress put upon them such tax as it sees fit. They do not object to that. The tax now is three per cent. upon their manufacture. It is proposed to put five per cent. upon it by this bill. If that is not enough, put on more; but do not tax it twice, that is all. They manufacture the article, they import the sheep skin, or they purchase the deer skin wherever they can get it. They dress it, and then themselves make it up into gloves and mittens. I propose to add the word "kid" where I have suggested, and then I shall propose this provision further:

Provided, That when the manufacturer of such leather or skins shall use the same in the manufacture of gloves, mittens, or moccasins, the duty shall be charged upon such gloves, mittens, or moccasins, and not upon the leather or skin used in the manufacture.

It is just taking the ad valorem price of the article they put into the market and charging them the duty upon that article, but not charging them with a duty upon the material out of which they make it before they manufacture it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the word "kid" is not put in, and the other provision suggested by the Senator from New York be made, the effect will be that these manufacturers will pay only five per cent., because they will pay nothing on the raw material. The Senate will see that now it speaks of "oil-dressed leather and deer skins." The Senator from New York would make the Senate believe, or rather the gentleman who makes these representations to him, that they want "kid" put in. For what purpose? Certainly it would seem to get the tax on kid. At present it is out; there is no tax on it. The reason why they want it put in is that they fear the competition of kid in some way, and they want to impose the same tax upon it when dressed in that way. This gentleman wrote me a note in which he proposed in the first place to put in "kid" as being of advantage to him. Then he wrote me a note in which he said, "If you will only put in the words 'when sold or removed for sale' I will not ask you to put in 'kid.'" That we acceded to, and now he gets the Senator from New York to move to put "kid" in.

Mr. HARRIS. He told me that, and I suggested to him the trouble. He made that bargain with you undoubtedly, but the trouble is here: there is a provision in this bill of which he was not aware, which entirely destroys the effect of that amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is that provision?

Mr. HARRIS. It is on page 126, as he understood your amendment and as I have understood it; but for this provision on page 126, in section ninety-two, all would have gone well.

Provided, That whenever a producer or manufacturer—

Like this man is—

shall use, or shall remove for consumption or use, any articles, goods, wares, or merchandise, which if removed for sale would be liable to taxation, he shall be assessed upon the salable value of the articles, goods, wares, or merchandise so used or so removed for consumption or use.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was stated also, and in order to prevent that and make it perfectly clear what that proviso means I have had the word "used" struck out and the word "consumed" put in; that is to say, if he consumes them himself, to apply precisely the same rule to these manufacturers as to all others, that they shall pay a duty on what they consume for their own purposes. That is all it means.

Mr. HARRIS. So far as it has been construed by the Commissioner, it means that the consumer of these skins for the purpose of manufacturing them into gloves and mittens pays a tax on the skins consumed, the skins worked up, and then the provision in a preceding clause of this same section provides that he shall pay a tax on gloves and mittens manufactured. It is a double tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be so and it should be so. There is not a tax levied upon articles of that kind that is not a double tax. Take manufacturers of leather they pay a tax on the leather in the first place, and then they pay a tax on the boots and shoes manufactured. You do not deduct the first tax. So it is with a great number of articles. What these gentlemen want and what they get by the amendment we made, and I am satisfied the amendment is wrong—

Mr. HARRIS. I am, too.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It ought to be struck out.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not think it amounts to anything.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They ought to pay the double tax as much as anybody else. The fact is in regard to them that they stand in an anomalous position. Instead of making the raw material, as many other persons do, and then paying a tax on it and selling it as raw material to the person who buys it and makes it up, and pays another tax, they work up their own raw material into gloves or mittens. Although everybody else, where an article in process of manufacture goes through two different hands, pays ten per cent., these people, because they not only prepare the raw material but manufacture it themselves, want to get off with paying five per cent. That is their object, and that gives them a monopoly of the market. The thing itself is not just. I would not have said anything about it if they had not chosen, after we have endeavored to examine this matter, to push it still further. I do not see any reason in the world why they should be exempted from the same kind of tax that others are subject to, and I am opposed to all the amendments that the Senator proposes.

Mr. HARRIS. The effect of this provision as it now stands is to tax these manufacturers ten per cent. on their products.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Very well; many others are taxed ten per cent.

Mr. HARRIS. Two years ago in the old bill it was provided that they should pay a tax of three per cent. on skins manufactured, and then that they should pay an additional tax upon the increased value when they were converted into gloves. To that I have no objection; that is fair; that is what is provided in other cases in this bill; but it is severe and I think unjustly severe; it is an unjust discrimination against these manufacturers to tax them ten per cent.; it is hard on their manufacture. It is not what is done in another case, I apprehend, in this bill; at any rate I have not seen it. It would be far better, I would prefer, that you should say at once, if the Senate mean to do it, that they shall be taxed upon their gloves and mittens ten per cent.; but the Senate would not be willing to do that, and yet indirectly they are doing just that thing.

Mr. CLARK. Let me suggest to the Senator from New York that there are parties in the country who manufacture the gloves that do not manufacture the leather.

Mr. HARRIS. No, sir.

Mr. CLARK. I beg the Senator's pardon. I know it.

Mr. HARRIS. Nineteen twentieths of this business is done in one county in New York.

Mr. CLARK. I know parties who manufacture the gloves without manufacturing the leather.

Mr. HARRIS. Where do they get the leather from?

Mr. CLARK. There is an establishment in my own State. They buy it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Under my own eyes at home large quantities are manufactured in that way.

Mr. CLARK. Where one party manufactures the leather, he will have to pay a tax on leather, and another party who manufactures gloves will have to pay the tax on gloves, which makes ten per cent. altogether. If these people choose to do both, they should pay ten per cent.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I moved yesterday, but it was then out of order, to strike out the words "when sold or removed for sale" from this paragraph of the section. To accomplish the object I have in view, it would be perhaps more strictly in order to wait until the bill shall have been reported to the Senate and then to move the amendment which I moved yesterday; but inasmuch as this whole subject is now under consideration and the object is to understand the effect of this paragraph in all its bearings, it may be perhaps as well now to consider it. It may perhaps be more appropriate and more convenient to have a full understanding of the whole matter now than to postpone it until the motion may properly be made at a later period, and by an understanding now perhaps we may arrive at an adjustment of the paragraph in the way in which it should be corrected.

This exception which it is sought on the part of the Senator from New York to apply to a certain branch of trade in a certain county of his State also applies to other very important branches of trade in each one of the northern States of this Union. He has a particular interest in this manufacture of mittens, gloves, &c., and the paragraph exempts from a duty all oil-dressed leather as well as deer skins, and the operation of the section is very extensive, very unjust, and very unequal, because it makes a particular discrimination between classes of manufacturers who are equally meritorious. The clause in this section that all this kind of leather shall be exempt from this duty of five per cent. ad valorem "when sold or removed for sale," creates the exception which has already been referred to. This exception is in behalf of the man who manufactures gloves and mittens who is also the manufacturer of the skins or the article out of which they are made. It does not stop there, but it goes on and exempts all the oil-dressed leather, and all the harness and all the shoes and everything of that kind made in this country out of oil-dressed leather from the tax or duty of five per cent. ad valorem in the hands of the man who manufactures the oil-dressed leather into harness and into shoes; whereas his competitor in the same town in the manufacture of harness and shoes who does not manufacture the original oil-dressed leather has a duty of ten per cent. imposed on his business, because there is a duty of five per cent. imposed on the leather itself, which is not made up to the man who makes it, and then five per cent. afterwards on the manufacture.

I can state a case. Boots and shoes I have mentioned. I know of a very large manufactory of cavalry belts and things of that kind; I know two of them in one town supplying in a great measure the Army. One of those manufacturers of cavalry belts manufactures the leather himself. Mr. A does that, and he has to pay a duty of but five per cent. Mr. B, who buys the leather for the purpose of manufacturing it into belts, has to pay a duty of five per cent on the leather, and he is also subject to a duty of five per cent. on his manufacture, so that you make a discrimination between two manufacturers in the same town in the same branch of business, simply because one has a little more capital than the other, and one is enabled to manufacture the original stock which the second man has to purchase and pay for. I do not see the reason or propriety of that.

Then, again, there is another discrimination in favor of this kind of business or manufacture as between the person who is exempted from this duty of five per cent. being the manufacturer of the original stock and all other branches of manufacture in this country which do not come within the category of this paragraph, and which are equally entitled to consideration when we come to lay duties upon them, as the manufacture of mittens and gloves in the county referred to in the State of New York. Some of my constituents are as much interested in the manufacture of harness and boots and shoes as the constituents of the Senator from New York can be in the manufacture of mittens and gloves for the hand.

I think the whole section ought to be amended so as to correct this inequality, and I trust it may be done by abiding by the section as it was reported by the committee and striking out the provision which restricts the duty of five per cent. ad valorem on articles which are not sold before they are manufactured. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Davis, Harlan, Harris, Hicks, McDougall, Morgan, Powell, Ramsey, Saulsbury, Sumner, and Wiley—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Doollittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Morrill, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Grimes, Hale, Harding, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill, on page 230, by inserting after the word "acts," in line thirty-six; the words "on drawbacks the right to which has already accrued or which may hereafter accrue under said acts."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move to amend the bill on page 212, by inserting after the word "use," in line ten of section one hundred and sixty-two, the words "or record." In line five it speaks about these papers being "recorded or admitted or used in evidence," and in line twelve the "register or recorder" is spoken of. It is therefore necessary to insert the words "or record" after "use," in the tenth line.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. In the same section I move to insert after the word "stamp," in line seventeen, the words "or stamps," so as to agree with the residue of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I move also to amend section one hundred and sixty by striking out, in line one hundred and thirty-seven, the words "an affidavit has been made showing the reason why," and inserting "satisfactory proof has been made that." The section provides that stamps spoiled or rendered useless may be replaced by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on a mere affidavit—it does not say whose affidavit—being made that they cannot be returned. I merely wish to insert that satisfactory proof shall be made that they cannot be returned.

Mr. JOHNSON. Satisfactory proof to whom?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. To the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest that the words "to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue" be inserted.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The previous line speaks of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and therefore the insertion of the words "to him" will be sufficient.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The proof must be made to him and to nobody else, because he is the person authorized to perform the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia accept the modification of his amendment?

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Certainly; I have no objection to inserting the words "to him."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as modified.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to move two amendments on pages 90 and 92. There are in the large cities of the country, especially New York, a class of persons called bill brokers, whose business it is to sell, as agents, promissory notes and domestic bills. They are generally unfortunate merchants, who obtain a scanty and precarious living by the selling of these bills and notes. There may be, perhaps, in the city of New York a hundred of them, perhaps more. They receive a commission of one fourth of one per cent. for negotiating the sale of a promissory note. By the provisions of this bill they are taxed one twentieth of one per cent. The amount is reduced very considerably from what was proposed by the House of Representatives. This class of people, having no capital in business, obtaining in this way a very scanty and precarious living, are classed by this bill under the head of "brokers" like stock brokers, and are required to take out a license, and pay for it fifty dollars. My object is to transfer this class of persons from that class of brokers to commercial brokers, so that they will take out a twenty dollar license instead of a fifty dollar license. I know it is not a large affair, and yet it affects seriously a very worthy class of people, not numerous, but very worthy. My amendment, therefore, is to strike out the words "promissory notes or other securities," in line ninety-five of section seventy-eight, on page 90, and to insert those words in line one hundred and thirty-seven, on page 92, to transfer these bill brokers from the class of brokers to the class of commercial brokers for license purposes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I doubt the propriety of making that amendment. It may be that there are some few persons that do not do much business in that line, but there are a great many persons who do a very large business. If you could pick out the individuals whose business is so small, it might do to put a lower tax on them; but I am afraid we should let off a great many who do a very large business and who ought to pay more than is proposed under the head of commercial brokers. "Promissory notes or other securities" that covers a very large class.

Mr. HARRIS. I only propose to cover those engaged as dealers in promissory notes and domestic bills of exchange.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Domestic bills of exchange are a very large concern. I think it would be dangerous and lead to confusion to make the amendment. A great many persons would escape paying the license they ought to pay in consequence of it. It is unsafe to legislate for a few individuals. All these laws bear hard upon somebody, I suppose. I should like very much to relieve anybody that needs relief.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS. On page 12 I propose to offer two or three amendments. In line twenty-two of section fourteen, on page 12, I move to strike out all after the word "summon" to the end of the line. The words to be stricken out are "by subpoena to be served by any assistant assessor."

Mr. FESSENDEN. How would you have it served?

Mr. HARRIS. I would have a provision for that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator will offer his whole amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a very strong objection to the provisions of this section. I do not know but that arbitrary arrests are necessary in these times, but we are becoming quite too much familiarized to them. I object entirely to allowing an assessor or an assistant assessor when he thinks an individual has disobeyed the requirements of his summons to arrest him and take him before a public officer. It is an anomalous thing; it is not required; and I have endeavored so to amend this section as to avoid that great objection. The proposition that I submit is this: that the assessor, when he desires to examine a person in relation to the subject of examination, his income, his tax, whatever it may be, may summon him to appear before himself, that that summons may be served by the assistant assessor; and that if he disobeys that summons, if he fails to appear or refuses to appear, then upon an affidavit showing the facts he may apply to the district judge, or to a commissioner having the powers of a judge, at chambers for an attachment, in the ordinary way in which individuals are punished for disobeying legal process, and that the assessor shall not have the power himself without authority of law, except under the provisions of this section, without applying to a court or a judge, to arrest an individual and take him before a tribunal. I object entirely to this mode of giving authority to this class of persons to make an arrest without legal process. For that purpose I propose to strike out the clause I have mentioned, and I propose then to strike out from line thirty-two all the provision that has been inserted there, and to the end of line thirty-five, and to insert in lieu thereof these words—

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that after line thirty-two to the end of line thirty-five was an amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance which was not agreed to, and which, therefore, is not in the bill, but a substitute was inserted for it, which the Senator from New York can move to strike out in connection with other matter.

Mr. HARRIS. I propose to strike out all that has been inserted after the word "aforesaid" in line thirty-two down to the beginning of line thirty-six, whatever there is in the section between those two points, and to insert in lieu of those words:

Such summons may be served by any assistant assessor of the district. In case any person so summoned shall neglect or refuse to obey such summons according to its exigency, or to give testimony, or answer interrogatories as required, it shall be lawful for the assessor upon affidavit proving the facts to apply to the judge of the district court or a commissioner authorized to perform the duties of such judge at chambers, for an attachment against such person as for a contempt. It shall be the duty of such judge or commissioner to hear such application, and if satisfactory proof be made to issue an attachment directed to some proper officer for the arrest of such person; and upon his being brought before him, to proceed to a hearing of the case, and upon such hearing the judge or commissioner shall have power to make such order as he shall deem proper to enforce obedience to the requirement of the summons and punish such person for his default or disobedience.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the more simplicity and the more rapidity you have in these proceedings the better they are for the purpose which you wish to accomplish. My friend from New York spoke of arbitrary arrests. It is the first time I ever heard an arrest by process of law authorized by statute designated as an arbitrary arrest. I supposed that by "arbitrary arrest" was understood an arrest without any law at all.

Mr. HARRIS. Without process of law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. This process is legal when we make it legal by statute. The only question is, who shall issue the papers? The question here really depends altogether on this, whether the assessor shall himself issue a warrant for the arrest of the person, or whether in the first place he shall file an affidavit and take out a warrant from a court. It must be obvious to everybody that to require the latter will take longer time and make the proceeding much more expensive. As the section now stands, if the assessor arrests a person he must take him directly before a court of the United States for adjudication; he cannot make any adjudication himself. The difference between that and this amendment is that the amendment puts the assessor under the necessity of going to the court in the first instance for a warrant, and puts the Government of the United States to the expense of paying for a warrant and such expenses as may arise thereon and thereafter. The chance is that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, if the arrest of a man were ordered, he would produce the book and there would be no further expense. Once in a while you might find a contumacious individual who would refuse to do it until he was finally compelled to do it by imprisonment or other process.

It will be noticed that none of these proceedings can be had until after due notice. It is a section providing for a case where a man has been notified that his statement is not satisfactory, and he refuses to make any other. Then the section says that the assessor may notify him to produce his books, that they may be examined, and he then refuses to produce his books. He having in the first place refused to account, and then having refused to produce his books, it is provided that the assessor may issue his warrant and arrest him, and take him directly before a court for adjudication. Under such circumstances, is not that all that such a man has a right to demand? Is there any necessity for going to a court, in the first instance, with an affidavit to procure a warrant, and have it issued on a statement of the facts? I think it would embarrass and delay the whole matter, and create unnecessary expense.

I may add what I said once before to the Senate in another connection, that men who have practiced law in courts as long as the Senator from New York and myself, and especially men who have had the additional advantage which he has had and I have not had of administering the law as a judge, are too apt, in my judgment, to attach undue consequence to the regular form of proceeding to which they have been accustomed. In my judgment, it is necessary in cases of this kind, and under statutes of this kind, in some degree to disregard that lengthy form of proceeding which is required in ordinary cases. I believe nobody will be hurt by it.

Mr. HARRIS. I confess, Mr. President, I am a little disappointed in finding this proposition resisted by the chairman of the Committee on Finance. I had thought that having contrived a way for punishing delinquents under the provisions of this bill without any violation of the ordinary rules of law in respect to the arrest and punishment of individuals, he would have been quite willing to accept it. Now, sir, I confess that I am very much opposed to allowing arrests by executive officers; I think we are familiarizing ourselves quite too much to that sort of thing. I dislike very much the provision in this section that an executive officer, when he thinks an individual has been guilty of a contempt of his authority, may, without process of law, take that individual and carry him through the country to find a court. I desire never to see such a thing as that in this country. It is trifling with the liberties of the citizen unnecessarily, in my judgment. But if the Senator from Maine thinks it fit to retain this provision, and to authorize an assistant assessor, when he thinks a party has been guilty of contempt, to arrest him himself without judicial process, without applying to any judicial tribunal, I shall not resist it further; but it seems to me it is far better to do in this case just what is done in ten thousand other cases where a person has been guilty of default or any delinquency, to apply to a judicial officer for process of arrest. It can be done without difficulty. It is done every day in other cases. Why not do it in this?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, to strike out the words "by subpoena to be served by any assistant assessor," in the twenty-second line of the fourteenth section.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes sixteen, noes not counted.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, to strike out the word "appear," in the twenty-sixth line, and to insert "before such assessor," and then after the word "aforesaid," in the thirty-second line, to strike out down to line thirty-six, and to insert in lieu thereof the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have some amendments to propose, some of which are verbal and some material. In the first place, I wish to call attention to an amendment that I proposed the other day in relation to titles to land. I move to insert at the end of section one hundred and fifty-seven, on page 207, this proviso:

Provided, That the title of a purchaser of land by a deed duly stamped shall not be defeated or affected by the want of a proper stamp on any deed conveying said land, by any person through or under whom he claims or holds title.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I fear that that is hardly specific enough. I think the latter clause would read better if it were "any person through or under whom his grantor claims or holds title."

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to that; and I so modify my amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. The next amendment which I wish to propose relates to a feature which was in the former bill, but has been left out of this, and I desire in some shape to put it in. In the present law a distinction is made as to the income tax between resident citizens and non-resident citizens of the United States. We do not desire that our citizens who have incomes in this country, dividends of banks, and incomes from other corporations and from interest on the public debt, should go out of the country, reside in Paris or elsewhere, avoiding the risk of being drafted or contributing anything personally to the requirements of the country at this time, and get off with as low a tax as anybody else. The law as it now stands makes a difference to those persons of two per cent. in the income tax on account of the obligations which are avoided by those who reside abroad, and endured by those who stay at home. I think that is a wise and wholesome distinction, and it ought to be preserved. It ought not to be allowed to drop out of this law. It has been dropped out of the bill by the House of Representatives, I do not know exactly upon what ground. The bill provides:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid annually upon the annual gains, profits, or income of every person residing in the United States, or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad, whether derived from any kind of property, rents, interest, &c.

They have put in a provision that they mean to collect a tax off those citizens who reside abroad; and therefore the distinction could not have been left out for the reason that it was supposed the additional tax could not be collected, as some of my friends suggest to me. I propose that the words "or of any citizen of the United States residing abroad" be stricken out in the fourth line of the one hundred and fifteenth section, on page 170, and then to insert in line sixteen of that section these words:

And upon the annual gains, profits, and income, rents and dividends, accruing upon any property, securities, and stocks owned in the United States by any citizen of the United States residing abroad not in the employment of the Government of the United States, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of two per cent. more than upon resident citizens of the United States.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to hear the reason for that amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have stated the reason.

Mr. CONNESS. I was out of the Chamber. The Senator will excuse me for asking the question.

Mr. COLLAMER. In the first place this is the law now and has been for two years past, but it has been left out of this bill without any reason that I know of. I wish to preserve it. Then, that there is a good reason for making a distinction between resident and non-resident citizens of the United States I think is quite obvious. If a man draws his income from our public debt, or from property here, and resides in Paris, skulking away from contributing his personal support to the Government in this day of its extremity, he ought to pay a higher income tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. On page 161, line six of section one hundred and nine, after the word "banking," I move to insert "and except such savings banks as confine their business to receiving deposits and loaning the same for the depositors, and do no other banking business whatever."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator had better put it in some other place; say after the clause in reference to national banks.

Mr. COLLAMER. In the eleventh line, after the word "three,"

Mr. FESSENDEN. We shall have to insert more words there in reference to the banking bill; when it is approved we shall have to insert the date there; and therefore let the Senator move to put in his amendment immediately preceding the word "and," in the eleventh line. Then it will keep its place whatever we put in before it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not care about the place. I will have it inserted immediately before the word "and," in the eleventh line of section one hundred and nine, on page 161.

Mr. JOHNSON. That makes no limitation as to the business in which those banks may be concerned.

Mr. COLLAMER. The exception is of those that confine themselves to taking deposits and lending them for the depositors, and do no other banking business whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON. No matter what the amount of deposits may be?

Mr. COLLAMER. That is immaterial.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to it. I only wanted to know the effect of it.

Mr. HALE. It strikes me that the amendment is a little too limited. I will make the suggestion that I have in my mind to the Senator from Vermont, and then if he thinks it is unnecessary to make the amendment, I will not move it. Some of these savings banks receive large deposits which they do not loan and are not able to loan, and they invest them, for instance, in United States bonds.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is loaning. They do not act like the banks who take deposits, with other business, and pay the depositors on demand, and loan the deposits on their own account. These savings banks of which we speak do nothing of that kind; but merely take money and loan or invest it for the depositors.

Mr. HALE. I was going to suggest that the words "or invest" should be inserted after "loan."

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to say "loaning or investing the same."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if that would not allow them to invest in bills of exchange, and do that kind of business.

Mr. COLLAMER. The amendment says "and do no other banking business whatever."

Mr. TRUMBULL. But they are authorized to invest; may they not invest in bills? That is the chief business done by banks in the West.

Mr. COLLAMER. But ordinary banks and western bankers take deposits, and invest them for themselves, buy bills of exchange, and all that; but it will be observed that that is not done for the depositors: it is done by the bank or banker; and they are held to the depositor for his deposit any way. That is not the case with our savings banks. They merely take the money from the depositors and loan or invest it for them, and get what they can on it for the depositors, and if they lose it the depositors lose.

Mr. HALE. Let me state to the Senator from Illinois that in the town in which I live we have a small savings bank and its funds amount to over half a million belonging to the workmen there, and the females who work in our mills. It is frequently the case that those deposits are so large that there is no demand for them by which they can be loaned, and they invest them in the fifty-two and other bonds of the United States. I want simply to preserve that.

Mr. COLLAMER. The word "invest" will cover that.

Mr. HALE. Certainly it will cover it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if there are any banks in the eastern States doing a business such as is specified in this amendment; that is, receiving special deposits and loaning them specially for the particular depositor. If the amount is lost does the particular depositor making the deposit lose the money, or is it a general loss?

Mr. COLLAMER. The word "special" is not used in my amendment. I will state to the gentleman what is the character of the banks that exist that I am talking about. A general act in most of the States empowers certain corporations to do this business; or by legislation there is a corporation established to carry on a savings bank. There are a president, four or five directors, and a treasurer. They have no banking house in the country generally; in some of the large cities they have a building. They receive deposits, from fifty cents and upwards, from the laboring people almost entirely, people who work in our factories; they deposit their savings there. The directors act as a mere matter of charity—they are paid nothing; the president is paid nothing. They meet once a week, living in the neighborhood of the bank. They pay nothing except to the treasurer; they pay him for keeping the accounts. They appoint a committee of investment from their own body. They receive deposits, and give to every person that deposits a little book of deposit in which is entered what is put in. Whenever a depositor brings his book and wants any of his money, he is paid on the book being presented, and it is entered on the book how much he has taken out. I believe in the city of Boston there is one institution where they take ten cents. I believe most of them, if not all, limit the amount of deposits; they will not take more than ten or twenty dollars from the same person at the same time. They loan the money out as well as possible. They desire to have a lengthy loan. They will, say, lend a man on six months or a year on a good note with underwriters, when an ordinary bank would lend him only for sixty days. In order to get their money out they make long loans; they do not want it coming back on their hands; they want as little trouble as possible. Sometimes they have a quantity on hand; money is plenty and they cannot lend it. Then they will go and buy United States bonds, or they will buy a share in some good bank, and in that way keep their account, and render it annually, and report it to the State under oath. They have nothing to do with buying or selling exchanges or doing banking business. If they make an investment with some of their deposits in a mortgage which turns out to be bad, or if they have taken a man's note with underwriters to it that were not good, and they lose it, that makes the balance less and it is deducted from the whole amount deposited; the depositors lose it. The directors have no interest about it one way or the other. They do the best they can. The money is lent for the depositors. I do not mean that if a man puts in a quarter of a dollar they lend that twenty-five cents by itself; but they lend whatever they have in hand, and upon as good security as they can get; they do not mean to take any but what is good. Sometimes they fail, and in that case there would be a loss. After paying their treasurer for his attention to the books, they divide what is made among the depositors. Our regular rate of interest is six per cent., and they generally divide about five per cent. in New England, and they pay it to all that leave their money in three months. If they draw it out short of three months they get no interest.

I have now described to the gentleman, as well as I can, the great number of these institutions, and what their course is.

Mr. HENDERSON. The only difficulty that suggested itself to my mind, and it still presents itself, is that banks of this character may receive very large deposits, and indeed may loan their money, and, as suggested by the Senator from Illinois, may actually make investments in bills, and in that way large deposits may be actually made in the savings banks and they may take off a very large amount of business from other banking institutions, so that in reality they would pay no tax. I suppose investments in bills could be made by them, and investments in loans, and it would be just as profitable to a party making the deposit to put it there as in any other banking institution whatever. I have no objection to the design of the Senator; I think that it is altogether proper that institutions of the character he has described should be exempted; but at the same time I think he ought to limit the amount of deposits, or further describe them, so that there could be no difficulty such as I suggest.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say to the Senator that these banks are nothing more nor less than this: if he has $50 or $100 which he wants to lend, or $500 if you please, (though they generally limit the amount they receive,) instead of investing it himself in a mortgage on real estate or in United States bonds, or anything else, he puts it into the hands of a savings bank and they collect the interest for him, and pay it over to him.

Mr. HENDERSON. The only question is whether the words used will apply simply to savings banks proper. I have no objection to the design.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do no business of any other kind or description except to collect the interest and pay it over to the depositor.

Mr. COLLAMER. I thought I had made it as definite as I could when I provided that the savings banks should be those that received deposits and loaned them for the depositors. I have put those words in. It will not apply to cases where a bank loans its deposits for its own benefit, but only to those which loan them for the depositors. Our people do not put large sums in a savings bank as they would in an ordinary bank.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senator from Missouri further that those banks generally will not take large sums on deposit, because they are liable to be called on for them.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me suggest that the amount of deposits be limited, so as to apply simply to a savings bank such as has been described by the Senator from Vermont. There is some fear that this provision may take an immense amount of money away from taxation. Parties may go on depositing large sums in these banks; there is no limitation in the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is a savings bank in Boston that takes deposits of ten cents, and yet they amount to millions of dollars in the aggregate.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose you limit it to those savings banks where the deposits are under $100 each.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is true that such an exception as the Senator from Vermont proposes will take from taxation a large amount of money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will see that it does not take a dollar from taxation. It pays its five per cent. just like everything else. These banks pay the five per cent. on their dividends like other banks.

Mr. JOHNSON. But they do not pay on deposits.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because the deposits are not used.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand very well. The savings banks throughout the United States must have now what may be considered as capital, although it is in their hands in the name of deposits, some two or three hundred million dollars. I think the savings banks in the New England States, from a statement which I saw not long ago, and which came before me in the consideration of a case which I argued, have a deposit of about one hundred million dollars. In New York and Pennsylvania and Maryland the deposits are very large. In Maryland no depositor is authorized to deposit beyond a certain amount, but he may go on depositing that amount from day to day or week to week as the regulations may be until he may have hundreds of thousands of dollars to his credit. That money is loaned out by the managers of the institutions, who get no pay. It is loaned out just in the way in which the Senator proposes that these loans are to be made which are to operate as an exception to the right of taxing. They loan them out on mortgage, and they invest them in United States securities or in State securities. They do not do a banking business in the general acceptance of that term.

What occurred to me, and I think I suggested it some two or three days ago, was to exempt from this tax only such of these savings banks whose deposits on the average of a year do not exceed some twenty or thirty thousand dollars. The savings banks in the city of Baltimore now I think have about three, perhaps four million dollars on deposit. The State taxes them. The question in the case to which I alluded just now made it necessary, as I thought, to examine into the amount which these banks held. It was a case in which the State undertook to tax that portion of the deposits which the bank had invested in United States securities, such securities as are upon their face exempted from taxation. The court decided that that could not be done; but the State taxes are all paid. I do not know how it may be in other States.

Mr. COLLAMER. My State would have no more idea of taxing these savings banks than it would of taxing contributions for the support of the poor.

Mr. JOHNSON. So I understand, but you do not deal in as large figures as we do in the cities. Your savings banks, I suppose, have some thirty or forty thousand dollars on deposit each.

Mr. COLLAMER. Less than one hundred thousand dollars each.

Mr. JOHNSON. But our savings banks, and I suppose it is so in Boston and New York, have millions of dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose the people who deposit their money in the savings banks should withdraw it and loan it out themselves on bond or mortgage as individuals, is there any way of taxing it?

Mr. JOHNSON. You might tax mortgages. We tax mortgages in our State; we tax the mortgagor and mortgagee too. But that is not the ground on which we tax the savings banks. We tax them on the ground that their charter enables them to do the business. We tax them because the franchise under which they are permitted to aggregate their money in this way, and loan it out so as to get a dividend of five per cent., is granted by the State. They could not do it without that franchise. We suppose, therefore, in Maryland, that there is as much right to tax a savings bank as any other bank.

I admit, with the Senator from Vermont, that it would be very hard to tax those poor people, who from time to time deposit their small earnings in a savings bank, and who pay taxes in other ways, for whatever they buy of taxable property is taxed in their hands. I am not to be understood as maintaining the policy of the tax on savings banks. On the contrary, in the case to which I have adverted, I argued against the policy, and the court decided that at any rate the State of Maryland had no right to tax that portion of the deposits of these banks which they had invested in United States securities. All I mean to say is that the Senate ought to act understandingly on the subject, that they are exempting from taxation perhaps some three hundred million dollars.

Mr. CLARK. I will state to the Senator from Maryland that the policy of the State of New Hampshire has been a different one from that of the State of Maryland, as I understand it. The policy of our State has been to encourage these institutions. We have regarded it as fit and proper to encourage a person who had got a little money to put it somewhere where he could have a little something on his earnings, and thus learn to accumulate. The savings banks generally say that they will only take such an amount, and they do not go beyond it. They pay an interest of five per cent. per annum to the depositors, dividing it once in three months, and then if, after paying expenses, there is an accumulation of interest, they divide that out, some at the end of one year and some at the end of five years, so that the depositors get everything that is earned except the mere payment of the treasurer. Not a director or committee-man, on loans or anything of that kind, receives a dollar for his expenses. I have been connected with one of these institutions for twenty years, and I have never had a cent for my services. I have given my services gratuitously, for the purpose of encouraging persons who have small sums to put them into bank and thus preserve them. We have a pretty large deposit, and so far as we have been able we have aided the Government with it in this emergency.

Mr. HENDERSON. In my section of country we have no institutions such as have been described by the Senator from Vermont. I desire very much to relieve those banks that he speaks of; I think they ought to be relieved. I find by looking at the returns from his State that the amount of deposits in the savings banks there in 1863 was $1,339,793. That would be a very small item, and would show that the banks there were of such a character as he describes.

Mr. COLLAMER. There are six or eight of them.

Mr. HENDERSON. But when I come to the State of New York I find that in 1863 there were deposited in the savings banks in that State $76,538,183. I do not know the character of those banks. They may be called savings banks and yet may be doing a banking business. In the returns which I have before me they are put under the head of savings banks. When I come to New Hampshire I find that in 1863 there were deposited in the savings banks of that State $6,560,308. When I come to Massachusetts I find that there are ninety-three savings banks in that State, and that their deposits in 1863 were $50,404,623. So it is in other States.

Looking to New England I really find that the savings banks have rather a small amount of deposits, and must be of the character described by the Senators from New England. But unless this amendment is very carefully worded, will there not be some danger of removing an immense amount of money in some of the other States from taxation as provided by the amendment now under consideration? The amount is much larger than the Senator from Maryland suggested. There are between three and four hundred million dollars deposited in the savings banks so called. I do not know whether they are all such savings banks as have been described here. Some of them may be banks of capital where dividends are made and divided among the stockholders. They may not be such banks as have been described by the Senators from New England. I think the amendment ought to be carefully worded, so as to confine this exception to that class of banks alone where small deposits are made by poor persons—such banks as were suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire a moment ago, where the directors themselves receive no compensation, where it is not intended that they should do a banking business except for the purpose of loaning the small deposits of poor persons who work in the factories, &c., and to realize something from those deposits for them. There is danger that an immense banking business may be done under the head of savings banks, and thereby the Government be deprived of an immense revenue.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont provides that they shall do no other business whatever except merely to receive the money and loan it out for the benefit of the depositors. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that you cannot fix it by the amount of deposits, because different banks receive different amounts from depositors but all precisely in the same way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to detain the Senate, but I must suggest that you are legislating for savings banks in Vermont and you are using descriptive words which may cover banks all over the country that may have enormous deposits. In some of the States "savings bank" is a mere name of an ordinary bank. Some banks are called "savings banks" just as others are called "farmers' banks" and "merchants' banks."

Mr. CLARK. Was the Senator giving his attention? The amendment provides that they shall be banks which receive money and loan it out for depositors only, and do no other business.

Mr. SHERMAN. They receive money for poor people and invest it. Why should they not pay tax? I do not see any reason in the world.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They pay the income tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why should they not pay a tax on deposits?

Mr. FESSENDEN. They do not use their deposits.

Mr. SHERMAN. In ordinary country banks some people make deposits of small sums drawing no interest, simply depositing the money in bank for their own convenience; and yet the bank is taxed on those deposits. When individuals choose to deposit their money in one of these savings banks they get some profit; they get the interest. Why should they not pay a tax?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why should they pay a tax on them, and then pay an income tax too? Why should they pay it any more than we should say to the Senator from Ohio, "Sir, you have loaned $1,000, and shall pay five per cent. on your income, and in addition you shall pay another tax because you have loaned it; you have deposited $1,000 with the Senator from Iowa, and you shall pay, therefore, a tax on your deposits and a tax on your income too." There is no difference between the cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that by this familiar case: suppose the Senator from Maine loans me $1,000—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Maine cannot do it; he has not got the money; it is not a supposable case. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. Take the case as a supposable case. He has to stamp the note. Somebody has to pay for the stamp. Why should he be required to pay for the stamp? This tax on deposits is equivalent to a stamp tax or something of that kind. I am afraid that in endeavoring to exempt poor people in Vermont from this small tax you will exempt a great many people who are not so poor, and you will defeat a very important object in endeavoring to reach an exceptional case. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. COLLAMER. It amounts to just this: if a poor man has loaned and saved together $100, if he loans it himself it is all very well, there is no tax to be paid; but if a number of poor men get together and get somebody who they suppose is more competent to attend to it than they are to loan it for them, then you say you have something that you can lay your hand on and get a tax from, because it is a deposit. Right is one thing. Power to do the thing is another. The Senator from Ohio wants to touch these deposits because we have the power.

Mr. GRIMES. If my recollection serves me aright, the Senator proposed such an amendment to the last tax bill—

Mr. COLLAMER. It was adopted.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to know whether any bad result has flowed from that? I can see that there ought to be a difference between a savings bank that merely acts as the trustee for poor men and invests their money which comes in in small dribbles in larger sums, and a bank that receives deposits and buys and sells bills of exchange. I do not want to exclude the latter from paying taxes under the operation of this provision, and

I do not understand, a similar provision having been adopted in the former bill, that such a provision as this would prevent their paying their just proportion of tax, and hence it seems to me that it is manifestly proper that this amendment should be adopted if it is strictly to apply to those banks that are legitimate savings banks.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the only question.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems there has been a construction given to this language.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know about that. I do not know what the assessors do.

Mr. COLLAMER. The expression is that savings banks shall be excepted that confine their business to receiving money for depositors and loaning the same for them.

Mr. HENDERSON. Every bank just does that. ["No," "No."]

Mr. COLLAMER. If they make a bad investment the depositors lose.

Mr. GRIMES. Other banks do not loan money for the depositors.

Mr. HENDERSON. The only difference is the difference between a mutual insurance company and an insurance company with capital. It makes very little difference to me whether I insure in a mutual insurance company or whether I insure in a company where the capital has been subscribed and paid in. I am in favor of the proposition made by the Senator from Vermont, but I do not desire to vote upon it in its present shape, and I suggest that it be passed over for the present, so that we can look to the wording of it, and exempt only those banks described by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. The motive I had in the description contained in this amendment was to make it certain that only our savings banks should be excepted.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am aware of that, but I do not want to be called upon to vote just now, because I wish to see that that is certain.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well; let it pass over.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The further consideration of this amendment will be passed by by unanimous consent unless a vote is insisted upon by some Senator. It will be laid aside for the present.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have a number of verbal amendments that I wish to call attention to. The first is on page 59—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before that is done, if the Senator will allow, I wish to make a motion that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. It is quite a comfortable and cool evening, and I think we can make some progress.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-three, noes not counted.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire to take the sense of the Senate on adjourning over from Saturday until Wednesday. ["No," "No."]

Mr. FESSENDEN. We cannot do it by the Constitution.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I make the motion that when the Senate adjourns on Saturday it be to meet on Wednesday.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no objection to the gentleman making the motion.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I do not want to make the motion if it is to be defeated. I want the Senate to adjourn over the Baltimore convention.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair can entertain the motion made by the Senator from Kansas only by common consent.

Mr. WILSON. I object.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the motion cannot be entertained.

Mr. WILSON. I have been requested by several Senators to withdraw my objection, for the purpose of taking the sense of the Senate, and as I believe the sense of the Senate will be against having anything to do with that matter at Baltimore, I withdraw the objection.

ARMY NEWS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore read to the Senate the following communication received by him from the Secretary of War:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, June 2, 1864.

Sir: A dispatch from General Grant's headquarters, dated yesterday, June 1, at ten a. m., has been received. It states:

"At five p. m. yesterday Sheridan, perceiving a force of rebel cavalry at Cold Harbor, which proved to be Fitzhugh Lee's division, attacked, and, after a hard fight, routed it, together with Clingman's brigade of infantry, which came to Lee's support. Sheridan remained in possession of the place. He reported at dark that he had a considerable number of prisoners, and there were many rebel dead and wounded on the field. He was ordered to hold the position, and at ten p. m. the sixth corps (Wright's) set out to occupy it.

"We have not yet heard from Wright or Sheridan this morning, and do not know whether the former has got his troops to the destination. Smith (Baldy) must be close upon Wright's column. This morning the enemy are also moving a heavy column in the same direction. The order has just gone to Warren to fall upon their flank.

"Wilson had a fight last evening near Hanover Court-House with Young's brigade of cavalry. He routed Young, killing and capturing many, but there has been a good deal of artillery firing in that direction this morning.

"Warren reported last night that in his fight of Monday afternoon, near Bethesda Church, Colonel Tyrrell, thirteen Virginia, and Colonel Willis, commanding Pegram's brigade, were killed. Colonel Christian, forty-ninth Pennsylvania, was wounded and captured; so was the acting adjutant general of Ramsay's brigade, name not reported. Ten other commissioned officers and seventy privates were captured. Sixty rebels were buried on the field.

"In our center Burnside reports his advanced lines as being within a mile and a half of Mechanicsville."

E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 218) to repeal the first section of the joint resolution relative to the transfer of persons in the military service to the naval service, approved February 24, 1864;

A bill (H. R. No. 120) to reestablish the principal port of entry for the district of Champlain, at Plattsburgh, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;

A bill (H. R. No. 474) to amend an act relative to the public printing; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) relative to the claim of William Wheeler Hubbell.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to make a personal request of the Senate, as I am about to leave the city. I move that the Senate excuse me from further service upon the Committee on Commerce. The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives (No. 483) granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route, was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. RAMSEY. Let it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that bill will go to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad. I ask for a vote on the question of its reference.

Mr. RAMSEY. The bill ought to be sent, I think, to its friends, and not to its enemies.

Mr. CONNESS. I should like to know on what reason the honorable Senator from Minnesota now claims or undertakes to say that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad are the enemies of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being a question as regards the reference, the Chair will put the vote first on the motion to refer this bill to the Committee on Public Lands. The Senator from California suggests the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to say to the Senate before the vote is taken that I for one am not opposed to this bill; on the contrary, I am in favor of giving any grant they want in reason; but the business of this bill appropriately is with the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and I hope it will be so referred.

Mr. JOHNSON. I introduced a bill of the same kind with the one which is now before the Senate, and I supposed it was proper, and therefore made the motion, to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands, which was done. I think this bill ought to take the same direction.

Mr. GRIMES. What do we have the Committee on the Railroad for?

Mr. McDOUGALL. The grant in aid of a road by the northern route from St. Paul to Puget sound involves nothing more than a grant of lands. Therefore I think it might well go, as all bills of that kind have gone, to the Committee on Public Lands. I suggest to my colleague that as it involves nothing but the administration of the public lands of the United States, it should properly go to that committee. It has been so before.

Mr. CONNESS. I was quite aware of that; but I thought it was rather invidious, as this bill proposes a railroad to the Pacific ocean, to take it away from the committee specially constituted in this body to consider that question. I am not aware of one single voice against it in the committee. Gentlemen, I think, mistake if they apprehend that there is any enmity to it in that committee. I thought it was rather invidious to propose to send it to another committee when there was one created for the purpose of considering the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Shall this bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands?"

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order of the Senate, the Chair announces that a recess will now take place until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

RELEASE OF PROPERTY FROM ATTACHMENT.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 355.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 355) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the release from attachment or other process of property claimed by the United States, and for other purposes. It provides that whenever any property owned or held by the United States, or in which the United States have or claim an interest, shall, in any judicial proceeding under the laws of any State, District, or Territory, be seized, arrested, attached, or held for the security or satisfaction of any claim made against said property, it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to direct the Solicitor of the Treasury to cause a stipulation to be entered into by the proper district attorney for the discharge of such property from such seizure, arrest, attachment, or proceeding, to the effect that upon such discharge the person asserting the claim against such property shall become entitled to all the benefits of this act; and in all cases where such stipulation shall be entered into, and the property shall in consequence thereof be discharged, and final judgment shall be given in the court of last resort to which the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper to cause such proceedings to be carried, affirming the claim for the security or satisfaction of which such proceedings shall have been instituted, and the right of the person asserting the same to enforce it against such property by means of such proceedings, notwithstanding the claims of the United States thereto, such final judgment shall be denied, to all intents and purposes, a full and final determination of the rights of such person, as against the United States, to such rights as he would have had in case possession of the property had not been changed; and if such claim be for the payment of money, and the same shall by such judgment be found to be due, the presentation of a duly authenticated copy of the record of such judgment and proceedings shall be sufficient evidence to the proper accounting officers for the allowance thereof; and the same is thereupon to be allowed and paid.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the amount so to be allowed and paid shall not exceed the value of the interest of the United States in the property in question: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be considered as recognizing or conceding any right to enforce by seizure, arrest, attachment, or any judicial process any claim against any property of the United States, or against any property held, owned, or employed by the United States, or by any department thereof, for any public use, or as waiving any objection to any proceeding instituted to enforce any such claim.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

PROFESSORS AT WEST POINT ACADEMY.

Mr. HARRIS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 58.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. No. 58) in relation to the professors of the Military Academy at West Point. It provides that the thirty-first section of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall not be construed to abridge the privileges usually allowed to the professors of the Military Academy of being absent during the suspension of the ordinary academic studies of that institution.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what is the necessity for that resolution. The professors at West Point are not Army officers.

Mr. HARRIS. They are. The thirty-first section of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces will preclude them from drawing their salary during the vacation.

Mr. GRIMES. It would if they were Army officers, but where is the law making them Army officers?

Mr. HARRIS. They so understand it, and the War Department so understand it, and it is at their instance that I introduce this resolution. It can do no harm.

Mr. GRIMES. It will do no harm, I suppose, except that we may thereby recognize them as Army officers. I recollect very distinctly that this question was discussed here since I have been a member of the Senate, before the Senator from New York took his seat here, and at the time when Mr. Davis was chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know how that is; I never looked into the question; but these gentlemen suppose they will not be allowed to visit their friends during the vacation without losing their pay unless this resolution is passed.

Mr. GRIMES. I remember very well that the effort was made to make them Army officers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Are they not put upon the footing of Army officers generally?

Mr. GRIMES. No; they have a salary; they are not Army officers at all. An effort was made some years ago to make them Army officers and put them into the engineer corps, but it was resisted here.

Mr. HARRIS. This will not make them such.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIEUTENANT COLONEL JOSEPH BAILEY.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate take up the joint resolution (S. No. 60) tendering the thanks of Congress and for the presentation of a medal to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I introduced this joint resolution, but as the Committee on Military Affairs have reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, with which I am perfectly content, I suppose it will not be necessary to read the original resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee only will be read, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the original resolution after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof:

That the thanks of Congress be, and they are hereby, tendered to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment Wisconsin volunteers, acting engineer of the nineteenth Army corps, for distinguished services in the recent campaign on the Red river, by which the gunboat flotilla under Rear Admiral David D. Porter was rescued from imminent peril.

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, with suitable devices and inscriptions, to be presented to Lieutenant Colonel Bailey, with a copy of this resolution. And a sufficient sum of money to carry this resolution into effect is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to strike out the second section of that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the objection to it?

Mr. GRIMES. I am willing to render any kind of honor to Colonel Bailey he deserves, but we have granted only one gold medal during this war to a military or naval officer, and that was to General Grant. I do not think it wise to begin to be lavish with the expenditure of these gold medals. It is a great thing, and ought to be so regarded, to receive the thanks of Congress by a special act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think the member from Iowa and the Senate have stricken out more of the resolution than they intended to strike out. A portion of the section stricken out directs a copy of the resolution to be sent to Colonel Bailey.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not mean to strike out that part.

Mr. WILSON. I think it is all right as it is now, since we have agreed to amend it. Of course we shall have to change the title.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose only to strike out the first clause of the second section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the second section of the resolution, instead of being stricken out, will be regarded as modified to read as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a copy of this resolution to be transmitted to Lieutenant Colonel Bailey.

The joint resolution was passed. Its title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution tendering the thanks of Congress to Lieutenant Colonel Joseph Bailey, of the fourth regiment of Wisconsin volunteers."

SUPERANNUATED FUND SOCIETY.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate proceed to consider Senate bill No. 293.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope it will not take long.

Mr. JOHNSON. It will not take any time. It simply proposes to authorize a charitable institution called the Superannuated Fund Society of Maryland to receive property under a devise.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 293) to empower the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland annual conference to hold property in the District of Columbia and to take a devise under the will of the late William Doughty.

A certain William Doughty, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, by his last will, bearing date on the 29th of April, 1859, duly admitted to probate, devised and bequeathed certain real and personal property and estate—part to take effect at his death, and the residue at the death or marriage of his widow—to a society incorporated by act of the General Assembly of Maryland by the name of the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland annual conference, and called in the will the Superannuated Fund Society of the Methodist Protestant Church for the district of Maryland. It has been questioned whether the corporation can lawfully take and hold the property, in virtue of the will, without the leave and assent of Congress. The bill therefore proposes to give the assent of Congress to the aforementioned devise and bequests to the Superannuated Fund Society of the Maryland annual conference; and the society are authorized and empowered to take and hold the property and estate devised and bequeathed to it, agreeably to the tenor and provisions of the will, and to dispose of and enjoy the same to every intent and effect as if the society had been originally incorporated by act of Congress. That corporation is also empowered to hold real and personal property located in the District of Columbia, acquired or that shall be acquired by gift, purchase, devise, or bequest, and to enjoy, rent, lease, or convey it at pleasure, as freely as any person or body corporate can do, but the net yearly income of such property is not to exceed $20,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move now to proceed with the consideration of the tax bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

Mr. COLLAMER. Previous to the recess I was moving some few amendments to this bill. I wish now to call attention to this provision on page 59, section fifty-four, line nineteen:

And the said duty shall be a lien on such spirits and also on the interest of all persons in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and in the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid.

I move to strike out the words "such spirits, and also on the interest of all persons in default in."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. In the same clause, line twenty-two, I move to strike out the word "in" and to insert "on;" so as to read, "and on the lot or tract of land," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. On page 92, section seventy-eight, I find this provision:

14. Commercial brokers shall pay twenty dollars for each license. Any person or firm, except one holding a license as wholesale dealer, or produce brokers, whose business it is, as a broker, to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, produce, or merchandise, not otherwise provided for in this act, or seek orders therefor, in original or unbroken packages, or to negotiate freights and other business for the owners of vessels, or for the shippers or consignors or consignees of freight carried by vessels, shall be regarded a commercial broker under this act.

Any person who does this kind of business is regarded as a commercial broker and required to take out this license, except a person who has a license as a wholesale dealer. A person who is licensed as a wholesale dealer may, under that license, do this business without taking out any other license. If I understand the language, that is the meaning. The wholesale dealer who has a license as a wholesale dealer may do this work without taking out this license as a commercial broker.

Mr. JOHNSON. There are two exceptions there. Produce brokers are excepted also.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am talking of this exception now. I will talk of the other directly.

The man who is a wholesale dealer may by virtue of being that be a commercial broker; but if we turn to page 88, line thirty-eight, we find this provision:

Nor shall any license as a wholesale dealer allow any such person to act as a commercial broker.

Here he is expressly forbidden to act as a commercial broker, and yet in the other clause it is declared that he may do so without taking any particular license. The gentleman from Maine can have it whichever way he pleases, either that he shall be or shall not be allowed to act as a commercial broker; but one or the other of those clauses ought to be stricken out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That provision has occasioned a good deal of consideration. The Senator contends that that is the effect of it. I, and I believe you, sir, have been unable to perceive that that was the effect with all the study that we have been able to give to it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Will you tell me what is the meaning of that exception?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I read it in this way: commercial brokers are to pay twenty dollars for each license. Then comes a specification of what persons shall be considered as commercial brokers. "Any person or firm"—I leave out the exception—"whose business it is, as a broker, to negotiate sales or purchases of goods, wares, produce, or merchandise, &c., shall be regarded a commercial broker under this act." The exception is, "except one holding a license as wholesale dealer." I take the meaning of that to be that a person holding that license shall not be regarded as a commercial broker, although he may carry on the same business.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is the same thing. If he carries on the business he may do it without any other license except the one as a wholesale dealer. If he is a wholesale dealer, he may do this business without the license of a commercial broker.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As the Senator is so positive about it, and I do not regard the matter as of any very great importance, I will not object to striking out those words, "as wholesale dealer," so that it will read:

Any person or firm, except one holding a license as produce brokers, whose business it is, &c.

Mr. COLLAMER. Now, I call the Senator's attention to this: then he would allow the produce broker to be a commercial broker without taking out this license. If he will turn to the previous clause he will find that a produce broker only pays ten dollars for a license, and he may act as a commercial broker without taking out the twenty dollar license. The result will be that no commercial broker will take out the twenty dollar license. He will take out a license as a produce broker, and that will make him a commercial broker, and save him ten dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then you would advise to strike it all out.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, I do not. I do not advise the striking out of either of them. I want you to fix it and leave it either ten or twenty dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to understand whether the Senator makes a motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, (to Mr. COLLAMER.) What do you propose to do?

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire the committee to select which way they would have it; whether they would have it without the license or not. My idea would be to strike out both those exceptions altogether.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, strike them out.

Mr. COLLAMER. On page 92, line one hundred and thirty-four, after the word "firm," I move to strike out the following words, "except one holding a license as wholesale dealer or produce broker."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. On page 89, line sixty-five, I take it the word "and" should be "or;" so that it will read:

Every person who shall sell or offer for sale foreign or domestic spirits, wines, ale, beer, or other malt liquors in quantities of three gallons or less, or whose annual sales, including all sales of other merchandise, do not exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in liquors under this act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What is the necessity for that change?

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman will look at the clause above defining the wholesale dealers he will see that it reads in this way:

Every person who shall sell or offer for sale any distilled spirits, fermented liquors, or wines of any kind in quantities of more than three gallons at one time to the same purchaser, or whose annual sales shall exceed $25,000, shall be regarded a wholesale dealer in liquors.

If he either sells liquor in larger quantities than three gallons, or if his sales amount to $25,000, he is to be a wholesale dealer. The clause below defines a retail dealer in contradistinction to a wholesale dealer:

Every person who shall sell or offer for sale foreign or domestic spirits, wines, ale, beer, or other malt liquors in quantities of three gallons or less, and whose annual sales, including all sales of other merchandise, do not exceed $25,000, shall be regarded as a retail dealer in liquors under this act.

The other clause is in the alternative: if he sells liquor in certain quantity, or has such an amount of sales, he is to be considered a wholesale dealer. So it should be in this clause to make it conform to the other. I move to strike out the word "and," in line sixty-five, and to insert the word "or," so as to read, "or whose annual sales."

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not object to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to call attention to the clause on page 99, line three hundred and eighteen, in regard to the license of apothecaries. It reads as follows:

31. Apothecaries shall pay ten dollars for each license. Every person who keeps a shop or building where medicines are compounded or prepared according to prescriptions of physicians, and sold, shall be regarded an apothecary under this act.

In the small towns in the country generally, there are very few of the apothecaries who keep shops and sell medicines—perhaps scarcely any—who make up prescriptions of physicians. In the country the physicians carry their own medicines with them, and compound them, and deal them out themselves. The druggists or apothecaries keep medicines for sale. This license would not extend to any apothecary unless he was one who prepared and compounded medicines according to the prescriptions of physicians and sold them. For selling other medicines he would not be required to have any license. I take it the word "and" there should be "or." Perhaps that will correct it entirely.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In that case a person might sell any amount of medicines and be regarded as an apothecary. He might sell them by wholesale.

Mr. COLLAMER. Have you anything in the bill that covers the case of apothecaries such as exist in the country generally?

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is all there is.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not cover it. There are two apothecaries in the town in which I live. One of them I believe compounds prescriptions when he can get them, but he has nothing to do but to stop that business—and he does not put up a dozen of them in a year—and he will not have to pay a license; and yet that man sells medicines to the amount of a good many thousand dollars a year, and does a successful business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. As I said, if the amendment suggested by the Senator is made, any person might sell medicines under the apothecary's license for ten dollars to any amount.

Mr. COLLAMER. Can he not as the bill stands now?

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; because he would be a wholesale dealer; and that is a much higher license.

Mr. COLLAMER. The point with me is this: my apothecaries under this clause would not be required to have any license. I want them to have them, and to pay for them. As the bill stands now, a wholesale dealer if he follows that business would have to take a license for that; but my apothecary is not a wholesale dealer; still he sells several thousand dollars' worth a year; and yet he does not make up prescriptions for physicians.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think if a comma were put after the word "compounded" it would answer the purpose. It would then read:

Every person who keeps a shop or building where medicines are compounded, or prepared according to prescriptions of physicians, &c.

Mr. COLLAMER. I would not care if he did not compound any, if he sold them I would make him take out a license.

Mr. JOHNSON. What the Senator from Vermont desires could be accomplished by striking out the word "and" and inserting the words "or where medicines are." That will do it, and that is right, too. Otherwise, if you say "or sold," that would apply only to medicines compounded.

Mr. COLLAMER. It would read:

Every person who keeps a shop or building where medicines are compounded or prepared according to prescriptions of physicians and sold."

Mr. JOHNSON. "Or where medicines are sold."

Mr. FESSENDEN. That would have no different effect.

Mr. COLLAMER. None at all.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to the amendment if the Senator will look at the clause more particularly and move the proper amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. Gentlemen can see, as it now is, that the apothecaries generally through the country could sell up to any amount that did not make them a wholesale dealer, and not take out any license whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON. The difficulty I have is that if you only leave the words "or sold" in it will mean that it shall apply only to those that are compounded or prepared according to the prescription of physicians. They sell a great many that are not compounded; I suppose ninety-nine in one hundred in the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The alteration which the Senator from Vermont proposes would cover that by inserting the word "or" instead of "and," and I do not know but that it is right. At any rate, I do not object to it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will not move to insert it unless you think it right. On reflection, I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland and move in line three hundred and eighteen to strike out the word "and" and to insert the words "or where medicines are." So that it will read:

Every person who keeps a shop or building where medicines are compounded or prepared according to prescriptions of physicians, or where medicines are sold, shall be regarded an apothecary under this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire now to move to strike out the proviso to section one hundred, on page 153. It is the section relating to slaughtered cattle, swine, and sheep. The section reads in this way:

Sec. 100. And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid by any person, firm, company, or agent or employe thereof, the following duties or taxes, that is to say:

On all cattle and calves exceeding three months old, slaughtered for sale, except when slaughtered for the hides and tallow exclusively, forty cents per head.

On all cattle and calves under three months old, slaughtered for sale, five cents per head.

On all swine slaughtered for sale, ten cents per head.

On all sheep and lambs slaughtered for sale, five cents per head.

Now comes the proviso. But first I will remark that there is no tax levied in this section on anything but what is slaughtered for sale. There is nothing in this section that implies that a man may not kill a pig of his own for his own family; but it must be something slaughtered for sale; and yet it goes on with a great proviso, in these words:

Provided, That cattle, not exceeding five in number, and calves, swine, sheep, and lambs, not exceeding in all twenty in number, slaughtered by any person for his or her own consumption, in any one year, shall be exempt from duty.

Why on earth are they exempt from duty? There never was anything subject to duty except what was killed for sale. I think that proviso should all be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going to suggest to the Senator, since he is looking over the bill for verbal criticisms—

Mr. COLLAMER. This is not verbal.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, as he wishes to get rid of a great deal of useless verbiage, what is the use of defining a lawyer, apothecary, doctor, and all these sorts of employment in the law, instead of simply saying, "lawyers shall pay so much," &c.

Mr. COLLAMER. If it was not anything worse than that I would not say anything about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is simply tautology.

Mr. COLLAMER. That proviso is utterly inconsistent with the immediate preceding portion of the section. It would lead a person to suspect that he could not kill a calf or a turkey for his own use in his own yard without being subject to this duty, and that we had inserted this particular exception in the bill in order to allow him to do so. I desire that that proviso be stricken out.

Mr. JOHNSON. The whole of it?

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then what becomes of the subsequent provision:

And all sheep slaughtered for the pelts shall pay two cents only per head.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no use in it, but if gentlemen wish to save that provision I will move only to strike out the preceding portion of the proviso. In my own town I have known sometimes a man to kill fourteen thousand sheep for the pelts in one season.

Mr. JOHNSON. That would give us something.

Mr. COLLAMER. That will give something if you wish to keep it in. They kill them not only for the pelts, but also for the tallow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I enjoy the humor of the honorable Senator from Vermont very much—

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman can show me any use of that proviso I will sit down.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The use intended to be made of it was this—perhaps it is not very well expressed—that any person who slaughtered more than that number of cattle should be regarded as slaughtering them for sale; it meant to make a liberal allowance for family consumption; but under the operation of the law it has been found that persons having considerable of a stock would slaughter them for their own use and then sell a very considerable portion in the market, declaring that they did not slaughter them for sale, but slaughtered them for their own use, and in that way interfering a good deal with the trade. They slaughter them for their own use at their farms, and then carry a very large part into market.

Mr. COLLAMER. That was not the intention.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I may be permitted to speak of what was intended. When I admit it was not well expressed, I hope my friend will allow me to state what I understand by it myself. It would be a little hard to apply that to me, that I do not know what I meant, although it might be inferable by my not expressing it right.

The idea was precisely what I say: that it was found that persons having a very large stock slaughter in fact a good deal more than they have any use for themselves, and sell a very large portion of what they slaughter. The intention and the effect of this proviso would be and it would be so construed to mean simply that all cattle over that amount slaughtered by any one person shall be regarded as slaughtered for sale and the duty shall be paid.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all right; but the intention certainly is not clearly expressed in the proviso.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That, I am disposed to admit, and therefore I shall feel obliged to those two honorable gentlemen who are so critical in the use of language, if they will suggest something that will meet the idea more correctly instead of striking it all out, because that is the evil we intended to remedy.

Mr. COLLAMER. The gentleman did not draw this provision, and though he thinks that was the intention, I do not believe the man who drew it up ever thought of such a thing. It could not effect the object in that way. Suppose you say to a man, "If you kill above so much for your own use, you shall be presumed to kill them for sale," and he proves that he did not kill them for sale, then the presumption is done away with. How are you going to raise the question in court? You prosecute a man, for what? For selling without a license. You would of course be obliged to prove that he sold them. That would not be within this proviso. This proviso is that he may slaughter them for his own use. It could not possibly have been intended by anybody who drew it up to cover the idea which the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is no license in this section, and it has no relation to licenses.

Mr. COLLAMER. The man takes out a license as a butcher; he makes a return.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Besides his license he pays this tax.

Mr. COLLAMER. He makes returns; but the man who slaughters them does not. I repeat that I do not wish, nor do I intend, to make any amendment to this bill which is not entirely satisfactory to the gentleman from Maine. I have not made any, and I do not intend to make any.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am much obliged to the Senator for what he has done.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is another idea in regard to that proviso. If it is stricken out, any man who kills but one and sells it without paying this duty will be subject to prosecution; and it is just so if he kills fourteen, no more, no less. The proviso therefore is totally useless. You will raise the presumption if he kills fourteen and sells them, that he was selling with a license, and just so if he sold one.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will move to strike out all of the proviso after the word "that" down to the word "all," in the seventeenth line, we will let it go, and see if we cannot amend it in the committee of conference.

Mr. COLLAMER. Very well; I will move that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont proposes to amend section one hundred, line twelve, by striking out the following words:

Cattle, not exceeding five in number, and calves, swine, sheep and lambs, not exceeding in all twenty in number, slaughtered by any person for his or her own consumption in any one year, shall be exempt from duty, and.

So that the proviso will read:

Provided, That all sheep slaughtered for the pelts shall pay two cents only per head.

Mr. CLARK. I have a recollection of this matter when it was in committee, and I think the difficulty is met by striking out the words "for sale" in the fifth, in the eighth, in the ninth, and in the tenth lines. That is what we intended, for I recollect particularly discussing the proviso, and I recollect the question occurring in committee about a man not being allowed to sell a given number of sheep, and some of the committee remarked that would be too many.

Mr. JOHNSON. I rather think that depends on the size of his family.

Mr. CLARK. We concluded that it did.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the gentleman will strike out the words "for sale" in the previous part of the section in the clause "slaughtered for sale," I have no objection to the proviso standing, and I withdraw my amendment to ascertain if he will do that.

Mr. CLARK. I move, in the fifth, eighth, ninth, and tenth lines of the one hundredth section, to strike out the words "for sale."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to make an amendment on the 79th page, sixty-eighth section, in order to make it correspond with an amendment made by the Senator from Vermont to the fifty-fourth section. I move, in the eleventh line, after the word "upon," to strike out "the interest of all persons in default in;" so as to make the clause read:

And, until such duties with such additions shall be paid, they shall be and remain a lien upon the distillery where such liquors have been distilled.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the thirteenth line of that section I move to strike out the words "or in" and insert "and upon."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the fifteenth line, after the word "belonging," I move to amend by inserting "and upon the lot or tract of land whereon such distillery or brewery is situate."

Mr. JOHNSON. Sometimes, the Senator will remember, the site belongs to one man and the distillery to another.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The policy of this act is the same as the former one, and that is to hold the premises where the work is carried on responsible. There is no other way in which you can secure it.

Mr. JOHNSON. My idea was that the lien on the distillery would be sufficient without making a lien on the land, because the landholder has no control over it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is made a lien on land in the fifty-fourth section. The owner of the land leases it for this purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is pretty hard, though.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer an amendment on the 190th page, at the end of section one hundred and twenty-four, to insert the following:

But no tax shall be imposed or collected from any hospital duly incorporated for the relief of the sick: Provided, The sick and disabled soldiers in the service of the United States, or those who have been honorably discharged therefrom, shall be entitled to participate in the benefits of such institution gratuitously: And provided further, That such institution shall have first procured from the Secretary of the Treasury a certificate showing that it comes within the intent and meaning of this act, and is justly entitled to such exemption.

The object of the amendment is mainly for a particular institution. Mr. James H. Roosevelt, recently deceased in New York, made a will in which he gave his property to the amount of a million dollars it is estimated, for the purposes of a hospital. I have a copy of the will, and I will read a portion of it. He gives "all the rest and residue of his personal estate" to certain persons named "or their survivors," &c., "for the establishment in the city of New York of a hospital for the reception and relief of sick and deceased persons, and for its permanent endowment."

The section as drawn is general, and I do not know that there can be any objection to it in that form. The hospital must be gratuitously supported. We are doing a good deal for the soldiers by the payment of bounties and otherwise; but we have not yet done much for them after they return from the war disabled, and it seems to me to be well to encourage efforts like this. I cannot think there is any doubt about the propriety of the exception.

Mr. CLARK. I suggest to the Senator from New York, as that may be a matter of some importance, that he have his amendment printed, and that he let us look at it and let us look at the will.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the amendment of the Senator from New York to be withdrawn for the time being.

Mr. MORGAN. Not withdrawn; but I do not ask action on it now. Let it be laid on the table and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment will be printed as an amendment to be proposed at some other time.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from New York has proposed the exemption of a class of hospitals. I am in favor of his proposition. It is not now, however, under discussion; but in a similar spirit I move to strike out on the 135th page lines two hundred and twelve, two hundred and thirteen, and two hundred and fourteen, as follows:

On all printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications, except newspapers, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

I merely wish to make one remark on this tax. We do not tax wheat or corn, because they are the staff of life. I think that a tax on books is less defensible than a tax on wheat or corn. I believe that books are the staff of life, and I believe that our country would do itself honor at this moment when it is imposing a heavy tax upon the country if it deliberately exempted books. The tax that is proposed is applicable to all books; books for the family reading, for the library, and also for the school. All that we can get from the tax will be very small indeed. It will not add sensibly to your Treasury, but it will impose a burden upon knowledge. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will strike the words out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have simply to say that the reason why we do not tax wheat is that it is not a manufacture. We should tax flour but for one reason; and that is, that by the reciprocity treaty we should have foreign flour brought in upon us at so great an advantage that we could not afford to tax it. That is the difficulty in that case. We do tax clothing, all kinds of clothing, hats, caps, everything that goes into wear, everything that we use, that is a manufacture, that we can reach. If the Senate is disposed to make a distinction between food for the body or clothing for the body and food for the mind or clothing for the mind, if you please, they can do so. I see no good reason for it. It is well known that this business of printing and publishing books is a profitable one. It will be exceedingly profitable with the duty that we propose to put upon the importation of books in our tariff bill, if we put no duty whatever upon it in this country. I do not see any reason why we should exempt this kind of business which is carried on very largely and which would yield a very considerable revenue to the Government simply because some part of it is learning. A very large part of it is no advantage to anybody. There is no reason upon that principle.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator will permit me to ask him whether books that are imported will be liable to a duty in the hands of the owner?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Books that are imported pay a duty on importation under the tariff.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand; but, having paid that, would they be taxed in the hands of a subsequent owner?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no; this is only a tax on those printed and published in this country; that is all.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts state his amendment again, or let it be read from the desk.

Mr. SUMNER. Let it be reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, on page 135, to strike out the following clause:

On all printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications, except newspapers, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SUMNER. On page 149, section ninety-seven, line four, I move to strike out "one fourth" and insert "one tenth;" so that it will read:

SEC. 97. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all sales of real estate, goods, wares, merchandise, articles, or things at auction, including all sales of stocks, bonds, and other securities, a duty of one tenth of one per cent. on the gross amount of such sales.

The tax in the last bill on auctions is one tenth of one per cent., and I propose in this bill to put it where it was in the other. I have received communications from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, all in the same sense, all representing that the tax at one fourth of one per cent. will be very onerous to the business; in short, that the business cannot bear it. One communication which I have from Boston says:

"The undersigned desire respectfully to call your attention to the proposed tax on sales by auction. On the larger portion of such sales the tax would be prohibitory. The distinction between the broker and the auctioneer is not only unjust but unwise; its effect being to throw sales exclusively into the hands of the broker without increasing the revenue," &c.

I have also a communication from a very eminent house in Philadelphia, which I know something about personally and in which I have great confidence, from which I will read a passage:

"Now, while we believe in taxes, yet the charge upon us is so onerous that we hope you will use your exertions to let it remain as last year, one tenth of one per cent. We paid last year nearly $2,000 under that law to the United States, which comes out of our own pockets, as we do not charge it in the account of sales. Besides this, we pay $2,000 per annum for a license to the State, and also, I think, thirty dollars license to the United States, and on all foreign goods we pay one and a half per cent. to the State. In addition to all this, add the quarter per cent. now proposed, and I think you will agree with us that the charges are very onerous, and will have a tendency to drive us out of the business."

As I understand it, the auction business is peculiar in this respect. It pays a local State tax. I believe the business of a broker does not pay a local State tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They can tax it.

Mr. SUMNER. That I understand; but I am speaking of the fact, of the actual condition of this business. For instance, in the State of New York there is a very heavy local State tax imposed upon the auctioneer. All goods, for instance, sold at auction that come from the east of Cape Horn pay a tax of one half of one percent. to the State, and another class of goods pay a still higher tax. The sum total of that tax, as gathered in New York, I understand to be very considerable. So, also, is it in Pennsylvania. The auctioneer pays, in the first place, that local tax. He then pays our license, and then pays this second tax, which is under consideration this moment. There are three classes of taxation, and the question is whether we do not pile too much upon them. On this question I speak from the information that has been given to me, and it seemed to me we could not do better than to adhere to the rule adopted two years ago in the first bill, and put this tax at one tenth of one per cent.

I have been induced to ask myself the question, why should the auctioneer be taxed in this way more than any other business man? What is the business of an auctioneer as now conducted? Is it materially different from that of a commission merchant? He is a commission merchant who does everything in connection with one piece of business all on one day with a flag at his door; but his relation to the goods sold is that of a commission merchant, and he steps in also as a guarantor as a commission merchant. We impose no such tax on the commission merchant, nor does the State impose any tax upon the commission merchant. Why then should the auctioneer be selected, be individualized for this cumulative tax? I cannot see the reason myself, except it is that the business is peculiar; it stands out conspicuously; it attracts attention; it is transacted with a flag at the door; and therefore the Government come forward and impose upon it an extra tax; but I cannot from the nature of the business see any reason why we should impose an additional tax upon the auctioneer as compared with other merchants, commission merchants, if you please, or persons in other kinds of business. Especially do I see no reason why we should impose this additional tax on the auctioneer as compared with the broker.

I have likened the business of an auctioneer to that of a commission merchant. It may be likened also to that of a broker. In many respects it is that of a broker. But the very fact that this extra tax is imposed upon the auctioneer, as I understand, has the effect of throwing a very large and valuable class of business into the hands of brokers who do not pay the same high tax, because the persons who own the property that is sold by a broker can make larger profits when they are not obliged to pay this heavy taxation. I hope, therefore, the Senate will bring this tax down to where it stood in the last bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. The objection of the honorable member from Massachusetts is not so much to the amount of tax which we propose to levy as to the amount of State taxation. The amount that we propose to levy, as compared with State taxation, is, comparatively, very small—I mean the amount proposed by the committee, which is one fourth of one per cent. The member has said very correctly that the States impose upon these auctioneers a much higher tax, and it is because of the imposition of that higher tax that he supposes the auctioneer would not be able to carry on his business if he was subjected to the additional tax of one fourth of one per cent. Nothing is more clear than that the United States have the right to tax everything for the wants of the Government that is taxable at all under the authority of Congress; and if the amount which the States impose is a sufficient objection against the amount which the United States want, then the power of the United States to tax is comparatively inefficient.

I think the honorable member is mistaken in supposing—and he takes it upon the representations of the auctioneers, to whom he has adverted, and who no doubt are very respectable men—and they are mistaken in supposing that they will not be able to charge this tax to their own customers. One thing is certain; that they do it with reference to the State taxation. If a man sends his goods to auction for sale, he will find when he gets the return of the sale that from the gross proceeds of the sale the auctioneer deducts all the expenses; he deducts the expense, if there be any, of a tax imposed by the municipal authorities where he may be, and the tax imposed, if there be any tax imposed, by the State. All that the customer gets is what remains after these expenses are deducted, and after he charges for his own services his commission.

Now, if, as unquestionably is the fact, they are able to charge the whole amount of State taxation to their customers, and they should be unable, because the amount would be too large in the aggregate, to charge this one fourth of one per cent. to their customers, the whole effect would be that with reference to this tax the profits of the auctioneer will be diminished; that is to say, he will have to pay this one fourth of one per cent. out of his profits; but has the honorable member any knowledge of the profits these auctioneers make in the States? I do not know how it is in the other States—I speak of the State of Maryland particularly—and I suppose it is the case in most of the States, these auctioneers are to be found only in the larger cities, and their number is limited; they give bond; they are selected for their integrity and their skill, and they are not made so numerous that the business will not be profitable to each one of them.

The difference, therefore, between brokers and commission merchants who pay no licenses and auctioneers is, that every man can play the broker and every man can play the commission merchant; but that is not the case with this particular business. This is a business, to use the language of the Senator, set apart, and it is set apart, not for the purpose of being taxed because it is set apart, but it is set apart because it is a very peculiar business, and a very profitable business to the auctioneer. I suppose that half the property, I was about to say half the personal property, in the course of several years, and a great deal of the real estate within the area over which the licenses of the auctioneers extend, passes through the hands of the auctioneers, and they take their commission. If they guaranty where they sell upon credit, as sometimes they do, as well as the brokers and commission merchants—if they guaranty the payment of the purchase money, they charge a commission for that guarantee. If my friend could look at the accounts of the larger auctioneers in New York, in Philadelphia, and in Baltimore, he would find that their profits are very heavy.

It does not appear to me, therefore, that there is any weight, I was about to say—certainly there is some, because the honorable member moves it, and moves it upon authority upon which he has a right to rely—in the objection that this would be too heavy a tax, a tax which, if imposed, would prevent these gentlemen from carrying on their business. That it will not have that effect I am perfectly satisfied is certain. If it has any effect injurious to them, it will only be that to the extent of this one fourth of one per cent. they will not have it in their power to charge it to their customers.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course there is no question about the constitutional authority of Congress in this matter. We may impose the tax if it is thought desirable; and the only question I have undertaken to present is simply this: whether under the circumstances the increased tax is advisable.

The Senator reminds us that if we take notice of this State tax, and on account of the existence of the State tax we forbear to tax, we to a certain extent submit to a constraint that comes from a State tax. Now, it does seem to me that we must look at the thing as it is. We are endeavoring to arrange a system of taxation that, so far as possible, shall be equal and even, and not too onerous upon individuals or different classes of business. That is the object of every one of us; and in carrying out that object we are bound, I submit, to look at existing State laws or usages to see how they affect different classes of business. Looking at those laws and usages, we find that there is one class of business peculiarly affected by them. It is that of the auctioneer, which is brought within the sphere of State taxation. In that respect it differs from almost every other business, the business of the manufacturer, of the commission merchant, and of the broker; not that the State may not tax all of those persons, but in point of fact the State does not tax them.

I submit that while we are arranging our system of taxation we ought to take the actual facts into consideration, and not to make our tax bear unduly hard. The fact is that there is a very heavy State tax imposed upon the auctioneer, and it seems to me we ought to recognize it. We did recognize it two years ago, and after a considerable debate—I think it ran over half a day, and I do not know but a whole day—we put it at one tenth of one per cent.; and I believe the business has gone on very well upon that tax since. I have heard no reason for increasing it to one fourth of one per cent., while on the contrary I do hear objections. I hope, therefore, that the tax will be put where it was two years ago.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts this question: when we are increasing the tax imposed on all other sorts of products and business to get a revenue, why should not this be increased proportionably? Why should we leave it as it was?

Mr. SUMNER. If this business can bear the increase, I say increase it.

Mr. CLARK. We find that other kinds of business can bear it, and it must bear it. I wish to suggest to the Senate and the Senator from Massachusetts that while they tax auctioneers in Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, there are many States that do not tax them at all, and the question for us to consider is what these people can bear in the States of the Union and leave the States to adjust their State taxation to the whole class as they exist throughout the Union. It seems to me that the tax on auctioneers and upon their business is not too large. I myself was very reluctant to agree in committee to the tax on commercial brokers. I thought it was too low. We have got it at one twentieth of one per cent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is on the sale of stocks and money and those things; on merchandise it is one eighth of one per cent.

Mr. CLARK. Then there is not so much difference as I supposed there was; but I think the tax is not too high as it stands here on auctioneers.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask, why should the business of the auctioneer be taxed one fourth of one per cent. and that of the broker one eighth?

Mr. CLARK. I suggest it is because of the different manner in which he does his business, at public outcry. The other man is obliged to go around and seek a customer or invite a customer to come in and find his place of sale; but here the auctioneer stands in his place of business, puts out a flag and sells at public outcry. That is the difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is another reason: the auctioneer gets from two to five per cent. commission and the broker only one half or one fourth of one per cent.

Mr. CLARK. That is another reason, because he gets a higher commission. I was answering the question why we tax auctioneers differently from brokers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can make another answer to the Senator. We had a sort of delegation of auctioneers from the city of New York, and they complained very bitterly that while we taxed them one fourth of one per cent. we did not tax the brokers of merchandise at all; they were excluded in the first tax that was laid upon brokers. It was only laid on those who sold coin. The Senator will notice on page 151 that we have inserted this clause:

Upon all sales of merchandise, produce, or other goods, one eighth of one per cent.

That delegation stated to us that if we would put one half the tax on brokers that we put on auctioneers it would make it about right.

Mr. SUMNER. The explanation of that I understand is this: there is a large class of business that may go into the hands of an auctioneer or of a broker equally. For instance, take a cargo of teas. A cargo of teas from China arrives in Boston or in New York, and the owner of it may dispose of it through a broker or through an auctioneer. The tendency, as I understand, of business now is to dispose of a cargo of teas through a broker, for the reason that the broker does not pay so high a tax as the auctioneer. The consequence of that is that the auctioneer loses that class of business which has in times past belonged to him naturally.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think that makes any difference.

Mr. POMEROY. I will inquire whether this tax would apply to the men who sell the public lands of the United States. All the public lands are sold at public sale.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator must look through the bill and see. He looks at the land question and does not look at anything else.

Mr. POMEROY. I have looked through the bill and I cannot find whether it does or not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We shall not affect sales by the Government a great deal.

Mr. President, I wish to state one fact in regard to this matter. It is very difficult indeed to tell how much reliance may be placed upon persons doing different kinds of business who come to see the committee. Some of them, and perhaps the greater part of them, are honest men, but all of them are plausible, and it is pretty difficult to distinguish between those who may be entirely trusted and those who may not. One thing, however, is observable, to the credit of the country be it said, that all are very desirous that a heavy tax should be laid and money should be raised to support the Government: "Tax, tax, that is all right; there never was so good a time as now to put on the tax; but with regard to our particular business it is a little hard." [Laughter.] They are very apt to make that exception in all cases: "We are perfectly willing that you shall tax, but be very careful about the business in which we are interested; that requires a great deal of care and discrimination, and a low tax on that will always produce a much greater revenue than a higher one." That was almost invariably the story, until it got to be so entirely common that we at last began to think that we must exercise some little judgment of our own on the subject.

With regard to this matter of auctioneers, the Senator speaks of the principle upon which they are taxed. He is, perhaps, aware that, whether rightly or wrongfully, all countries that have laid this internal revenue tax have singled out this kind of business for taxation. There is a book published on the subject, with reference to the English system, exclusively devoted to auction sales. I looked it over two years ago, but my memory is not a very good one, and I do not remember much of it. It satisfied me, however, that it was a very convenient and proper subject of taxation on account of its peculiar nature. The States seem to be of the same opinion; and I think, inasmuch as we have established the principle that we will tax auction sales as being a peculiar kind of business, which in its very nature will bear taxation, it being a mere agency paying well, the only question that remains to be considered is the amount of the tax.

I was struck by the fact that the auctioneers who first came here and talked with us about it stated that the only difficulty was between them and the brokers with regard to these sales, and they said distinctly that if we put half the tax upon the brokers who sold merchandise and the same things that they sold that we put upon them, it would be about right. Accordingly, not perceiving why the brokers should not pay a reasonable tax, we did it. The next thing was, we had a delegation saying that owing to the peculiar nature of the business, as carried on in New York, it would not do to tax them at all. The gentleman who came to us was a very clear-headed and excellent gentleman, and in a very few remarks he gave his opinion, stating that he came as a delegation, and went off after giving his opinions. We, however, remained of the same opinion as we were before, that under the circumstances the tax of one fourth of one per cent., inasmuch as we put a tax of one eighth on brokers of merchandise, &c., which they do not seem to complain of, would be about right.

The House of Representatives did not put any tax on the sale of merchandise. We impose a tax of one eighth of one per cent. With regard to the sale of stocks, &c., that is an entirely different kind of business; the profit is very small, almost minute; and on full consideration we came to the conclusion that a tax of one twentieth of one per cent. was as much as that business would bear, and we fixed it accordingly at that rate.

I can only say that the bill as it stands is the result of the most careful and deliberate and, I certainly may say, unprejudiced consideration that the committee could give to the whole subject. If Senators can throw any further light on the subject, and satisfy themselves that the committee is wrong, I shall be very glad to have anything wrong in the bill corrected. I have no private opinion about it, as I stated before. My own opinion is, this tax had better stand.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will understand that I do not come forward in any spirit of criticism of the committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. SUMNER. All I have said I have said in the way of honest contribution to the perfection of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I assure the Senator I do not take it in any other sense.

Mr. SUMNER. I did not suppose the Senator did; but I wish to exonerate myself from all possibility of any such suggestion. As I have already stated, I have received several letters on the subject. The Senator from Maine may remember, but probably he has forgotten it, that two years ago I interested myself in this very question, when the bill was originally before the Senate; and now, my own impression, after looking into the matter, is that if we persevere in the rate adopted two years ago, all things considered, that would, perhaps, be the best, though I see the difficulties in that. Those difficulties grow out of the fact that any uniform rule, applicable to all cases, is productive of some hardship. Different kinds of auction sales produce different degrees of profit, and they might pay, therefore, a different rate of tax. There is a certain part of the business of an auctioneer, that to which I have already referred, as, for instance, the sale of a cargo of teas on a large scale, where the tax which is now proposed would be very onerous indeed, and out of proportion.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not expect or suppose that the proposition of the committee will be changed by the Senate, and yet it is my belief that this tax is too high. The auctioneer in the State of New York pays that State three fourths of one per cent. every year, and now if we add to that another fourth, it makes one per cent. discrimination against him, and in favor of the commission merchant. I understand that the auctioneer, such is the nature of the business, cannot charge the whole amount of this tax over to his customer; he pays it now out of his own pocket. I do not know what there is in the nature of the auctioneer's business that would justify this discrimination between him and the commission merchant. He is, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, but a commission merchant. The only difference between them is the mode in which they make their sales. Each sells goods for another. He is an agent for the principal, and sells goods for the principal. I cannot see why the auctioneer should be made to pay a tax of one per cent. when the commission merchant pays only one eighth of one per cent.

I am not very observing nor have I much experience in relation to commercial affairs, but I have observed in the course of my business life that the amount of auction business in the city of New York has been reduced, I think one half; certainly there is not near the amount of auction business now that there was formerly, and there is a great deal more commission business done. The commission merchant, in my judgment, is getting the advantage of the auction merchant in consequence of this tax. It seems to me there is no good reason why the auctioneer should be taxed in this bill a quarter of one per cent. and the commission merchant only one eighth of one per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to add one or two words to the statements that have already been made in regard to this tax. If the auctioneer sold only the same character of goods as the commercial broker, there would be no justice in discriminating between them. There is no reason why, because goods are sold at public outcry, the tax should be higher than when sold by samples; but there is this difference: an auctioneer sells a very different kind of merchandise. It is true that formerly the auctioneer in New York sold teas, coffees, and the like; but I am informed that that business has now chiefly gone into the hands of mercantile brokers, who, by hiring a little office in Wall street or some other street in New York, sell cargoes of coffee, teas, and other products by small samples. People who desire to buy large quantities of such goods go and inspect the samples and buy from the samples. They take the place of auctioneers in a great measure.

But auctioneers besides selling, sometimes, cargoes of this kind, sell furniture, dry goods, and a great variety of articles that are not sold by the broker and cannot be sold by the broker; that are only sold by inspection, each person seeing the article before buying it.

An auctioneer receives as his commission for selling these goods from three to five per cent., while the commercial or mercantile broker never receives over one half of one per cent., and I believe the usual commission in New York is one fourth of one per cent. It is manifest, therefore, that if you apply the same rate of taxation to both employments you do injustice to the commercial broker. The tax of one eighth of one per cent. on the commercial broker is much higher in proportion to the amount received by him than a tax of one per cent. on the auctioneer. Every county in the United States has an auctioneer. Their sales are varied. They sell generally personal property, horses, cattle, and furniture, and they sell at open outcry. There a tax of one per cent. is very small indeed. As we must apply some general principle of taxation, it seems to me to make it less than that it would be utterly insignificant. In New York, perhaps, and in the very large cities, it may operate unjustly, especially when applied to the sale of cargoes of coffee and tea; but I do not know of any other auction sales where the tax would be considered too high.

Mr. GRIMES. I have no controversy with the proposition of the committee to fix the percentage upon auctions at one fourth of one per cent. and shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; but if I can get an opportunity I shall move to strike out the word "eighth" in the thirteenth line of the ninety-eighth section and substitute the word "sixth," so as to make commercial brokers pay one sixth instead of one eighth of one per cent.

Mr. SUMNER. That will come up when this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir. If the Senator from Ohio knows of any branch of mercantile business in New York that is not done through a mercantile broker, he knows something that I do not. I know that there are mercantile brokers in almost every branch of business. There are hardware brokers; there are brokers who deal in almost every particular kind of domestic manufacture, and in various kinds of foreign imported articles. I agree with the Senators from New York and Massachusetts; I cannot conceive of any earthly reason why a man who goes into the Corn Exchange in New York or Chicago, and there makes a sale upon that public ground of a large amount of produce or merchandise, ought not to pay, pretty nearly as large a percentage as the auctioneer who sells in his own domicile, and who is at the expense of renting and keeping it open.

It is said that the auctioneer gets a larger percentage. So he does, providing he guarantees the sale; and so does the broker when he guarantees the sale. They both sell by samples. I think the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] who is familiar with sales in New York, will bear testimony to that fact. They both sell by samples; and it is true, as has been stated here to-night, the tendency has been to have the business of the country done in these cities through these brokers. Every new corn exchange, and they are establishing exchanges of different kinds, and have even got that of boots and shoes in some of the States—tends to break up the business of the auctioneers and puts this business into the hands of the brokers. If there can be any reason assigned why the broker should not pay as much as the auctioneer I am not able to discover the reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRIMES. I now propose—

Mr. CLARK. You cannot offer that amendment until we get into the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. There is one amendment that is not perhaps strictly in order and I cannot offer it until we get into the Senate, but I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it, and perhaps he will have it made, and save the trouble of referring to it in the Senate. It is on page 234, the new section relating to consuls of foreign countries. There is this proviso to the section:

Provided, That the countries which such consuls may represent shall extend similar exemption to the consuls of the United States.

It will be apparent that the assessors or collectors cannot easily have the means of knowing what the laws of foreign countries on this subject are, and I would suggest the addition of these words: "and the certificate of the Secretary of State shall be the evidence of such exemption in foreign countries," so that the assessors shall address the Secretary of State in order to ascertain whether our consuls in foreign countries have the exemption which it is proposed to allow to them in ours.

Without some such provision as that it seems to me the section would be very difficult to carry into execution; indeed, I do not know how the assessors will ascertain that fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was about to remark that probably the Commissioner of Internal Revenue could ascertain the fact in regard to it and instruct the assessors. Those things generally go through the Commissioner. I have no manner of objection, however, to the amendment suggested, except that the certificate could not well be furnished to each assessor. I think there will be no difficulty about it as it stands, because the Commissioner of Internal Revenue would ascertain the fact and inform the assessors.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; I will not offer the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move to amend the bill on page 17, section nineteen, line four, by inserting after the word "be" the words "if not, then in some newspaper in the collection district most accessible;" so that the advertisements shall be published somewhere at all events. It will then read:

That the assessors for each collection district shall, by advertisement in some public newspaper published in each county within said district, if any such there be, if not, then in some newspaper in the collection district most accessible, and by notifications to be posted up in at least four public places within each assessment district, advertise, by not less than ten days' notice, all persons concerned of the time (or which not less than ten days' notice shall be given) and place within said county when and where appeals will be received, &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not suppose there is a district in the United States where there is not a newspaper.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir, there are.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think that amendment is necessary.

Mr. ANTHONY. At any rate it cannot do any harm, and if there is any necessity for it it is desirable to have it done. There are districts where there are no newspapers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not object to it if the Senator thinks it necessary; but "most accessible" would hardly do.

Mr. ANTHONY. Say "nearest thereto."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, on page 34, section twenty-nine, line eleven, after the words "in writing," I move to insert "a copy thereof to be sent by mail."

Mr. FESSENDEN. We thought that in a case of that sort it would be hardly advisable to allow the notice to be sent by mail. It will be noticed that that section provides for the seizure and sale of real estate, and that is so important a matter that if a person has a place of residence or business in the district, we thought that before his estate was seized and sold he should have actual notice. There are not many such cases, and notice can be served in person or left at his last usual place of abode without difficulty. That matter came up for consideration, and the committee thought, on the whole, that in so important a proceeding as the seizure and sale of real estate for taxes there ought to be special pains taken to give actual notice to the parties.

Mr. ANTHONY. Unquestionably. But this is in addition to the notice in fact.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If you give the notice in person or serve it at his house what is the use of sending it by mail besides?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can see no objection to it. It is an additional precaution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is imposing an additional duty on the officer.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is taking every precaution. The person may not be at his house, he may be away, and notice might reach him by mail that would not reach him if left at his house. It has this merit, that it is an additional notice.

Mr. CLARK. The committee considered that there could be no sort of necessity for that. In the first place the original notice is given to the man in hand or left at his last usual place of abode; and then if you require the officer to send a copy of the notice by mail, the original not having gone by mail, it not only imposes the duty of sending a copy through the mail, but obliges the collector to preserve evidence of having sent a copy so that he may perfect the sale. When you have given the man the notice in hand or left it at his place of abode, there seems to be no sense and no necessity for putting a copy of that notice into the mail.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The notice is an extended notice. He has to state a good many things in it. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Clerk will find these amendments in the printed amendments that were offered, by my colleague who is not in his seat, and at whose request I take charge of them.

In section fifty-eight, line thirty-two, I move to insert after the word "used" the words:

Provided, That whisky distilled and consumed in the production of fabrics for wearing apparel, at the place of such production, upon which a duty of five per cent. is assessed upon the gross amount thereof, shall be exempt from tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is exempting all that is used in manufactures.

Mr. ANTHONY. In manufactures on the premises.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. On the same page, after section fifty-nine, I move to insert as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the owner or owners of any manufactory of cotton or woolen goods may provide, at his or their own expense, a warehouse, established in conformity with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, and such warehouse, when approved by the collector, is hereby declared a bonded warehouse of the United States, and shall be used only for storing cotton or woolen goods, and to be under the custody of the collector or his deputy. And the duty on the cotton or woolen goods stored in such warehouse shall be paid before they are removed, in pursuance of law.

This is to give the domestic producer the same advantage in paying his duties that is given to the foreign producer. A man imports fabrics and he places them in a bonded warehouse, and when he desires to put them upon the market he pays the duty. There are two seasons of the year when fabrics of this kind are mainly sold, in the spring and in the fall; but the production goes on all the time, and the importation goes on all the time. The importer has the privilege of placing his goods in bond and paying the duties only when he puts them on the market. Why should not the domestic producer have the same privilege? He can put them in bond under regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury as I propose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The imported goods are put in public stores.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is in public stores.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, his own store.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have not got quite through. I must try to get something out of the chairman of the Committee on Finance if I can.

In section eighty-five, line thirty-seven, I move to strike out "First. Freight from the place of deposit, at the time of sale, to the place of delivery," and to insert:

First. For all sums paid for storage, freight, insurance, and labor, from the place of manufacturing to the place of deposit or sale and delivery, and for actual interest from the commencement of production to the date of sale.

The object of the section, I take it, is that goods which are sold at the place of production shall pay the same duty as goods sold in commission houses consigned to other places, and the section exempts one of the expenses. I do not see any reason why that expense should be deducted rather than all the others. It seems to me that the goods sold at the place of production, or the goods sold at the place of distribution, should be reduced to precisely the same basis for taxation, and that is the object of the amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In other words that until the goods are sold by the manufacturer the Government shall pay him interest on them.

Mr. ANTHONY. Not so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is the provision proposed.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is not that the Government shall pay him interest, but that the manufacturer shall not pay duty on the interest which he pays.

Mr. CLARK. You allow him interest.

Mr. ANTHONY. No, it is only the duty on the interest that is to be deducted.

Mr. JOHNSON. Read it again.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Maine might as well say that the Government pays the manufacturer freight on his goods as that it pays him interest. It merely exempts the duty from interest and from freight. If the provision of the section is correct the amendment is proper. It merely carries out the same principle which is acknowledged in the bill, but only imperfectly carried out. I hope the Senator from Maine will yield to us this amendment; he has been rather hard on us.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It does not depend on the Senator from Maine, though the Senator from Maine thinks the amendment a very absurd one. [Laughter.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Then I hope the Senate will vote him down.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. On page 116, line forty, of the same section, I move to insert after the words "per cent." the following words:

For guarantee not exceeding three per cent. actually paid, and for such amounts of interest as will reduce time sales to cash, for customary allowance for wear and tear of machinery used in the production of the article taxed.

That is precisely on the same principle as the preceding amendment. They both ought to be adopted. They both reduce the goods that are sold at the point of distribution to the same rate of taxation as the goods that are sold at the point of production. I cannot see how the committee can assent to the exemption they have made in this section and not agree to go to the extent now proposed.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. In section ninety-three, line nineteen, I move to strike out the words "by the purchasers thereof;" and insert "one half by the purchasers and one half by the sellers thereof;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That in case of contracts of lease of coal lands made prior to the passage of this act the lessee shall pay the tax, if not otherwise agreed; and all duties or taxes on coal mined and delivered by coal operators on contracts heretofore made shall be paid one half by the purchasers and one half by the sellers thereof, if not otherwise agreed by the parties.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. The next amendment which I propose to offer is so reasonable and just that I hope the Senator from Maine will agree to it. It is to insert after line four hundred and thirty-eight, of section ninety-three, this proviso:

Provided, That if any of the articles named herein are manufactured in one district and receive final process in another, if manufactured by one and the same party, the tax shall be assessed in the district in which the article as aforesaid receives its final process.

There are a great many articles of manufacture that go through different processes at different places; and where the same producer finishes the perfect article, taking it from the raw material, this amendment allows him to pay the tax upon the whole value of the article when finished, instead of paying it from time to time at different stages of its manufacture.

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose he does not finish it?

Mr. ANTHONY. Never finishes it?

Mr. JOHNSON. Suppose he sells it in an unfinished state?

Mr. ANTHONY. Then the provision does not apply to him.

Mr. JOHNSON. But he gets off without any tax.

Mr. ANTHONY. Certainly not. The amendment only applies where the article receives final process. If he sells it before it receives final process it does not apply to him.

Mr. JOHNSON. But then he pays no tax.

Mr. ANTHONY. If a man violates the law, he is subject to its penalties.

Mr. COLLAMER. By "final process," I suppose, is meant that process which subjects the article to taxation.

Mr. ANTHONY. I mean that process which places it in the hands of the consumer ready for consumption.

Mr. COLLAMER. It would be considered finished when subject to tax, though it might not have received final process.

Mr. ANTHONY. The term "final process" may be an indefinite one. I do not know as much as the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Vermont on almost anything else, but I do know more about manufacturing, and I know this amendment will be a very great convenience.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It will enable a manufacturer to escape a part of the tax.

Mr. ANTHONY. I take it you do not want to make the bill unnecessarily odious to the people.

Mr. COLLAMER. Suppose you take a piece of muslin-de-laine, all finished except the printing, is it not subject to taxation then?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then it has its "final process" for the purpose of taxation; but if you go on and have it printed in another place, and call that the final process, it may escape the first taxation altogether.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot see it so. I hope that certainly those Senators whose constituents are concerned in textile productions will vote for this amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My constituents are, and I will vote against it.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to ask Senators why when a man carries on these two branches of manufacture he should be allowed to be taxed differently from the persons who carry on each a different branch. One party may make printing cloths and pay the tax at the end of that process; another party may make printing cloths and print them, and he wants to pay the tax all at the end of the printing, whereas somebody else might print the first printing cloths. Why not let us all be taxed together? One man may be fortunate enough to own establishments to carry on the whole, but it is not so with everybody. Let everybody stand alike under the law.

Mr. ANTHONY. I can answer the Senator's question. The reason why a man who carries on both processes should be taxed differently from the man who carries on but one, is because it will be a great deal more convenient to him and just as well for the Government; and it seems to me that we ought in laying these taxes to make them as convenient to the people as we can. A man escapes no taxation, but it is much more convenient to him.

Mr. CLARK. It does not always follow that because it is more convenient to the individual it is more convenient or safe to the Government. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have got one more amendment yet. On page 156, section one hundred and two, line thirty-seven, I move to insert after the word "notwithstanding" the following words:

Provided further, That when the production of any manufactured article shall not realize a net profit more than sufficient to keep the apparatus, machinery, or manufactory in efficient repair, meaning thereby that a customary amount shall remain to the manufacturer for the wear and tear of his apparatus, machinery, or manufactory, the tax of five per cent., as heretofore provided upon the gross amount of products, shall be remitted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is, the Government must insure the manufacturer a profit! The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ANTHONY. I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment that was passed by and no question taken upon it, at page 139; and if the committee shall assent to the proposition which I shall suggest, I should like to have it adopted; otherwise I shall reserve it until we get in the Senate. On page 139, line three hundred and twelve of section ninety-three, the tax on stoves is raised from $1 50 to $5; that is two hundred and thirty-three per cent. Stoves are used mainly by the poorer classes of people. Almost all the tenement houses are built now without fire-places. The fire-places take up a great deal of room and cost a good deal in construction. The houses are built with small chimneys, merely to carry off the smoke from the stove-pipes. The taxes on the raw material of which stoves are manufactured have been, as we all know, very largely increased. Iron which was worth from sixteen to eighteen dollars a ton a few years ago is now sixty dollars, I think. I think this imposes rather a larger tax than the committee would intend on articles intended for the poorer classes of people.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment of the Senator would not now be in order. I thought myself that five dollars a ton on hollow-ware was out of proportion, but it cannot be acted on in committee.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought, perhaps, the committee would agree to my suggestion. If not, I shall move my amendment in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am satisfied it is about right as it stands.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; I am satisfied we cannot do anything with the Senator from Maine this evening. [Laughter.] We shall have to wait until we get into the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. I thought of moving an amendment that where the words "States and Territories" are used they shall be construed to include the District of Columbia. The bill does not apply to the District of Columbia now; so I thought that at the close of the bill we should say that where the words "States and Territories" are used in this act they shall be construed to include the District of Columbia, where such a construction is not inapplicable.

Mr. CLARK. We have inserted "the District of Columbia" very frequently.

Mr. POMEROY. I see it inserted only once or twice.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the bill is not correct in that respect, the Senator will have an opportunity to move an amendment at another time. That is a matter which I believe is under the consideration of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. POMEROY. There are half a dozen places where it should be inserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think that had better be left until we get into the Senate.

Mr. POMEROY. If the Senator from Wisconsin will attend to it, very well.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Finance Committee have a considerable number of amendments which they propose to offer, but not until the bill gets into the Senate, as they are not all quite prepared yet, and we want to take the bill out of Committee of the Whole to-night if we can.

Mr. COWAN. I have a single amendment that I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to propose. It is on page 138, line two hundred and ninety-eight of section ninety-three, after the word "rods" to insert "ax-poles."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOOT.) The question is on concurring in the amendments which have been made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CLARK. On conference with the chairman of the Finance Committee, it is deemed advisable to let all the amendments stand non-concurred in until we have been over the bill and have perfected it. If that can be done, and the record properly kept, the committee would desire to take that course.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is impossible probably to single out now the amendments upon which Senators will want separate votes. We propose, therefore, to let the bill stand and let Senators call for separate votes on such amendments as they please, and after they get through with those to adopt all the other amendments in gross.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order of proceeding is entirely in the control of the Senate.

Mr. CLARK. If we were to concur now, it might be that we should concur in amendments that ought to be further considered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to inquire if it would be practicable to print these amendments by themselves.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think there is time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not mean the whole bill, but the amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It would be impossible to pick them all out and print them in time, they are so numerous.

Mr. COLLAMER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 2, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POLICY OF THE ADMINISTRATION.

Mr. GRIDER, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to publish in the Globe remarks on the policy of the Administration. [The speech will be published in the Appendix.]

MISSOURI CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to call up the case of Knox vs. Blair from the first congressional district of Missouri.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a privileged question. I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is very important, if the House expects to transact its business so as to adjourn before August or September, that it should proceed with the special order for to-day. I trust the gentleman has had enough of these Missouri contested-election cases to satisfy him for the present.

Mr. GANSON. I rise to a question of privilege, and desire to present the report of the minority in the case called by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As two questions of privilege and one privileged question only are before the House, I think I ought to have an opportunity of offering a resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAWES. I must object.

The minority report submitted by Mr. GANSON was received, laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWES. I gave notice some two weeks ago of my intention to call up on a particular day named this case of Knox and Blair. Upon that day, at the earnest solicitation of the parties in another election case, I gave way, and there have intervened two of these cases since that time.

I am aware that the House is tired of these election cases; I will not say of Missouri cases particularly, but of these questions of privilege which the Committee of Elections very inopportunistically is forever compelled to thrust on the House. But, sir, they are questions of importance to the parties and of importance to the House. They affect the rights of members to their seats. The Committee of Elections have hastened them forward as fast as the amount of labor devolved on that committee has enabled them to do. We have been aware that the time would come toward the close of the session when these questions would become very irksome to the House, and when they would hardly receive the amount of consideration due to questions of such importance. They have, therefore, desired to bring them before the House as early as possible, and they do not feel that they are guilty of any neglect in the delay which has occurred.

Now, Mr. Speaker, here is a case which has involved the committee in some embarrassment. One of the parties to the contest is not present in the House, and we have had some difficulty in arranging a hearing of the case in consequence of that fact. We have sought by conferences with those representing that party, who is now in the field, to make some arrangement, but it has been found difficult, if not impossible. They have been compelled, as a matter of duty to this party, to bring the matter up at this time. While I recognize the importance of the measure which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] represents to the whole House and to the country, still I have to say if this case is to be heard at all this session, it does seem to me that it should be heard now; and I do not feel at liberty, therefore, to yield the position which the rules entitle me to. While any motion may be made in reference to it, I should regret to see the matter postponed.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the subject be postponed for one week after to-morrow; and on that motion I demand the previous question.

Mr. GANSON. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the demand for the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. GANSON. I submit the report of the minority of the Committee of Elections in this case, and move that it be laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL renewed the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. DAWES demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 78, noes 25.

So the further consideration of the subject was postponed for one week from to-morrow.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 395, entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;" when the Speaker signed the same.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. STEVENS, from the select committee on the Pacific railroad, reported back House bill No. 438, to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and a telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July, 1862, with a substitute; and moved that it be ordered to be printed, and its further consideration postponed until Thursday next after the morning hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that it be made the special order for Thursday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, informed the House that the Senate has agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 426) creating an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAZ, his Private Secretary, informed the House that he had approved and signed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili;

An act (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856;

An act (H. R. No. 494) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the accounts of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China.

BUSINESS OF JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRILL. As this day has been set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Judiciary, I move that that business be postponed to the day after the House has disposed of the tariff bill, after the morning hour. The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say that it is the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means to give up this entire day to the discussion of the tariff bill, and to-morrow to consider amendments under the five minutes rule. I now move that the House shall take a recess from five o'clock to half past seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. ANCONA. I object to five o'clock; say half past four o'clock.

Mr. MORRILL. I agree to that modification.

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being House bill No. 494, to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I am not about to make an elaborate speech. The only ambition I have is to make such a statement of the character and purpose of the bill now before us as will save the time which would otherwise be spent in explanations during the progress of the bill through the committee.

While sudden and frequent changes of tax and tariff bills are undesirable because of the shock and revolution they bring upon the trade and commerce of the country, the reasons for some change now are potential and obvious. The Treasury requires a larger supply of means, and such sources of revenue as have not already yielded their maximum contributions must now be sought, so that we may fill the measure of our wants. This has made an increase of internal duties necessary, and that increase to a considerable extent imposes upon us the duty as well as affords us the power of obtaining an increased revenue from duties on imports from abroad. The withdrawal of the large number of men now in the field from industrial pursuits leaves a paucity of numbers at home, thereby advancing wages and the cost of living, so that a bushel of corn, a pound of wool, a yard of cloth, or a ton of iron cannot now, even reducing the currency to a specie standard, be produced at the same cost they were three years ago. With the tariff considerably increased, and even if we had no internal taxes to pay, our people will hardly find it less difficult to compete with foreign productions and manufactures than they did in times of peace without any increase of the tariff. And when we impose a tax of five per cent. upon our manufactures and increase the tariff to the same extent upon foreign manufactures, we leave them upon the same relative footing they were at the start, and neither has causes of complaint. The rates proposed are high nominally, and may be so regarded by foreign nations; but considering the weights carried by our own people, other nations will still be able to continue the race with us upon nearly the same terms as heretofore. It may be said that duties upon imports are paid in specie while the internal tax is paid in currency, but it must be noted that the specie is paid on a foreign specie valuation, while internal revenue is paid on the currency valuation which obtains here, and this very accurately equalizes the one with the other. By this adjustment we have it in our power to obtain five per cent. upon all foreign and domestic manufactures sold and consumed in the country without inflicting any other injury than the increased cost to the consumer. That this is an evil, especially so far as the ordinary necessities of life are concerned, is cheerfully admitted. To some extent the consumption will be economized and curtailed. I would gladly, if I knew how, at any time, and especially at this, do anything by which the number of days' labor required by man to furnish himself and family with food and raiment should be diminished. But so far as the luxuries of life or the elegant or vulgar vices of habit, or the expensive and ornamental follies of fashion are concerned, any tax upon them or any reduction of such superfluous expenditures may be personal inconveniences, but instead of an evil it might prove at this time a great public blessing, and doubly so if the funds thus saved can be made instrumental in the suppression of the rebellion. This sort of "baggage and champagne" should not incumber us in this campaign.

In the present exigency of the country, individuals, as well as the Government, must recognize and obey the obligations of economy. The genius of war is not more a terrible scourge than a merciless spendthrift. The fighting armies, in the smoke and carnage of battle cannot know aught of economy; they have no time to count the cost; but those who have to support such armies must study that homely virtue, praised so much oftener than practiced, or wage short and little wars only. We have a great one on our hands. The earth never trembled under a greater or one more bloody. The duration of the present contest into which we have been so cruelly plunged by rebel conspirators of thirty years' standing cannot, in the light of all history, be foretold; yet, according to the modest but electric words of General Grant, he is to "fight it out on this line if it takes all summer;" and it may not be long before the stars and bars will give place everywhere to the stars and stripes, but we as prudent legislators must grapple with the possible contingencies which may include a war of some years instead of months. I have no idea the war will be protracted by the people of the South one moment after the rebel armies shall have been annihilated, but I do expect it to continue until that annihilation, utter annihilation takes place.

The primary object of the present bill is to increase the revenue upon importations from abroad and at the same time shelter and nurse our domestic products, from which we draw much the largest amount of revenue, so that the aggregate amount shall not be diminished through the substitution of foreign articles for those which we have been accustomed to find at home.

In making an estimate of the effect of such a war tariff as is now proposed, it is important that we should bear in mind that as we increase the cost of any article we diminish the number of those who will be able to consume it. In some cases this is to be regretted, but in the case of such articles as spirituous liquors, old wines, and cigars, it will not excite any particular lamentation. The large tax imposed on domestic spirits, ale, and beer, compels us to place a still larger duty upon spirits, wines, ale, and beer of foreign production. Two dollars per gallon on spirits, and two dollars and a half upon brandy, and the heavy increase on wines will, beyond doubt, for a time reduce the consumption to some extent, but not so much as to prevent a considerable additional revenue from this source, and the additional amount upon wines will be large. It is remarkable that our importations were as large last year, or about four million gallons, as in 1860.

The increase upon sugars is very slight, and might not perhaps have been increased at all but for the heavy duty imposed upon native sugars produced from the sugar-cane. From the latter we shall obtain some increased revenue, but from the former not much addition to the revenue can reasonably be expected. I am free to say that I would have been willing both the internal tax and the tariff should have been something lower; but if we maintain the rates fixed in the internal revenue bill, as this House has agreed, then the rates upon foreign sugars now proposed are no more than just. Upon molasses it is proposed to increase the duty one hundred per cent., or from six to twelve cents a gallon. The duty has been heretofore below that upon sugar in proportion to the saccharine matter contained therein, and this has operated rather to curtail the importation of sugar and to increase that of molasses. One hundred pounds of molasses is, theoretically, supposed to be equal to thirty-nine pounds of sugar. If this were practically true there would yet remain a discrimination in favor of molasses sufficiently large to protect those engaged in the manufacture of sugar from molasses. If an equal ad valorem tax were levied it would bring the duty on molasses somewhat higher; but this is an article consumed by persons of moderate circumstances and it is proper that an advantage should be given in their favor. The present home value of molasses is from seventy-five cents to one dollar per gallon, or an average of eighty-seven and a half cents. An ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. on the home valuation would give seventeen and a half cents per gallon. We propose twelve cents only. The present price of brown sugars is from fourteen to twenty cents per pound, or an average of seventeen cents. An ad valorem duty of twenty per cent. on the home valuation would be three cents and four mills per pound. We propose in the present bill three, three and a half, and four cents per pound, according to grade and quality, or upon an average three cents and a half per pound. The present proposition approaches more nearly to a relative equalization of the two articles, whether we consider the intrinsic or market value, and will secure a large increase of revenue. But in making the calculation I am free to say the cost of manufacturing sugar from molasses, about one cent per pound, and the tax of two and a half per cent. on sales was not considered, and therefore the duty should be made something lower than proposed. The finances of few nations are found to be in such a condition as to enable them to forego duties on sugars. The consumption is large the world over, but larger in proportion to population in the United States than in any other country.

Supposing that four millions of this was distilled in the manufacture of New England rum, it leaves for the consumption of the United States over a billion pounds of sugar and over fifty million gallons of molasses and sorghum. Bring the molasses into the equivalent of sugar, and the whole consumption of sugar would then be about thirty-five pounds per head, and, not counting slaves, over forty pounds per head. If we could collect all the duties proposed, internal duties included, we should obtain over thirty millions of revenue upon sugar and molasses alone; but about thirty per cent. should be deducted for the States over which we have no control. After due allowance for sorghum, maple sugar, and diminished consumption, the increased revenue cannot be less than $3,000,000.

The existing duty upon coffee of five cents per pound, considering the unusual price it now bears in the countries of its growth, is thought to be quite large enough, especially if we pay a proper regard to the consumers, among whom the United States, in behalf of the soldiers, may be reckoned as one of the chiefest. There is another article, whether used to adulterate coffee, as some say, or to give it higher flavor, as others declare, which it has been considered legitimate to tax at the same rate as coffee, and therefore upon chicory, though a much cheaper article, a duty is proposed of four cents in the root and five cents when burnt or ground. An article so largely used as a substitute for coffee it is quite clear should bear an equal tax, and if it is more healthful, or has a more delightful flavor, as is contended for by its commercial friends, such an equality in the eye of the law should meet with no objection.

It is most unfortunate that our currency is subject to so great fluctuations, as the tendency is to draw even solid men into the arena of speculators where they may invest legal tenders in stocks or other property with a view to a rise. This makes it for the interest of all property holders, and especially large holders of merchandise, to depress the value of legal tenders. A decisive victory, whenever it comes, will prove a sharp remedy; but at present, as I profoundly believe, an equally heroic remedy would be to cease the future issue of legal tenders, to cut that base, and rely exclusively on loans and the sale of United States stocks. As soon as our new internal revenue and tariff bills get into operation, even with the present rate of funding, it is true there will no longer be any necessity for a further issue of legal tenders of any description. I think some portion of the amount now afloat should be withdrawn even at the cost of higher rates of interest. This speculative fever enables all holders of merchandise, whether manufacturers or merchants, to realize larger prices and larger profits than they could otherwise do. With the idea that merchandise is sure to rise, they advance prices and realize gains in advance. But it is so uncertain and fictitious that even these would hail solidity and permanence of values as a great boon.

It is also true that many large holders of merchandise urge heavy additions to the duties upon certain articles and assume that they will be so laid to promote the interests of the public Treasury. Meantime, whether currency goes up or not, or whether the tariff goes up or not, prices do go up and all are on the alert to secure the profits based on prophecies destined not to come to pass. Men get drugged with these ideas and are powerless in the hands of skillful operators. But a combination takes place and high prices are in the ascendant. The consumer, more or less panic-stricken, forgetting that the entire wealth of the nation, earned and unearned, stands behind the United States legal tenders, easily becomes a willing dupe and no longer rejects anything in consequence of the price, if the seller will only accept of "greenbacks" in payment for his commodities. I allude to this matter to show that it is not taxes or the tariff which so much enhance prices. Drugs have been affected in this way, spices to some extent, and possibly teas—affected by what it has been boldly proclaimed Congress would do. It may be said that it requires some boldness to say what Congress would not do, as the times have seemed to require some exceptionable measures, or at least do not permit things to remain in their former repose.

The existing duties upon teas of all kinds, and I speak without reference to the fifty per cent. addition recently made by the joint resolution, is twenty cents per pound. It is thought prices have already been advanced as far as they can be sustained if we raise the duty upon teas to twenty-five cents per pound. Although not entirely relevant now—it will be on the second Tuesday of December, when the reciprocity treaty again comes up—I desire to show in connection with teas how the American tea trade with the British provinces now stands, as it will illustrate their system of levying duties. The Canadian tariff imposes on teas three cents per pound, and fifteen per cent. ad valorem at the port or place whence last imported. (It is now somewhat changed by law of 1862.) Black teas cost about twenty-five cents and green teas about thirty-five cents per pound upon an average in China. The cost to import teas per pound, not including the cost in China, is, with gold at 185, about seventy-five cents per pound, which brings the first cost of teas in New York at $1 10 per pound. Their value then is from that sum to $1 40, say $1 25. Now the specific duty is say three cents, then fifteen per cent. ad valorem when imported from the United States would be levied on $1 25, and is eighteen cents and seven mills, making twenty-one cents and seven mills. When the same tea is imported to Canada from China the specific is the same, three cents, and the fifteen per cent. ad valorem is, on thirty-five cents, five cents and two mills, making eight cents and two mills; so that tea cannot be exported from the United States to Canada without paying about thirteen and a half cents more than when it is brought there from China. And this is the discrimination intended to practically exclude and does exclude us from their trade.

No more has been proposed because, in proportion to its original cost, that is a high duty; more would be as likely to diminish as to increase the revenue, and with our people it has been an article of necessity which "cheers but does not inebriate." In times of peace teas have been admitted free of duty, and we may hope for that time again, but not now. We consume of green teas about 13,000,000 pounds, and of black about 14,500,000 pounds, or in all 27,500,000 pounds. The actual importations of 1863 were 29,761,037 pounds. The increased revenue from this source may be estimated at one and one fourth million dollars.

One question has more perplexed the Congress of the United States than almost any other that I am aware of, and that is the adjustment of the duties on wool and woollens so as to obtain revenue and at the same time to distribute justice to all parties. Some encouragement has been intended always to increase the production of wool. But up to 1860 the increase on the growth of wool was less than the increase of almost anything else of which the census makes any return. From 1850 to 1860 the increase was less than ten million pounds. Population increased thirty-five and wool only fifteen per cent. The tariff of 1861 was intended to obtain some revenue upon the importations of such wool as comes into competition with American wools. To this end a duty of three cents per pound was placed on all wools costing between eighteen and twenty-four cents, and nine cents per pound on all above twenty-four cents per pound. Wool below eighteen cents was intended to cover only coarse wools for carpets, of which very little is grown here, and on this only five per cent. was placed. I then thought that the coarse wools should have been fixed below fifteen cents, but others thought differently. In fact, at that time all the woolen manufacturers, save one, that I knew, gave the tariff of 1861 the cold shoulder. It had very little support from them, although in the duties upon woollens a specific duty upon the pound of woolen cloth was proposed, reckoning two pounds of American wool as equivalent to one pound of cloth; and this was intended to cover and did cover all or nearly all the duties proposed on wool. The woolen manufacturing establishments have since prospered, and I am rejoiced that they have prospered. Before this time their capital invested was not worth seventy-five cents on the dollar of first cost. Now they are generally worth par or a premium. We now manufacture many millions more of woolen goods than ever before, and our importations are at least eight to ten millions less, though still very large. The wool-grower has so far prospered, also, as to increase the stock of American-grown wools more in three years than three decades before, and yet he has not kept pace with the wants of the woolen manufacturers. The clip of wool for 1863 may be estimated at eighty to eighty-five million pounds, and will not be (with the ten millions produced in the seceded States) much less than one hundred millions for 1864. There is much of last year's clip of wool now on hand unsold, and at a time when we cannot afford to hoard it and send away gold to pay for foreign wools. This shows there is some defect in the law that must be remedied, and that the manufacturer is in a better position than the wool-grower. This more clearly appears from the trade in wools:

Pounds.
Wool imported from abroad in 1863 was..... 72,837,993
Wool imported under the reciprocity treaty was 1,989,053
74,838,046

To this must be added the amount of waste or shoddy (in 1862 it was 6,231,077 pounds,) estimated at 8,000,000 pounds, making 82,838,046 pounds, or nearly as much as was raised in the United States the same year, which it may be a liberal estimate to call 85,000,000 pounds, and this makes 167,838,046 pounds.

The capacity of our woolen mills in 1860 did not exceed 100,000,000 pounds of wool, and the addition of new machines and increased speed does not now probably go beyond 150,000,000 pounds, and they cannot be supposed to have actually worked up much over 140,000,000 pounds. Supposing there are 25,000,000 of loyal people to clothe, and that it requires four pounds of wool for each, it would amount, with the not less than 40,000,000 pounds worked up into Army cloths, blankets, &c., to 140,000,000 pounds manufactured in the United States. This would leave 20,000,000 pounds or more of domestic wools of last year's clip on hand to serve no other purpose than to depress the price of this year's clip. Ought such a state of facts to continue?

Of the immense amount of imported* wools, (74,838,046 pounds,) almost equal to the whole clip of the United States, there was valued above eighteen cents only 7,617,861 pounds; leaving 67,220,185 pounds—valued abroad upon an average of seventeen cents per pound—which paid a duty only of five per cent. less the free wool under the reciprocity treaty.

I will give in tabular form the amount of wool and woollens, domestic and foreign, consumed in the United States:

Wool—Pounds.
	1840.	1850.	1860.
United States.....	35,802,114	52,516,969	60,511,343
Imported.....	15,066,410	18,669,794	34,588,857
Total.....	50,868,524	71,186,763	95,099,000

Woollens.
United States,...	$20,696,999	$43,207,535	$68,865,963
Imported.....	9,071,184	17,151,609	37,936,946
Total.....	$29,768,083	$60,359,144	$106,802,909

The facts shown here are that our domestic wools had not doubled in twenty years, while the importation of foreign wools had more than doubled. Our woolen manufactures in the same time had more than trebled, and the importations of foreign woollens had more than quadrupled. This is far from creditable to us as a great nation. The market price of wool has advanced recently about six cents per pound, or for good fleece wool to about eighty cents; but when reduced to a specie standard by discounting the premium on gold, now at about ninety per cent., it brings the price down to less than it was at the depressed period of 1861, when, according to Mr. Livermore's (Boston) tables, fine wool was selling at forty-four cents per pound. Under these circumstances the woolen manufacturers should be the first to recognize, with their business so extended, with the high price of cotton and the multiform fabrics introduced for ladies' and gentlemen's summer wear, and not likely soon to go out of fashion, all requiring a very large stock of the raw material, that their business might be seriously embarrassed and imperiled by checking the growth of sheep in this country or compelling the wool-growers to take the prices for which wool can be produced on the grassy but uncultivated plains of Russia, South America, and Australia, or where they slaughter bullocks for their hides and horses for their tails. It is very clear they will not and cannot afford to do it in the north, east, and middle States. It follows that the wool-grower must rely upon the American market solely for the sale of his wool, and the manufacturer must pay more for it than for foreign wools. The adjustment must be made unselfishly, for if too hard terms are imposed upon the manufacturer by the wool-grower both fail together, and it were better at once to cut the sheeps' throats.

* The importations of wool in 1862 were 42,931,937 pounds, of which 1,917,794 pounds came in free under the reciprocity treaty.

The next question to settle is how much, if any, duty should be levied on the lowest cost wool.

The value of wool imported in 1841 was.....	07.2

1849.....	06.5
1850.....	09.
1855.....	11.
1857.....	12.8

And in 1863 the major part of it was from sixteen to seventeen cents per pound. From this it would seem that coarse wools might be obtained at twelve cents or under, and I am informed that even last year when the United States proved so large a purchaser they were bought at eleven cents or under. I do not think they are likely to rise, for if all the American wools are purchased, there must be less competition abroad. Three cents per pound duty on these wools has been proposed, and the duties on coarse carpets and blankets have been increased correspondingly. If they have not, so far as I am concerned I am willing they shall be. On wools above twelve and not over twenty-four cents, six cents per pound is proposed. This will include most of the wools now brought from abroad, and if reckoned as an ad valorem upon sixteen cents per pound, would be very high. It is said that it requires four pounds of this wool to make a pound of cloth, or nearly twice as much as it does of washed American wools. If that be so, then the duty is equal to twelve cents per pound in specie on American wools, or, in currency, about twenty cents per pound. And with two pounds of American wool or four pounds of foreign wool for a pound of cloth it would indicate a specific on cloth of twenty-four cents per pound. To cover this it becomes necessary to place higher duties on woollens, and twenty cents per pound is proposed, with thirty-five per cent. ad valorem for revenue purposes, and to cover internal taxation on American manufactures when sold. This is payable in specie. Twenty-four cents per pound is not proposed for the reason that it is not supposed all foreign wools will shrink so much as to require more than three and a quarter to three and a half pounds for a pound of cloth. I may be mistaken, and if so, then the duty per pound should be twenty-four cents, or the duty on wool should be reduced one cent per pound.

It must be remembered that we tax American manufacturers five per cent. on their sales. If prices advance the Government get so much the more. For instance, a carpet that sold for $1 50 per yard in 1861 now sells for $2 50, and of course pays a tax of twelve and a half cents per yard. Besides this, the duty now proposed on wool and that existing on the linen yarn for the backs of carpets is at least twenty cents more, while carpets have advanced abroad but very little. American manufacturers labor under another disadvantage. While they use the same machines, the same dyes, and work with equal skill, some purchasers give an insane preference for foreign goods to the extent often of ten or fifteen per cent. In 1862 there were imported 559,928 yards of carpeting, and probably more in 1863. Such importations are not likely to cease. As fine or high-priced woolen goods are generally light, it is proposed to add five per cent. more upon goods weighing less than ten ounces to the square yard and upon those costing over two dollars per square yard. This is needed for protection, and it is also needed in order that we may tax fine goods more than we do coarse. The protection now afforded to wool will increase its price, but it may be only for a short time. The main purpose is revenue, but its result will be protection. Protection was never defended on any other ground than that in the end the consumer obtained his supplies more cheaply. The inevitable effect must be to stimulate production, and as wool can be grown in every State of the Union, it will be increased most where it can be raised cheapest. It may be raised in western States (and especially in California, where the sheep breed twice a year) for one half what it costs in Vermont, New York, or Ohio; and such States as the latter will in the end abandon the business, or cling to it only as Virginia clings to slavery, in order to supply stock for richer soils. If these rates continue but a few years the production of wool ought to exceed the consumption of the country, and then it will again come into competition with the wools from abroad.

I know sound policy dictates that for proper encouragement of manufacturers all raw materials should be free, and where nations manufacture for exportation no other policy can be maintained. This accounts for the course of France and England upon this subject. They export largely, we do not. Many excellent legislators and even wool-growers (as the late consul Jarvis of Vermont) have argued that the only way to protect wool was by encouraging American manufacturers. But until we reach the point of supply for our own country, I do not see why encouragement may not be given to the wool-grower as well as to the manufacturer.

The tariff of 1861 upon cotton goods was based upon the idea, then true, that fine, light goods cost more than coarse and heavy. But now the high price of cotton makes coarse and heavy goods often the dearest. Then a duty of one cent was placed upon ordinary cotton-sheetings though none could be imported, and they were worth from eight to ten cents per yard. Now they sell at forty-five cents per yard and we place a tax upon them of five per cent. ad valorem, or two cents and two mills per yard, and it must be noted the raw cotton is also taxed two cents per pound, which makes nearly one cent more per yard. Self-preservation, therefore, requires very much higher rates in the tariff on all cotton goods.

We imported last year forty-nine million yards of worsted or stuff goods upon which only a small amount of revenue was derived. In order to secure a more liberal and certain amount on such of these as are dress goods, which most of them are, a small square-yard duty has been proposed in addition to an ad valorem.

Drugs and preparations composed in part of alcohol, as far as the Committee of Ways and Means have been able to obtain accurate information, have been raised to meet the increased cost of alcohol. If Congress were to allow experts to be summoned here to give sworn testimony on subjects like this and many other subjects requiring special knowledge, according to the practice of the British Parliament, not leaving it all to self-constituted experts, who come at their own expense, it would be a great improvement upon the present laborious and not entirely satisfactory mode by which information percolates through committees to this House upon such subjects as the tariff.

In adjusting the tariff upon iron the principle has been to give an increase upon the tariff of 1861 equal to the internal duties. In some special descriptions the figures go slightly beyond this point, as in the case of thin hoop and band iron, and also in the very small or very large sizes of iron, because, in the first place, the revenue will not be diminished, and in the second place it more justly applies a duty according to the value or labor represented. The duty on locomotive tire and cables is also advanced for the reason that it requires the highest quality of metal for such articles, and the quantity produced here of either is limited. The difficulty of obtaining workmen, even with advanced wages, and time reduced, has largely increased the cost of iron, but this prevents any great addition to the home competition from the opening of new mines, furnaces, or forges, or from increasing the force at present employed in the old, even though it is conceded the business has been unprecedentedly prosperous. With the enormous demand of the Government for iron, and with some protection against the influx of unlimited importations, the trade could not be otherwise than prosperous. We shall not now import as much iron under the present bill, but we shall, I think, get a little more revenue.

With all the facilities for its manufacture it is strange that until recently we never made much headway in the manufacture of steel. Since the tariff of 1861, when for the first time it obtained a little more than one half of the duties levied on iron, its progress has been satisfactory, and the American product has at least been doubled. It may be anticipated that at no remote period such skill will be developed as will supply at least our own market and perhaps something over with steel unsurpassed in quality or cheapness. It will be seen that the new duty on this article, being made from iron already once taxed, should be made to cover the new internal duties both on iron and steel. This has been proposed and not ungrudgingly, though the whole duty is less than upon most other manufactured articles, but properly so, as it is in some sense a raw material or used extensively in the manufacture of many other articles.

The committee have not recommended any change in the duties on salt for the reason that present cost and prices have been very largely increased the past year, and they have felt unwilling to advance the tax further upon an article of such prime necessity. The duties upon the foreign article, in bulk, are eighteen cents per hundred pounds, or twenty-four cents in bags. This is a very large per cent. on the foreign cost, as it is purchased by the ton at a price not exceeding what we sometimes pay here for a barrel. But American made salt is much the purest.

The importers protest against any further advance, and say that American salt is now driving all other salt out of the market. In 1857 we imported 17,165,704 bushels, and there has been no other year when we have imported so much. The imports for the year 1863 were 10,700,189 bushels. The salt boilers in some parts of the country represent, and I think truly, that their coal now costs six cents per bushel instead of three, that labor costs $1 50 per day instead of $1, that barrels cost forty cents instead of twenty cents, and that their profits, always moderate, are now, after being taxed, so reduced that they must close up their establishments unless the tariff is slightly increased. For such an article we really ought not to be dependent on foreign nations, especially should a foreign war ever arise. The annual production of the country in 1860 was 12,190,253 bushels, and may be now about as follows:

	Bushels.
New York.....	8,000,000
Michigan, Illinois, and other western States....	1,500,000
Pennsylvania.....	1,000,000
Ohio.....	2,000,000
	12,500,000

This leaves out Virginia, where two million bushels were formerly made annually. This may be a liberal estimate for all but New York; but the amount will not vary much from this. On the whole, as we have increased the internal duty on salt to six cents per hundred pounds, though the duty placed upon foreign salt was raised that amount last year, the present status might not be much changed if the House should conclude to add to the duties on foreign importations two cents per one hundred pounds.

The duties proposed on silks are largely increased. Notwithstanding we manufacture several millions of these goods, (sewing silks, ribbons, and trimmings,) we imported thirteen millions last year; and it will be conceded that those who now consume silks and velvets can readily afford to pay the increased duties.

There is nothing else in the bill which may not be explained in the five minutes' debate. I estimate that the present bill will increase the revenue not less than fifteen millions, and possibly more.

The Committee of Ways and Means, in proposing the present bill, have not seen fit to recommend extravagant or prohibitory duties, for the most cogent reasons. The Government seeks revenue, and such duties would defeat that object. With the home taxation, now unavoidable, we are forced to levy far higher duties than usual in order that the industry of the country may not languish, and that we may largely and properly stimulate the productive energies of the nation to create that wealth of which we daily use and destroy so much. But to go beyond this point for the mere benefit of those with large stocks on hand, or to create higher prices where prices are already high enough, would be attended with great danger, as we should advance prices upon the consumer so much as to create discontent among the people, and with no benefit to the Treasury. Absolute prohibition would be better than a policy which continued a tariff upon foreign importations, but at so high a point as to relieve manufacturers from all check and all competition. When the profits of any business are suddenly increased, new and inexperienced men rush in, and in a short period create the severest competition which trade and manufactures ever have to encounter. At this time it would not be wise to encourage more men to adventure upon new enterprises than the country will be able to sustain at the close of the war, as whenever that comes, as come it must, a crisis will be upon us for which prudent men should set their houses in order.

It is not expected that any tariff law can be made perfect; but there are not probably more imperfections in the present bill than are incident to all such measures; and these may be removed in its progress through the House. This is intended as a war measure, a temporary measure, and we must as such give it our support.

I believe the country as a whole will approve of the moderate course we have here proposed. So far as the bill goes, or the articles therein embraced are concerned, the bill is an entirety and complete in itself; and all other articles not embraced will, after the 1st of July next, be subject to the same duties which were in force prior to the passage of the late joint resolution increasing the duties fifty per cent.

Whatever there is wrong about the bill I trust the House will correct. But let us pass it speedily. Every day's delay in the passage of this and the internal revenue bill costs the Treasury not less than $500,000. Let me then invoke the earnest and unremitting attention of this House to the only measures, on our part, which can directly sustain the credit of the Government. While some other nations would seize the opportunity to profit by our misfortunes, let us be watchful to do what is right toward all the interests of our country, oppressing none, and preferring them now and forever to all others.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the honorable gentleman [Mr. MORRILL] who reported this bill has just assured us that it is only a war measure of temporary duration. Feeling the necessity of apologizing for the bill, which is an aggravation of the tariff of 1862, the gentleman terms it a war measure. If it were not that we are already immersed in a war whose excitements are so absorbing that no time is left for reflection upon other subjects of policy, this tariff might well be called a war measure. Its oppressive character is enormous enough to produce revolution.

On the 25th of February, 1861, I came to this House from a sick-bed to protest against the tariff bill then pending. I denounced it as a great fiscal tyranny, a mountainous burden on the West. While favoring a revenue tariff to meet our then small expenditures, I opposed bounties, special advantages, and class legislation. I showed that the bill as then designed raised bounties from the consumers of the West and South, to be paid to the iron-masters of Pennsylvania and the manufacturers of New England. That bill was urged as a measure of protection, protection to western interests. I then said "that the West could take care of itself. It is rich by nature in its resources; and if the people of Pennsylvania cannot live by working their forges, with their own natural resources; and if the people of New England cannot live by working their spindles, with their native ingenuity, without the aid of other classes of industry and the bounty of the Government, let them move to the West, and there the God of nature will protect them in the cultivation of the soil if they have the industry to work and the frugality to save."

Since then, sir, that tariff so burdensome has been enormously increased. Our debt, then so small, being only $67,281,591, with an interest of only about four millions, was, on the 15th day of March, 1864, $1,580,201,744. On that day we had a paper currency, including certificates of indebtedness, amounting to $779,683,922. Since then these sums have been increased. Figures fail to express the magnitude of our burdens and liabilities. Nor do I intend to complain of them now. The war has brought them. Neither will I discuss now who are responsible for either the war or its incidents. I accept the existing facts. Having voted against the high tariffs, the paper system, and the whole scheme of finance in all its stages, I am not in anywise responsible for their existence. We are spending $3,000,000 a day; $1,000,000,000 a year. Irrespective of loans, we are striving to meet this enormous outlay by the tax bill, which is to raise $200,000,000 per year, and the tariff, which will meet perhaps $50,000,000 more.

I do not oppose the raising of these sums. The credit of the Government demands it. I accept events, but I do not accept every plan to raise these sums, nor any plan because proposed by the dominant party or its committees in this House. We have no business here as Representatives if we do not question every plan, especially if it affects unfairly our own State or constituents. I am not a Representative, but a slave, if I yield to the clamor of one section or class for benefits which affect unjustly another section or class. I do not represent the rich, they can take care of themselves; nor the poor altogether; but a principle which requires that taxation shall fall equally on all; that the benefits of legislation shall not inure to one class, and its burdens be laid upon another. I propose to prove that this is the effect of the existing and proposed legislation.

By the joint resolution passed a few weeks ago, we increased the tariff rates of 1862 fifty per cent. The present bill, while repealing that resolution after the 1st of July, does not lessen but increases largely the same rates. It adds to them, on most articles, the amount of the internal tax. The duties are paid in gold. This adds the premium of gold to the tariff rates. So that in considering the effect of these measures I must consider them as affected by the paper money which has been showered upon the country with such prodigality.

What, then, are the benefits accruing to the manufacturing classes, and the burdens imposed upon the agricultural and consuming classes, by the present tariff system and a depreciated paper currency? What, particularly, are their operations upon the industrial interests of New England and the western States as contrasted?

Before resorting to an arithmetical demonstration to show the effects of the tariff and "greenback" systems combined, I propose a few self-evident propositions as the basis of my calculations.

1. In the commercial transactions between two foreign countries, in fact all countries, the basis of exchange must be specie, and the currency of the countries must be reduced to their par values.

At present the gold currency of the United States contains more alloy than that of Great Britain, the difference in their values being about nine cents on a dollar; eight and three quarters according to Tate's Cambist. This rate varies in actual commercial transactions according to the demand and supply of exchange. Therefore, in order to equalize the gold currencies of the two countries, it is necessary to add eight and three quarters per cent. to each American dollar. This will make it equal in value to a dollar of the same weight in the gold currency of England. In other words, the merchant in New York who would pay $1 to the merchant in Liverpool must send him $1.083 of our gold. The exchange on England generally ranges above this rate. It depends upon demand and supply, and the freight and risk of transporting specie.

2. If the currency of one country is a depreciated paper currency, and of the other specie, the rate of exchange is according to the depreciation of the paper currency of one country and the gold or standard specie currency of the other. For example, the United States paper currency as compared with United States gold, the latter being, to say the least, at a premium of sixty per cent., taking the average of the past year, is depreciated thirty-seven and a half per cent. That is, it takes $1.60 of the United States paper to buy $1 of United States gold; that is to say, $1 in United States paper is worth only sixty-two and a half cents in United States gold.

Now, in order to pay $1 in Liverpool in United States paper at the above rate of depreciation, namely, in the ratio of $1.60 for $1, it would require $1.74. To the demonstration:

$1.083 of American gold is equal to $1 of English gold.
60 rate of depreciation of American paper as compared with American gold.

63 25
108 75
$174 00

Therefore the rate of exchange between the paper currency of the United States and the gold currency of England is seventy-four per cent. In other words, it takes $174 of United States depreciated paper in New York to pay $100 in Liverpool.

And this result corresponds with the actual market prices of gold and exchange. I see in the stock market of Boston, as reported in the Boston Courier on February 29, 1864, that gold was quoted at $1.58½ to $1.59, and exchange on England, sixty days to run, at 73 and 74.

Mr. PRUYN. Exchange is more than that now. It is a dollar.

Mr. COX. Of course, if gold is at ninety, as it is now, the price of exchange rises in the ratio of its increase. Therefore, in order to buy $100 worth of gold in England the American merchant must pay $174 in the depreciated paper currency of the United States when gold is quoted only at $1.60.

When he brings that $100 worth of goods to this country, in order to reimburse himself he must sell it for $174 of our currency with freight and duty superadded.

The Government requires that these duties shall be paid in gold. The importing merchant, therefore, must purchase the gold with depreciated paper, paying for it the market premium.

For instance, if the duty on the merchandise is 40 per cent. ad valorem, or $40 on each $100 of value imported, he must add 60 per cent. to the $40, which is equal to $24. That sum added to the $40 is equal to $64. Thus, in order to pay a specie duty of 40 per cent. on $100 of merchandise, the merchant must pay in paper, depreciated with ratio of $160 to $100, a duty of $64, or 64 per cent. To which is to be added the increased duty of 50 per cent. on the former rates, under the recent joint resolution, which would add $20 more to the cost; but as that, too, has to be paid in gold and the gold purchased, there would be $12 more to be added, making $32.

Now, let me demonstrate what it will cost in United States paper, depreciated only in the ratio of $160 to $100, to import merchandise costing $100 in England:

First cost.....	$100
Difference of exchange.....	74
Duty of 40 per cent., exchanged to paper.....	64
Fifty per cent. additional duty recently put on, exchanged to paper.....	32

Actual cost, exclusive of freight and other charges .	270
Deduct first cost.....	100

Leaving additional cost in consequence of exchange, duties, and paper money.....	$170
----------------------------------------------------------------------------------	-------

Thus the consumers, in consequence of the depreciation of paper money and the duties payable in gold, have to pay $270; or 170 per cent. in addition to the cost for every $100 worth of goods imported from England into this country. To this is to be added the freight and charges, and at least 10 per cent. profits to the importer.

4. The elements of cost, therefore, upon merchandise imported from foreign countries into the United States, are: 1, the first cost abroad; 2, difference of exchange; 3, duty; 4, freight, insurance, and other charges of importation; and, 5, the importer's profits on all the preceding items, which we reckon at 10 per cent.

5. At this point of cost the imported article comes in competition with the corresponding article of the home manufacturer in the American market. And the aggregate of the items above mentioned constitute the protection or bounty which the tariff system gives to the manufacturer. The consumers of the domestic article, of course, pay this bounty to the manufacturer. This is now reduced to an axiom in political economy. It is as clear as the proposition that the object of a tariff for protection is to increase the price of the article. If this were not the case who would care for protective bounties? Not the manufacturer, certainly. If not he, who then?

6. Thus the system taxes the labor and capital employed in one class of industrial interests for the benefit of the labor and capital employed in another class of industrial interests.

BOUNTIES ON IRON.

In order to demonstrate by facts and figures the truth of the foregoing propositions I propose to take three descriptions of iron, namely: pig, railroad, and bar, showing the quantities imported, the cost in England, and the cost in this country in depreciated paper, with duties, freight, and importer's profits superadded. I omit insurance and other minor charges of importation. I take the importations of 1861 as the basis of my calculations, because I have not at hand the importations of later years. The principles upon which the demonstrations are made apply to the importation of all years. My calculations are also based upon gold at the rate of $160 in the depreciated paper currency of the United States. The rates of duty are those of the tariff of 1862, without adding thereto the 50 per cent. on those rates of the recent law, and without adding the increase proposed by the present bill. I take these different kinds of iron because the specific duty required to be paid upon each of them can easily be reduced to the ad valorem standard. Also, for the purpose of economizing in figures, I will call the rate of exchange between England and this country 70 per cent. instead of 74, which will be more favorable to the manufacturer.

Pig iron.—Quantity imported in 1861, 39,538½ tons, cost $14 per ton; duty $6 per ton, or 43 per cent. ad valorem, equal to 68 per cent. in paper money.

Cost in England.....	$542,952
Difference of exchange at 70 per cent.....	380,066
Duty 43 per cent. in gold, 68 per cent. in paper.....	369,207
Freight at $6 per ton.....	236,231
Importer's profit 10 per cent. on first cost, exchange, duty, and freight.....	156,845
	$1,685,301

Thus, when this quantity of iron, with its original cost, difference of exchange, freight, and duties paid, is offered in the market of the United States it costs $1,685,301. At that point it comes in competition with the product of the home manufacturer; consequently his protection, or bounty, is the difference between the first cost and the cost when the foreign iron enters into competition with him in the home market.

Let us see what that protection or bounty is:

From cost in our market.....	$1,685,301
Deduct first cost in England.....	542,952

Leaving a bounty on same quantity to the home manufacturer of.....$1,142,349 or 210 per cent.

Same calculation on a specie basis:

Duty, 42 per cent. gold; 67 per cent. paper.....	2,248,721
Freight at $6 per ton.....	503,904
Importer's profits on first cost, difference of exchange, duty, and freight, at 10 per cent.....	845,833
	$9,303,858

At this point of its cost it comes in competition with the article of the home manufacturer.

From cost in our market.....	$9,303,858
Deduct first cost in England.....	3,356,300
	$5,947,558

or 170 per cent.

Same calculation on a specie basis:

Difference of exchange at 9 per cent.....	302,067
Duty at 42 per cent.....	1,409,646
Freight at $6 per ton.....	503,904
Importer's profits at 10 per cent.....	557,191
	$6,129,108

At this point of its cost it comes into competition with the product of the home manufacturer.

From its cost in our market.....	$6,129,108
Deduct cost abroad.....	3,356,300
	$2,772,808

Leaving a bounty to home manufacture, of... $2,772,808 or 80 per cent.

Thus under the present system of depreciated paper money and the existing tariff it costs the people of the United States:

To pay for $542,952 of pig iron.....	$1,685,301
To pay for 1,858,979 of railroad iron.....	5,385,773

After all expenses of importation are added, the cost in the wholesale market of the different kinds of iron would be as follows: Pig iron, 39,538 tons, $1,685,301; equal to $46 17 per ton. Railroad iron, 63,140 tons, $5,385,773; equal to $55 85 per ton. Bar iron, 83,984 tons, $9,303,858; equal to $110 78 per ton.

Below I give the quotations in the Boston wholesale market, reported in the Boston Courier of March 7, 1864. In that paper of the same date gold is quoted at 158½ to 169; exchange on England, sixty days, 73 to 74:

"English common, $110 to $115; English refined, $120 to $125; English sheet, 7 to 8½ cents; Russia sheet, 21½ to 25 cents; Jarlsberg, $50 to $52; No. 1, other brands, $50 to $52; American No. 1, $48 to $50."

Thus showing that my calculations are correct.

Whole quantity of pig iron produced in the United States in 1860 is 884,474 tons. Value of 884,474 tons of pig iron at $14 per ton, the cost in England is $12,382,636.

Value of the same in our market, at $46 17 per ton, is.....	$40,735,164
Deduct cost in England.....	12,382,636

Leaving..... $28,352,528 bounty to the home manufacturer, in consequence of the difference of exchange and duty, freight, and importer's profits, or more than 200 per cent.

Recapitulation

			26,489,302
			$48,094,548

Thus the cost of importation, namely, the first cost in England, difference of exchange, freight, and duties, reduced to the paper standard, and profits of importers, enables the home manufacturer to realize $48,094,548 on a manufacture of $26,489,302, or 180 per cent.!

In these calculations I have embraced only three descriptions of iron. The importation of iron in all forms amounts to millions in value more, which comes in competition with the home manufacture of similar description of articles. Thus my calculation fails to give all the enormous profits realized by the home manufacturer on the article of iron.

In order to pay those exorbitant profits to the iron manufacturers, labor and capital employed in other pursuits of industry must necessarily be taxed in corresponding proportion.

"But we must have revenues. The war must not suffer for the want of money," says some one with more zeal than reflection. Now, will some adept in figures please inform me what proportion of this immense sum of $48,094,548 realized by the home manufacturer on iron goes into the Treasury to support the war and pay the expenses of the Government? The whole revenue of the tariff on all articles is not much greater. The truth is, the revenue is not only lessened, the Treasury defrauded, and the people deluded by this clamor for bounties, but, by oppressive and unjust discrimination, one class waxes fat and rich out of the labor and means of another.

If, then, this amount does not go for revenue, but is for most part a bounty paid to the manufacturer by every consumer of iron in all its manifold shapes and uses, how can an increase of the duties on iron as proposed by the bill now before the House, be justified? On pig iron alone the duty is increased by this bill from six to nine dollars per ton; on railroad iron nearly in the same ratio, and on bar iron much more; and still the iron masters clamor for more. Does their clamor proceed on the principle laid down by Dr. Wayland—Political Economy, page 147—that "when once a duty is imposed for the protection of a particular branch of manufactures it is not long before home competition begins, ruin threatens, and a larger protective duty is demanded?" Or is it because these iron cormorants, having tasted the sweets of inordinate gain, place no limit upon their insane greed? If I should fix the price of gold at 190 instead of 160, if I should add the recent 50 per cent. increase of the tariff to this protective bounty, or the increase proposed by the present bill, I would be justified in fixing the average tax which the consumer pays to the manufacturer at over 200 per cent. on all kinds of iron! Nor would our people then wonder that whereas they once bought all articles into which iron enter at small prices, these articles are now enormously enhanced in price. Of course such articles as are increased in price by the increased value of the labor put on them, and into which little iron and more labor enters as an element of cost, are double their old prices. A hatchet which before the tariff of 1862 and the paper money system, cost twenty-five cents, now costs double. So with plows. A hoe that formerly cost but thirty-seven and a half cents, now costs over a dollar. Articles into which less labor and more iron enters are greater still in the ratio of increase. A keg of nails which in 1860 cost but $2 10, now brings over $7! Every article of iron from a bodkin to a boiler, from an anvil to an engine, from a buckle to a buggy spring, from a hammer to a harrow-tooth, from a wood screw to a woman's hoop, from a steel shirt collar to an iron steamship, all pay their tribute to the iron-makers of the United States, and particularly of Pennsylvania, who, as the annexed table will show, manufacture nearly three fourths of the iron of the United States:

I now pursue a similar system of demonstration with regard to other leading manufactures of the country, beginning with the

COTTON MANUFACTURES.

The duties imposed upon cotton manufactures by the tariff of 1862 are so involved and intricate that it is impossible to reduce them precisely to the ad valorem standard without the aid of the amount of duties actually received upon the amount of goods imported. That amount can be ascertained only from the Treasury Department of the United States.

The duties on cotton goods seem to have been expressly devised to deceive and mislead the consumer, while giving a most exorbitant bounty to the home manufacturer.

For instance, on certain classes of goods, specific duties, varying from one and three quarter cents to five and a half cents, according to the number of threads in the square inch, per yard, are imposed; and on other classes, namely, colored prints, specific duties, varying from two and three quarters to five and one half cents, and an additional duty of ten per cent. ad valorem per yard are imposed.

This complicated system of levying duties defies the intelligence of any man to unravel who is not engaged in the trade, or has not access to the custom-house returns at Washington. The present bill does not simplify but complicates still more this pernicious system of duties.

Its obvious purpose is to deceive the consumer, and to give an unreasonable protection or bounty to the home manufacturer; to tax and impoverish the consumers, and to build up an aristocracy of manufacturers, residing mostly in Massachusetts and the other New England States.

But one fact it cannot hide from plain people: that whereas three years ago our farmers' wives bought a yard of calico for ten or twelve cents, the same costs now from twenty-five to twenty-eight cents.

Mr. MALLORY. More than that. Forty cents at least.

Mr. COX. Well; this I know, that whereas a yard of muslin, three years ago, cost ten cents, it now costs forty-five cents. What could be once bought with two and one third days' labor, now requires nearly four. Coffee, sugar, tea, and all the necessities of life have not only been enhanced in their nominal price by the paper money standard, but really enhanced by the tariff also. But these taxes are patent to all. It being impossible to ascertain the precise duty imposed on cotton goods reduced to the ad valorem standard, it therefore can only be approximated. It probably ranges from 40 to 60 per cent. But to make a calculation on a basis most favorable to the manufacturer, I assume that the duties on cotton goods when reduced to the ad valorem standard would be 35 per cent., the ordinary ad valorem duty, when that form of duty is used, under the tariff of 1862 and the bill before the House. Upon this basis the following calculations are made:

Amount of cotton goods imported in 1861, $24,647,648; duty, according to the ad valorem standard, 35 per cent. payable in gold, equal to 56 per cent. in the paper currency of the United States:

Cost in countries whence imported.....	$24,647,648
Difference of exchange at 70 per cent.....	17,253,353
Duty at 56 per cent.....	13,802,672
Importer's profits at 10 per cent.....	5,570,369
	$61,274,042

At this point of their cost, the imported cotton goods come in competition with the products of the home manufacturer in our market.

From cost in our market.....	$61,274,042
Deduct first cost abroad.....	24,647,648

Leaving a bounty on same amount of goods, viz, $24,647,648, to the home manufacturer of $36,626,394 or 148 per cent.

In order to show the enormous gains which the home manufacturer of cotton goods makes in consequence of our depreciated paper currency, and which, of course, come out of the pockets of the consumers, I estimate upon the same data the profits he would make if the currency were gold, of the American standard of value:

Cotton goods, first cost abroad.....	$24,647,648
Difference of exchange at 9 per cent.....	2,218,283
Duty, 35 per cent.....	8,626,676
Importer's profits at 10 per cent. on cost, difference of exchange, and duty.....	3,549,260
	$39,041,867

At this point they come in competition in our market with the home manufacturer.

From cost in our market.....	$39,041,867
Deduct first cost abroad.....	24,647,648

Leaving a bounty on same amount as imported to the home manufacturer of.....$14,394,219 or 58 per cent.

Thus it will be seen that the home manufacturer, operating under a specie currency of the American standard of value, with a duty paid to the Government of 35 per cent. ad valorem, in consequence of the difference of exchange, duty, and importer's profits, actually realizes a protection, or bounty, equal to 58 per cent.

And in the demonstrations above made no estimate is made of freight, insurance, and other charges, which would increase the bounty which the people pay to the manufacturer. Neither have I added the fifty per cent. additional to the former rates of the recent law. Nor have I added the increase proposed by this measure.

WOOLEN MANUFACTURES.

As in the case of cotton goods, it is impossible, without the actual amount of duties received, to estimate the precise duty imposed upon woolen goods by the tariff of 1862 reduced to the ad valorem standard. The duties on woollens are a mixture of specific and ad valorem, well devised to hoodwink and deceive the uninitiated.

On some classes of woolen goods a specific duty of eighteen cents per pound and an ad valorem duty of 30 per cent. are imposed, and on other classes a specific duty only, and on some trifling articles an ad valorem duty simply. In order to do more than justice to the home manufacturer, indeed to be liberal with him, I assume the duty to be 35 per cent. ad valorem on all importations of woolen goods, which will be found to be less than the duty actually laid upon this class of manufacturers by the tariff of 1862, and far less than that proposed by the present bill.

Amount of woolen goods imported in 1861, $27,750,371. Duty, according to the ad valorem standard, and payable in gold, 35 per cent., equal to 56 per cent. in the paper currency of the United States.

with the goods of the home manufacturer in our market.

MANUFACTURE OF PAPER.

Under the tariff of 1862 paper of all kinds pays a duty of 35 per cent. ad valorem upon a specie basis. In the greenback currency it is equal to 56 per cent.

Amount imported in 1861.....	$509,542

MANUFACTURE OF LEATHER, (TANNED.)

The duty on tanned leather imposed by the tariff of 1862 is 30 per cent. ad valorem, specie standard; 43 per cent. paper standard.

Amount of leather imported in 1861.....	$2,437,592

At this point it comes in competition with the home manufacture in the American market.

From its cost in our market.....	$5,845,785
Deduct its first cost abroad.....	2,437,592

Leaving a bounty to the home manufacturer of $3,408,193 or 140 per cent.

Same demonstration on a specie basis:

Amount of leather imported in 1861.....	$2,437,592
Difference of exchange at 9 per cent.....	219,583
Duty at 30 per cent.....	731,277

	$3,727,077

At this point the foreign article comes in competition with the domestic article.

From its cost in our market.....	$3,727,077
Deduct its first cost abroad.....	2,437,592

or 53 per cent.

MANUFACTURED CLOTHING.

The duty imposed by the tariff of 1862 upon manufactured clothing is 35 per cent. ad valorem, or 56 per cent. in the "greenback" currency of the United States.

Amount imported in 1861.....	$1,401,057
Difference of exchange at 70 per cent.....	980,339
Duty at 56 per cent.....	784,591
Importer's profits at 10 per cent.....	316,604
	$3,482,651

Another fact is to be remarked in connection with the statement above. The importation was a quantity of seeds for the benefit of the farmer and gardener. They are taxed a duty of 30 per cent. ad valorem, payable in gold. In a table which I will hereafter insert, the House will see that all raw materials, dye stuffs, &c., used in manufacturing, are taxed with very low duties, and some are admitted duty free, rags, for instance, and some 71,000,000 pounds of wool nearly free. This is justified by the speech just made by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL.] Thus the tariff of 1862 discriminates in almost every particular in favor of the manufacturer and against the farmer.

How long will the class which I represent—the agricultural portion of the community, the class which possesses in the aggregate three fourths of the capital of the country, who produce the greatest share of its annual income, and who pay the greatest portion of its taxes—submit to be despoiled for the benefit of the manufacturing classes under the specious pretext that it is done to stimulate the industry of others, is necessary for revenue to put down the rebellion and save the Union?

RECAPITULATION.

I now propose to show the results of the preceding calculations in the condensed form of tables.

Table I,

Showing the cost of sundry articles imported from abroad at the place of importation; the cost in our market at the point of competition with the home manufacturer, including original cost; difference of exchange; freight, on iron only; duties, and importer's profits, and bounties on the same amount of goods to the home manufacturer in dollars and rates per cent., reckoned upon the basis of the standard gold currency of the United States:

These articles are selected because they come in competition with the largest classes of American manufactures. This and the following tables are constructed upon the basis of the importations of 1861, the census returns of 1860, and the rates of duty imposed by the tariff of 1862, reduced as nearly as they may be to the ad valorem standard. I have not included the fifty per cent. additional upon previous rates imposed by the recent joint resolution; nor the additional tariff of the present bill.

	180 per cent.

Estimated according to the standard gold currency of the United States on an aggregate value of $497,729,900 of manufactured goods of the description stated in the foregoing tables, the home manufacturers, by reason of the difference in exchange, duties, and other expenses of importation of foreign articles of the same kind, together with the importer's profits, derive, through the agency of the system of protection established by the tariff of 1862, an aggregate bounty of $302,753,342.

The tariff and the other expenses of importation enable the home manufacturers to charge and levy upon the people of the United States that enormous sum every year in gold; supposing the manufactures of the country to be the same in amount as in 1860, and the tariff the same as that of 1862.

If the rates are more, as this bill proposes to make them more, the sum would be greater; if less, it would be less accordingly.

The population of the United States in 1860 was 31,445,080 souls. Consequently the proportion per head of this enormous bounty exacted by the manufacturers in gold is $9 62.

Estimated upon the basis of the irredeemable paper currency of the United States, depreciated only in the ratio of $160 in paper to $100 in gold, the aggregate bounty levied by the home manufacturers on the people of the United States on the same amount of domestic manufactures, namely, $497,729,900, is $750,250,252, or $23 88 per head.

When, therefore, I propose to amend this bill so as to have these duties payable in the paper currency like other public dues, I intend, with full knowledge of its effect, to strike off at least $14 26 per head from the burdens which labor pays from its hard earnings to protect and pamper the "splendid paupers" who are thus living upon the bounty of others. I intend to save from the grasp of the millionaire and manufacturer and for the benefit of the poor man and consumer, the sum of $447,496,910 on the rates of the tariff of 1862. If the people must pay bounty to the capitalist, is it not enough to pay it in the ordinary paper currency by which we are measuring other values? Is it not enough to pay a bounty in paper equal to the sum of $302,753,342 now levied in gold upon the articles enumerated? Think of it! For the iron which we use in all its varieties of adaptation; for the cotton we wear, whether printed or plain, in the calico dress or the shirting; for the wool in blanket, carpet, or clothing; for the newspaper, book, and pamphlet; for the leather we use when tanned or manufactured into boots and shoes; for the clothing we buy already made up; for the soap and candles and India-rubber goods; for these only, under our tariff of 1862, and not counting our recent increase or the proposed increase of this bill, we pay as gratuity to one class of persons the enormous sum of $750,250,252.

Will any one pretend that all this is for revenue? What! when the tariff does not raise one tenth of that sum on all articles of importation! What, then, is this $750,250,252 paid for? Not for war, not for debts, not for expenses. Is it possible that we have to pay on some ten articles only, in paper money, $750,000,000 to get less than $50,000,000 of revenue from them? Mr. Hays, comptroller of Chicago, with keen analysis once showed that, by the tariff acts of 1846 and 1857, the people paid the startling sum of $338,000,000 to afford the Federal Government a revenue of $54,000,000; and he prophesied that by the tariff of 1862 the loss to the community would be still greater. How much greater is apparent from my calculations on the depreciated paper system and the increased duties of 1862!

"What, then, do you propose? To abolish all tariffs?" Yes, God save the people from these indirect and insidious robberies! In their name let such tariffs be abolished. Since you have begun on internal taxation, let all our revenues be thus levied. If you abolish the tariff of 1862, then, to pay the other taxes, you give to the people an increased ability to the amount of $750,250,252 on the few articles alone which I enumerated; and how much more on all manufactured articles! Abolish your tariffs, and if your direct taxes are unfair they are not unfair, and can be speedily corrected. Abolish your tariffs, and let every interest stand undisguised before the law; the farmer the equal of the manufacturer; the laboring man the equal of the millionaire. "No mask of industry over the features of capital; no unjust discriminations; no despoiling one class of labor under the pretense of stimulating another; no unhealthy drugging of any one business by the robbery of another."

But instead of mitigating you propose to aggravate these oppressions. By your joint resolution the other day you have added to these onerous rates of 1862 fifty per cent. more. If this is not to be continued after the 1st of July, we are at least to pay a large increase by the present bill. We are expected, we of the West, to pay our share of it—as I shall show, the larger share—without murmur; because the war, instigated by the section which reaps most of these gigantic sums from our toil and sweat, demands our support!

Very well. For over two years we have submitted. But if we are to keep on patiently in submission, a few years will see all our resources sucked from us by these vampires of the East. If taxes must be raised for war or for debts, to pay for the peculations of scoundrels or for the patriotic service of soldiers, let them be levied directly, fairly, justly, that all may feel their operations, and the burdens, sufficiently great for a whole people, may not be borne by a part, and that part which is least able to bear them.

The people are the victims of the joint robbery of a system of bounties under the guise of duties, and of an inconvertible and depreciated paper currency under the guise of money. Is it a cause of wonder that the manufacturers accumulate wealth so rapidly that they grow rich within a year if they were poor before? This system is rapidly building up an aristocracy, composed of manufacturers and gamblers in irredeemable paper money. In the same proportion it is impoverishing the masses of the people. It is rapidly reducing them to the same level of destitution and degradation as that of the people of Europe. Only here it is worse, for here it is in combination with a depreciated paper-money system, which the aristocrats of Europe do not tolerate. This combination is rushing the American people along with headlong speed to inevitable ruin. In the name of the laboring people of my district and State, in behalf of those the results of whose toil is thus torn from their families to pamper wealth and arrogance, I protest against this system of oppression. In behalf of the poor men who work from day to day in shop and field, from whose labor at least all these millions are wrung; in behalf of those who cannot and do not combine to subsidize the press, fee lawyers, importune Congress; who cannot afford to take their little all from their families to pay sharp men for keen devices to "cheat by statute;" in their behalf I do challenge the honesty and justice of these measures.

Mr. Chairman, no man is now so wise and gifted that he can save this nation from bankruptcy. I believe the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] himself expressed his belief in our ultimate ruin.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to correct his remark. I made no prophecy on the subject.

Mr. COX. I am glad to be put right. I so understood him.

No borrowing system can save us. The scheme of making greenbacks a legal tender, which enabled the debtor to cheat his creditor, thereby playing the old game of kingcraft, to debase the currency in order to aid the designs of despotism, may float us for a while amidst the fluctuations and bubbles of the day; but as no one possesses the power to repeal the law of the Almighty, which decrees (and as our Constitution has established) that gold and silver shall be the standard of value in the world, so they will ever thus remain, notwithstanding the legislation of Congress. Congress may make paper the measure of prices but it can never make paper the standard of value. Such a paper system in connection with this tariff will, sooner or later, crush labor in this country. What then? When our laboring masses shall have become sufficiently impoverished by this system will not the transition from a republic to a despotism be easy? Will not that phenomenon of tyranny, the armed soldier accompanying the tax-gatherer, occur here? Does not the question of taxation, therefore, involve the problem of liberty? Does not this system, against which in its every stage I have protested, involve an enormous wickedness against the interests and happiness of mankind?

The present tariff system has been devised for the benefit of the manufacturer, at the expense of the people, and yet it does not really aid the Treasury. If it makes the rich richer and the poor poorer, then by this concentration of wealth in a few the less is the proportion of it which will be paid into the Treasury. Sismondi, page 79, says that all returns show that the great amount of revenue is not paid by the rich, or even by the middle classes, but by the poor and those just above them. He holds that all attempts at taxation on luxuries have failed in productiveness. The state of the revenue depends mainly on the power of the poor to purchase the necessities and comforts of life. Hence any system like this, which aggrandizes wealth in a few, destroys the great resources of revenue upon which we are to depend at last for our credit and our safety.

Again, as many of the duties are prohibitory, no revenue is derived from them, and the Treasury again loses. The duties on paper, boots and shoes, soap and candles, India-rubber fabrics, in fact nearly all the articles named in the foregoing tables, enjoy a monopoly in our market, while in many instances the tariff of 1862 permits certain articles used by the manufacturers to be imported either free or at nominal duties. For instance, rags, free; India rubber, raw, 10 per cent.; lasting for ladies' boots and shoes and for soles, 10 per cent. In 1867, $904,842 worth of paper rags were imported duty free. Those rags went into manufactured paper, and upon that amount of stock, duty free, the paper makers were permitted to charge their enormous profits. And so with regard to other articles admitted with slight duty for the benefit of the manufacturer.

When the manufacturer produces an ample supply of goods for the home market, and has a large surplus for which he is compelled to seek a market abroad, it is just to exempt the raw material which he uses from duty, because he again carries it out of the country in the shape of manufactured goods. In that case, it operates so far as a drawback. Such is the policy of Great Britain. But when the manufacturer has the substantial control of the home market, through the agency of prohibitory duties, there can be no greater iniquity practiced on the people than to permit him to tax his enormous profit upon the very article which the Government admits duty free, or nearly so. Is it not legalized robbery, more detestable in its enormity than the actual crime? Yet the party in power have inaugurated a tariff system which authorizes and sanctions this very iniquity.

The estimates from which I draw these conclusions cannot be precisely accurate. It is not assumed that they are. It is only claimed that they are an approximation to the truth. The most important element of error is the basis of the value of home manufactures in the census tables of 1860, whether the actual cost or the price by wholesale in market. Therefore, in order to state the case in the most favorable form for the home manufacturer, I will assume that upon the basis of the depreciated paper currency of the United States their profits or bounties are at the rate of 100 per cent., or in the aggregate $497,729,900, or $15 83 per head of the population of the United States.

To recapitulate: rate of profit or bounty, reckoned upon the specie standard: $497,729,900, it is $302,753,342 bounty, or $9 62 per head. Paper standard: $497,729,900, it is $750,250,252 bounty, or $23 88 per head. Bounty at rate of 100 per cent.: $497,729,900, it is $497,729,900 bounty, or $15 83 per head.

It will be observed that the first estimate I make upon the present tariff is on a specie basis. On this basis, the taxation, or tribute to the manufacturer, is at the rate of $9 62 per head. My second estimate is made upon the same tariff and a paper money basis depreciated in the ratio of $160 to $100. On this basis the taxation or tribute is $23 88 per head. My third estimate is upon the basis of allowing the manufacturer to pay a tribute of 100 per cent. On this basis the taxation or tribute is $15 83 per head. These estimates are embodied in the three following tables, from which it will appear how the tribute is levied upon the various States:

Thus, it appears from the preceding tables that the tribute which the eleven western States pay to the manufacturers of the country, residing mainly in the eastern States, in consequence of the falsely called protective system and paper money system of this country is as reckoned:

On the specie basis.....$99,582,414, or $9 62 per head.
 " paper basis.....$244,713,728, or 23 88 "
 " basis of 100 per cent.....$169,193,151, or 15 83 "

Whole consumption of the articles of manufacturers named in the preceding tables three and four, including cost and tribute or bounty, is as follows:

On the specie basis.....$25 45 per head.
 " paper ".....39 71 "
 " basis of 100 per cent.....31 66 "

On reflection, every intelligent man will perceive that allowing the manufacturers at the rate of 100 per cent. profit on these various fabrics and goods enumerated in the preceding tables, $31 66 per head is not a large average consumption of the people of the United States. The preceding tables and calculations develop the most astounding results. They show that a tariff system under the pretext of raising revenue for the use of the Government of the United States has, in this period of war when every dollar is needed, been so devised as to give the most extraordinary and unreasonable bounty to the manufacturing classes, in the case of many articles, virtually prohibiting the introduction of the competing article into the country.

PROTECTED AND NON-PROTECTED STATES.

From the facts which we have presented, and the tables showing the leading productions of the western States, it will be perceived that the States of the Union may be divided into two great classes—the protected States and the unprotected States. We speak in regard to their industrial interests.

The manufacturing States, mainly the New England States and Pennsylvania, are the protected States. The agricultural States are the unprotected States.

States that produce a commodity in such abundance as to furnish an ample supply for home consumption and a large surplus for markets abroad can derive no benefit from protective duties.

Our Government might impose a duty on wheat and flour which would be absolutely prohibitory, and it would not increase the prices of those articles in Chicago or New York. Thus the agricultural States derive no protection from the duties imposed by the present tariff on articles produced by agricultural industry. The men who devised the present tariff, knew that a duty on corn, wheat, tobacco, or cotton, was of no possible benefit to the producers of those articles. They were only tugs thrown to the whale, put in the tariff for the purpose of deluding the ignorant and unreflecting with the mere pretense of justice.

Mr. MORRILL. I would like to ask the gentleman if he did not vote here the other day against the termination of the reciprocity treaty, the termination of which would admit all the agricultural products of Canada free of duty, and if it is possible to levy duties upon those agricultural products without a termination of the treaty?

Mr. COX. I do not precisely remember how I did vote upon it, but I know how I ought to have voted. The question got a little complicated. I am for allowing the largest liberty of interchange possible. I never was afraid of buying in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest market I could find. That is my doctrine, which I learned from a distinguished citizen of New England. I have never departed from that doctrine, and therefore I am in favor of the largest reciprocity treaty; believing that the larger it is the better it is for the mass of our people.

Mr. MORRILL. How does the gentleman propose to remedy the matter by having a treaty of perfect reciprocity and a system of tariff duties at the same time?

Mr. COX. I propose to extend it to all other articles as soon as I can reach them, and to abolish all indirect and insidious taxation in the shape of tariffs.

When interrupted I was showing that the tendency of the present tariff system, and in fact of all tariffs, revenue or protective, more or less is to drain wealth from the unprotected States and accumulate it in the protected States.

It can now be understood why New England accumulates wealth so much more rapidly than the western States. I know it is arrogantly said, "New England has more intelligence, thrift, invention, and industry." I need not deny that, and yet I can account for her immense gains on another principle.

The interests of New England, and especially of Massachusetts, are all subjects of protection or bounty directly from the General Government. We have shown how her leading manufacturing interests are protected. Her fishing interests are also encouraged by a direct bounty from the Treasury of the United States; a half million, I believe it is, being yearly paid to the fishermen of Massachusetts as a mere bounty, a gratuity without consideration. We in the West ask and get no bounty for the white fish of our lakes or the cat fish of our rivers.

We refer more particularly to Massachusetts for the reason that to her agency more than to any other is to be attributed the civil war which now devastates our country and threatens the destruction of its civil institutions and of republican liberty. That State has been the unceasing and unprincipled agitator, the fomentor of discord between the sections, the disseminator of fanatical and dogmatical opinion, and the assailant of the constitutional rights of other States; and has thus done more than all other States to bring our present calamities upon us. It is meet, therefore, that we should consider how much she has been benefited by the Union whose very existence she has put to such fearful hazard.

It is proper also, in this connection, to remark that while Massachusetts has been most benefited during the present war by the agency of the combined tariff and paper money system, she has done the least to support the war. Under the various calls for troops up to March 1, 1864, Massachusetts has been reported deficient 20,592 men, a much larger number in proportion to her population than any other State; and in order to fill her quotas, instead of sending her own meddlesome and mischievous citizens into the field, and exposing their precious persons to the hazards of camp and battle, she has ransacked almost every State in the Union, and even Canada and Europe for men, filling her regiments with worthless substitutes and negroes. She is coining money out of the precious blood of the land and the enormous waste of wealth in this terrible war, while she takes care that her own blood shall be preserved. She is the most arrogant and mischievous State, the most selfish and timid in the war which her mischievous propensities have provoked, and she has the least title of any of the States of the Union to the favors of the Government.

Mr. DAWES. It is not only an old story, but it had its origin and was nursed into growth by the men who are now arrayed as rebels against the Union; and my friend from Ohio is but repeating their old and stale charges, ground into impalpable powder by the truth long ago.

Mr. COX. I have heard the gentleman say that once before. I learned my principles not from any one in the South, but from Dr. Wayland, known in New England and throughout the country as a good and great man; and it would not invalidate his doctrines if Davis and Toombs should repeat them from morning till night and from year to year. It would not prove the truth or falsity of his principles. If Jefferson Davis should tell the gentleman that two and two make four, he would deny it. When Davis says that two and two make five, I deny it. Because a man now in rebellion, when once here stated the truths and facts in economy, which I believe, while I disbelieve in secession, it does not militate against these economic truths that he believes in secession. It is not relevant to the argument for the gentleman to bring the heresies of secession here to disprove the injustice of the protective system on tariffs. I know many abolitionists—among them Wendell Phillips—who are free-trade men. Does it follow therefore that Wendell Phillips is a disunionist? I know he is a disunionist; but for another reason, and not for that.

Mr. DAWES. I am not troubling the gentleman with the inquiry as to where he learned his principles. That is a thing I have not the least concern about. What I said was that his charges against New England were an old story, first taught by the men who plotted and are now carrying on the rebellion, and the gentleman is but repeating them here. Where he got his principles will be a matter of the least concern to us of New England, who have no disposition to follow them out or adopt them. The charges which he brings against New England to-day can be found, in hæc verba, in the speeches of southern nullifiers from John Calhoun clear down to the last of them who took his leave of us in this House in the Congress before the present.

Mr. COX. That will do.

Mr. DAWES. That is all I want.

Mr. COX. Because John C. Calhoun and those men disfavored the idea of bounties to manufacturers, and also favored that of secession, therefore his opposition to bounties is a fallacy like secession! According to that reasoning, Adam Smith was a secessionist; and the great body of eminent men who have been true economists—Sismondi, McCulloch, Cobden, and including even the venerable Dr. Wayland—who have laid down the doctrine which I have to-day advanced, must all be, regardless of the foolish anachronism, secessionists! Such is the result of the sapient argumentation of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Daniel Webster himself advocated free-trade once for New England, and John C. Calhoun advocated protection. As Webster was for free trade, he was a secessionist, I suppose! The principles which I have applied to the facts stated do not depend upon who have announced them, but upon their truth. If those men in rebellion have argued in favor of truth on one subject, am I to give it up? If the devil should tell the truth, am I to deny it? The gentleman himself may; but he yields to the devil when he does it. I do not; therefore I do not yield to the gentleman. Neither is it true that I have copied in this argument the speeches of southern nullifiers in hæc verba. No argument on the tariff has ever been made on the basis of the census of 1860, and in connection with and in relation to our paper money system. I venture to say that these views are as new as they are true.

The CHAIRMAN. (Mr. SCHENCK.) The hour of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to conclude.

Unanimous consent being given;

Mr. COX proceeded, as follows:

It may not be gratifying to the gentleman, but I propose to prove all I said, and shall exhibit, without fear of the charge of secession, the interests of Massachusetts which enjoy the protective bounties of the Federal Government at the expense of the people of other portions of the Union.

Capital invested and production of Massachusetts in the following manufactures in 1860:

† Capital not given in the census tables.

In the above exhibit the House can see what immense interests Massachusetts possesses which enjoy protection and bounty, and why it is her Representatives are so sensitive when we of other States undertake to call her to account for her unrighteous gains. By applying the principle of calculation herein before applied to the manufacturing interests of the whole country, it can be ascertained how much in dollars and cents Massachusetts unjustly abstracts in the form of protective bounties from the people of the Union. Nor, in view of this exhibit, can any one be surprised that Massachusetts, located in a rigorous climate and possessed of a sterile soil, should accumulate wealth more rapidly than any other State.

We close our view of the operations of the tariff and paper money system by appending sundry tables showing some of the leading unprotected products, contrasting the New England and western States. Perhaps my friend from Massachusetts may think before I am done, that the census was taken in Massachusetts by secessionists.

Since 1860, stimulated by the diminished supply of cotton goods, the woolen manufactures of the country have been more than doubled. In relation to the increase of the woolen manufacture in the United States, the Boston Shipping List, under date of December 11, 1863, thus remarks:

"We have lately called attention to the rapid increase of woolen machinery and the questionable policy of introducing woolen machinery into cotton mills now idle. The rush for woolens for some time past is starting up new mills in all directions. It is estimated that there has been added within the past eighteen months about 1,000 sets, an increase of 40 per cent., and manufacturers of machinery are full of contracts for several months in advance. The above does not include the woolen machinery in operation in Pennsylvania and other parts of the United States, which was not less than 1,000 sets eighteen months since, and the increase has doubtless been quite equal to the increase in the New England States. The product of all the machinery is estimated at from $135,000,000 to $150,000,000 worth of goods per annum."

This last duty on wool admits a large portion of the raw material used by the woolen manufacturer substantially free. In 1863 there was imported into the United States 71,882,128 pounds, costing $12,290,630, averaging less than 17 cents per pound. The duty therefore on the quantity imported was about 8½ mills per pound. The wool is of very fair grade, although dirty. It comes directly in competition with the American wool-grower. It is a discrimination in favor of the manufacturer against the farmer. And upon this quantity imported the manufacturer charges upon the consumer the enormous bounty which the combined tariff and paper-money systems enable him to charge.

I have shown to what an enormous extent labor is being robbed by the unjust discriminations in favor of the privileged few. We punish the robbery of one individual by another. We hang those who take human life with malice prepense. But what shall we say of a Government which robs one class by wholesale, to gratify the avarice of another, or of a Congress which takes away from the laboring poor the "means whereby they live," which is life itself to them? Even political economy, rising out of its unimpassioned logic into the higher sphere of moral science, contemplates the existence of such outrages only to denounce them with indignation. That great and good man to whom I have referred, and from whose lips I learned the lessons of political economy and moral science, Dr. Wayland, thus analyzes, reprehends, and pictures the consequences of such oppressive legislation as that now proposed. He says:

"The right of property may be violated by society. It sometimes happens that society or government, which is its agent, though it may prevent the infliction of wrong by individuals upon individuals, is itself by no means averse to inflicting wrong or violating the right of individuals. This is done where Governments seize upon the property of individuals by mere arbitrary act, a form of tyranny with which all the nations of Europe were of old too well acquainted. It is also done by unjust legislation; that is, when legislators, how well soever chosen, enact unjust laws by which the property of a part or of the whole is unjustly taken away, or unjustly subjected to oppressive taxation."

"Of all the destructive agencies which can be brought to bear upon production, by far the most fatal is public oppression. It drinks up the spirit of a people by inflicting wrong through means of an agency which was created for the sole purpose of preventing wrong, and which was intended to be the ultimate and faithful refuge of the friendless. When the antidote to evil becomes the source of evil, what hope for man is left? When society itself sets an example of peculation, what shall prevent the individuals of the society from imitating that example? Hence, public injustice is always the prolific parent of private violence. The result is that capital emigrates, production ceases, and a nation either sinks down in hopeless despondence, or else the people, harassed beyond endurance and believing that their condition cannot be made worse by any change, rush into all the horrors of civil war; the social elements are dissolved; the sword enters every house; the holiest ties which bind men together are severed; and no prophet can predict at the beginning what will be the end."—Wayland's Political Economy, page 115.

From the same wise source I have been taught that wars may keep the most enterprising and industrious nation always poor; and that had Great Britain not expended in wars the incalculable sums—almost equal to our own expenditures—which the past hundred years might otherwise have added to her operative capital, there would hardly have remained the recollection of poverty on her shores.

We are pursuing her career, with this difference, that in war we are our own enemies; while we are exhausting our foe we are exhausting ourselves. We are approaching the abysses of poverty, therefore, inconceivably faster than ever England did.

No scheme like the present and proposed tariff was ever before devised in this or any other country which accelerates a nation to so sure a downfall. No scheme ever operated so thoroughly and rapidly to transfer wealth from the pockets of the many to those of the few; from the hands of labor to the coffers of capital, and that, too, without a particle of consideration. If this system shall continue in operation even for the small period of five years it will change the whole face of society in this country; nor can I fail to see that the rich, who are rioting in the honest gains of the poor man, may share with the poor the horrors of that future. If in this 'once happy and prosperous land poverty rises in its ghastly multitudes to cut the throat of wealth and then gash itself in the wild impatience of its own hard fate, let the authors of this war and its unequal burdens bear the crime and curse, and seek such mercy as Heaven may grant to those who despoil the poor for the gratification of their unhallowed avarice. Gradually we are approaching that terrible future. This iniquitous tariff system is accomplishing the results aimed at by the leaders of old Federalism—the distinctions of classes, the subjugation of labor to capital, the degradation of the masses, and the inauguration of a concentrated and strong Government.

Hence, said I not truly that this question involved the problem of liberty? For the party in power, in addition to their oppressive taxation, strike at the individuality and independence of the States—the great distinctive and conservative feature of our national system, and which is absolutely essential to the preservation of the liberties of the people. They have established a paper-money banking system, under the control of the General Government, which concentrates power in the Administration for the time being, and gives it control over the property and pecuniary interests of the people. They expend the people's money without scruple or stint, never listening to the suggestions of economy nor the admonitions of prudence, nor heeding the sufferings which follow from the burdens of taxation. Here they vote appropriations for every conceivable project, constitutional or not. They squander the public lands, one of the sources of revenue which can help to relieve the people from taxation, on every conceivable project suggested by speculation. They support and educate at the expense of the people the negroes whom they have set free in violation of the Constitution. They boldly and shamelessly bring the power of the national Government, both civil and military, in conflict with the freedom of elections and the liberty of the press. They virtually suppress these great franchises of the American people. In short, the party in power has instituted a crusade of perfidy against the institutions of the country and the liberties of the people, which they preach with exulting and shameless audacity, on the pretext of preserving the Union!

As the proper concomitant of these acts we have this tariff system, which is to be thrust on the patience of a hitherto long-forbearing people. Will they meekly bow to this new burden? It may be that there is no retributive justice in Heaven. We cannot, however, yet believe that the almighty Ruler of nations has abandoned our bleeding country to the caprice and wickedness of the leaders of the party in power. Despot thrones, supported by absolute authority, have in the lapse of time been shaken and have fallen before the wrath of the Supreme Avenger, manifested through the awful might and passion of outraged peoples. Such is the lesson of history. Warned by such examples, the men now in power in this country need not hope to escape that retributive vengeance which their crimes against our country and constitutional liberty so justly merit.

Mr. BLAINE. It has grown to be a habit in this House, Mr. Chairman, to speak of New England as a unit, and in assailing the New England States to class them together, as has been done to-day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] throughout his entire speech. In response to such attacks, each particular Representative from a New England State might feel called upon to defend the whole section. For myself, sir, I take a different view. I have the honor to represent in part only one State, the State of Maine, and I have no more to do with the local and particular interests of the rest of New England than with any other State in the Union. The other New England States are ably represented on this floor, and it would be officious and arrogant in me to attempt to speak for them. But when the gentleman from Ohio presumes to charge here that the State I represent receives from Federal legislation any undue protection to her local interests, he either ignorantly or willfully misrepresents the case so grossly, that for ten minutes I will occupy the attention of the House in correcting him.

If the gentleman from Ohio who has given us such a learned lecture on political economy were at all well posted in regard to the industrial pursuits of the people of Maine he would know that two great and leading interests are lumber and navigation. Now will the gentleman be good enough to tell the House what protection is extended by the laws of the United States to the lumber interest? At no time in our history, sir, did lumber receive more than a feeble protection, and even that was taken away ten years ago by the gentleman's political associates when they formed the reciprocity treaty, and thus broke down the only barrier we had and threw in the whole lumber product of the British provinces to compete with us. And in regard to our great interest of navigation will the gentleman be good enough to tell the House when a ship is launched from a Maine ship-yard to engage in the commerce of the world what protection is given by the United States laws against competition with foreign bottoms? Not a particle, sir. These two great leading interests of my State derive no advantage from Federal legislation, while one of them has been very greatly damaged by the treaty-making power of the Federal Government. I do not hesitate to declare here to-day that the State of Ohio has upon her products and her manufactures ten dollars of protection from Federal legislation where Maine has twenty-five cents.

But, sir, let us take another view of this matter. The State of Maine consumes every year five hundred thousand barrels of flour, all of which with a very trifling exception is brought from the West, and a large proportion, I presume, from the State of Ohio. Now if the gentleman's logic be good, it would be a very admirable idea for this country to so change its domestic industry as to detach the six hundred thousand people of Maine from their present pursuits and convert them into producers instead of consumers of breadstuffs and provisions. And let this change be made throughout all the manufacturing and commercial districts of the Union, converting the five million consumers into producers of grain and meats, and the withering effect on the gentleman's State and on the entire West would be too apparent to require a speech of an hour and a half to demonstrate it. Sir, I am tired of such talk as the gentleman from Ohio has indulged in to-day, and in so far as it includes my own State as being a pensioner upon the General Government or dependent upon the bounty of any other State, I hurl back the charge with scorn. If there be a State in this Union that can say with truth that her Federal connection confers no special benefit of a material character, that State is Maine. And yet, sir, no State is more attached to the Federal Union than Maine. Her affection and her pride are centered in the Union, and God knows she has contributed of her best blood and treasure without stint in supporting the war for the Union; and she will do so to the end. But she resents, and I, speaking for her, resent the insinuation that she derives any undue advantage from Federal legislation or that she gets a single dollar that she does not pay back. As compared with Ohio, whence this slander comes, I repeat, sir, that Maine receives from Federal legislation no protection worth reckoning.

Mr. COX. I beg leave to correct the gentleman. He could not have made these remarks if he had listened attentively to my speech. I referred to the lumber interest only to show that it was unprotected. My remark, therefore, was in favor of the gentleman's State. I said the lumber interest of the West by the census of 1860 amounted to over $33,000,000, while that of New England was only about $12,000,000. Hence, lumber was unprotected.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman arraigned the New England States, and I did not hear him make any exception.

Mr. COX. I did arraign New England as a whole, but not in regard to the lumber interest.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to know in regard to what interests the gentleman arraigns my State?

Mr. COX. I named ten articles on which they have special protection.

Mr. BLAINE. Will the gentleman name one article on which the State of Maine has especial protection, only one; that is all I ask for.

Mr. COX. I will say to the gentleman that I made no reference particularly to the State of Maine.

Mr. BLAINE. But the State of Maine is in New England, and the gentleman's sweeping charges were against New England as a whole.

Mr. COX. I gave the statistics of cotton, woolen, and iron manufactures, clothing, &c. If any of these are in Maine, my remarks will apply. Maine generally sustains the rest of New England in her exactions.

Mr. BLAINE. Why, sir, your own State is protected in iron to the amount of millions of dollars more on that single article than Maine ever received on all her products together.

Mr. COX. It does not necessarily follow that I am to stand up for one particular interest in my State if I deem it against the general interests of the whole State, or militates a just principle of taxation.

Mr. BLAINE. No, sir; but the gentleman comes up here and classifies the States of the Union as "protected" and "unprotected" States, and he puts my State in the "protected" class, while the most youthful page on this floor who has studied Mitchell's Geography knows that the gentleman's own State derives from the General Government an immeasurably larger degree of protection for her local interests than the State of Maine does. And I tell the gentleman that he shall not with impunity include my State in his wholesale slander.

I observe, sir, that a great deal has been said recently in the other end of the Capitol in regard to the fishing bounties, a portion of which is paid to Maine. I have a word to say on that matter, and I may as well say it here. According to the records of the Navy Department, the State of Maine has sent into the naval service since the beginning of this war six thousand skilled seamen, to say nothing of the trained and invaluable officers she has contributed to the same sphere of patriotic duty. For these men the State has received no credit whatever on her quotas for the Army. If you will calculate the amount of bounty that would have been paid to that number of men had they enlisted in the Army, instead of entering the Navy as they did without bounty, you will find it will foot up a larger sum than Maine has received in fishing bounties for the past twenty years. Thus, sir, the original proposition on which fishing bounties were granted—that they would build up a hardy and skillful class of mariners for the public defense in time of public danger—has been made good a hundred and a thousand fold by the experience and the developments of this war.

Thus much, sir, I have felt called upon to say in response to the elaborate and carefully prepared speech of the gentleman from Ohio. I have spoken in vindication of a State that is as independent and as proud as any within the limits of the Union. I have spoken for a people as light-toned and as honorable as can be found in the wide world. I have spoken for a particular class—many of them my constituents—who are as manly and as brave as ever faced the ocean's storms. And so long, sir, as I have a seat on this floor the State of Maine shall not be slandered by the gentleman from Ohio, or by gentlemen from any other State.

Mr. GRINNELL obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to yield to me for a few minutes.

Mr. GRINNELL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to enter into any controversy with the gentleman from Ohio, or to undertake to make any invidious comparisons between States; or, with the gentleman from Maine, to select my State out from any share of the opprobrium sought to be heaped on New England. For one, as a representative from Massachusetts, I am perfectly willing that my State shall take it all. Massachusetts has the honor of having always been, while the rebellion was brewing, the best hated State in the Union; and so long as she maintains that honor for the same reason that gave it to her, I am perfectly content. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] assumed this morning, for the first time, to deal in facts. I do not know that he has ever before attempted to play that rôle. His rôle has always been general denunciation. I suggest to him the propriety of consulting the authorities from which he has derived his figures a little more carefully than he has done. He has attempted here, with an array of figures, to show that New England, or, as my friend [Mr. BLAINE] prefers not to have Maine counted in, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island where his old teacher of political economy lives, have not only got all the special legislation in their favor at the expense of the West—and I suppose the gentleman means his own district particularly—but that they have not furnished their share of men and money. Massachusetts alone has the honor of being singled out, by name, by the gentleman from Ohio, and I congratulate Massachusetts on the fact that no other State is deemed worthy of this renewal, this reviving of the old and stale calumnies on New England, as a State which has not furnished her share of men in this war. Well, sir, that was the charge brought by a South Carolina rebel against Massachusetts, touching her share in the Revolution; but when the figures were turned to it was found that Massachusetts had furnished four soldiers to the revolutionary war for every one furnished by the State from which the charge originated.

Now, my friend from Ohio says that Massachusetts falls short of her share about twenty-one thousand men. Now, let me just correct the gentleman in this statement, and I will not detain the House longer. Massachusetts, in a settlement made on the 1st day of May with the Provost Marshal General of the United States, after being allowed fifteen thousand men whom she has sent into the Navy, was found to be behind her quota four thousand instead of twenty-one thousand, as the gentleman charges. And, sir, Massachusetts has not only sent to the Navy fifteen thousand men, but fifteen hundred of these men have been sent from a single town; while the State of Ohio—and I suggest this to my friend from the Columbus district—was ten thousand men behind her quota at the same time when my distinguished friend was arraigning the State of Massachusetts.

Now, let me call the attention of the House to the amount which Ohio, with nineteen Representatives upon this floor, pays for the support of this Government in this war in the shape of taxes as compared with what Massachusetts pays, with ten Representatives upon this floor. Massachusetts in ten months paid in taxes, $4,800,000; while Ohio for the same period of time, with nearly double her population, and with more than twice the same amount of minerals, of real estate, and of the substantial wealth of the country, pays a less amount of tax. I have before me the exact figures, which are as follows: Massachusetts in ten months paid in taxes, $4,830,500 86; Ohio, for the same period, paid $3,217,490 70; making a difference in favor of Massachusetts of $1,613,020 16.

And now let me ask what is the comparative amount paid by my district and by the district of the gentleman who now arraigns Massachusetts upon this floor. My district for the same period of ten months paid $553,000; the gentleman's district paid $166,493 70; making a difference of $386,514 30.

Now, sir, I do not care to make those comparisons; they ought not to be made here. When I should be found arraigning any of the States of this Union in this emergency I would, in my judgment, be found departing from my duty here; and I only refer to these figures to show the gentleman from Ohio what little ground there is for standing up here and asking the indulgence of the House for an extension of time for the purpose of arraigning a sister State of this Union upon false charges which he brings in here.

I have no disposition to enter upon any such system of arraignment as this; nor into any comparison between the different States of this Union. The State of Massachusetts is ready to bear her full share of the blood and treasure which are to be expended in this war. She has no drop of blood, she has no dollar of treasure which is not consecrated to the salvation of this country; she shed the first blood in this war, and she is ready to shed the last. Come weal come woe, come poverty come riches, she will turn her back never upon the flag which floats over your head. She cares not whether the gentleman's district or the gentleman's State shall be behind or before her; up to the measure of her capacity she consecrates all her energies to carrying this Government through this great struggle.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply want to suggest that the 18th of April was before the 19th, and as Pennsylvania blood was shed on the 18th of April, I state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the first blood shed in this war was that of a colored man from Pennsylvania. I expect to repeat this fact until it will be recognized by Massachusetts men as a fact. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I yielded a portion of my time to the gentleman who has preceded me [Mr. DAWES] for the purpose of correcting the statements of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox.] Sir, let me add I have heard of the sophistry of figures, and before proceeding to discuss this subject as I intended I shall call the attention of the House to some figures which are found in this volume published by Congress in regard to my own section of country, which the gentleman from Ohio has seen fit to misrepresent and traduce upon this floor.

If we are to take the statements of the gentleman from Ohio we in the West are a set of nomads, a half-civilized, barbarous race, raising nothing but corn, wheat, and pork for our support. Now, sir, here is a fact in regard to the manufactories of the western States. While I find that New England has four hundred and fifty-three manufactories, and the middle States seven hundred and forty-eight, the western States have four hundred and seventy-nine manufacturing establishments. It will be observed, therefore, that the western States had some twenty or thirty manufactories more than New England in 1860; and have increased fifty per cent. the last four years. The people of New England and Pennsylvania are denounced as vampires, feeding upon the wealth of the people of the West, enjoying all the benefits of Government and the new States none.

Sir, I have no words which I can use to excrete sufficiently such language, in arraying the sections in opposition during a time of war; as if we were not one people, descended from one stock, having one interest, and bound up in one destiny.

The gentleman remarked if this were not a war measure at this time it would produce revolution. I dissent entirely. I believe this tariff bill, presented from the Committee of Ways and Means by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] will not be associated with the degradation sought to be attached to the Morrill tariff of 1861 by those who were for disunion. I think that the country will regard it as one of the measures of protection and necessary for a revenue, which will tend to assure us of an independence of our enemies abroad.

The gentleman has said that this tariff law would be oppressive to the West; that all tariff laws are oppressive to the South, and I leave him to answer for that section. I would join in any measure of oppression upon the South that would bring them to a knowledge of their great crime of rebellion. But I shall prove that this measure at this time will not be oppressive to the West. It will lead us hereafter to guard those interests which we have heretofore neglected; I mean the industrial and manufacturing establishments of the West.

I notice the gentleman assumes to speak for the whole West. There are six or seven States west of his own. They do not mean in the future, if I understand their domestic economy, simply to raise grain and send it to Europe; they do not desire to confine themselves to raising pork and beef; no, sir, we mean also to encourage, increase, and extend our manufacturing interests, and build up a noble rivalry between the Mississippi and the Merrimac. If they can manufacture cheaper upon the Merrimac than we can upon the Mississippi, then let them and not England manufacture for the United States. We are new States, rich in soil favored by climate, and we mean to invite emigrants from all nations of the earth and to add to our natural wealth, and make the home of manufacturing industry throughout the whole West.

Let me say in regard to tariff policy, if I had time I could show that Washington and Jefferson, and the fathers of the Republic, were in favor of tariff for protection in time of peace, and they were called statesmen. What, then, becomes us now but to forget party and locality, and provide means to meet our war expenses in preparation, I trust, for an era of real peace and prosperity before unknown?

Sir, the first gun fired at Fort Sumter, in 1861, seems to reverberate still. Its wide throat had power to drown much of the clamor of home free traders, sweep away the theories of peace societies, and move from their foundation the cornerstones of American slavery. The last tariff was framed under the frowns of the European lords of the shop, the mill, and the loom; all previous ones were enacted with regard to the prejudices of free traders, in subjection to the policy of slave-owners and on the basis of a national peace establishment. This is a new era. Our pecuniary burdens imposed by war have brought a small compensation for suffering in a desire to escape foreign vassalage, and that colonial dependence which was felt a century ago, under restraint, by the policy and power of the mother country. It was then the avowed policy "to keep a watchful eye over the colonies, to restrain them from setting up any of the manufactures which are carried on in Great Britain, and any such attempts should be crushed in the beginning." The first convention of the colonies protested against the exercise of that power which compelled them to be mere producers of raw staples, and to make exchanges with their oppressors if they would enjoy the comforts of fabrics made by machinery. It was oppression, blocking up the way to colonial wealth and independence by placing the heavy burdens of transportation on the former and separating the producer from the consumer by the ocean.

A few years preceding the Declaration of Independence the colonies had resolved to cease buying foreign fabrics, and to assert their commercial independence, except their rights were regarded.

As early as 1771, Benjamin Franklin, writing from London, expressed what I wish might be read by every theoretical free trader. He says:

"If your country people would well consider that all they save in refusing to purchase foreign gawags and in making their own apparel, being applied to the improvement of their plantations, would render those more profitable as yielding a greater produce, I should hope they would persist resolutely in their present commendable industry and frugality."

"Every manufacturer encouraged in our country makes part of a market for provisions within ourselves, and saves so much money to the country as must otherwise be exported to pay for the manufactures he supplies. Here in England it is well known and understood that, whenever a manufacture is established which employs a number of hands, it raises the value of lands in the neighboring country all around it; partly by the greater demand near at hand for the produce of the land, and partly by the plenty of money drawn by the manufacturer to that part of the country. It seems, therefore, the interest of all farmers and owners of land to encourage young manufactures in preference to foreign ones imported among us from distant countries."

These philosophic observations were founded upon a knowledge of the natural capacity of our soil and spirit of our people, stung by the effects of arrogant commerce, which was arraigned as a cheat. His theories have never been successfully controverted, and when the guide of our legislators the country has found prosperity; when abjured, revulsion, pecuniary disaster, and national vassalage. At that early day, anterior to the Revolution, when the clearings were scarcely out of sight of the ocean, and when in but few of the rich valleys the methods to enhance the value of lands were understood to be by the introduction of manufactures, even then it was an accepted axiom, "population is wealth." The exception to this is when there is found a low grade of civilization, and in the great cities.

In no country is there furnished a more striking illustration of the relation of population to wealth than in our own. Land suited to farming in New England and in the manufacturing portions of New York and Pennsylvania is worth from one to two hundred dollars the acre; that of the same quality on the railway in Ohio is worth fifty dollars the acre; in Illinois thirty dollars; in Iowa fifteen dollars. This difference in values is not attributable to climate, but to density of population which secures cheap exchanges in trade, and a community of interests which even higher rates of duty than those proposed in this bill would facilitate, concentrating population and bringing the operative from the Old World to our shores.

Franklin at the same writing expresses his gratification that the spirit of industry and frugality continued with the people, and "that the merchants had not departed from their agreement of non-importation." They did not, and commerce yielded to the claim of patriotism, while skill and enterprise prepared a hitherto dependent people to pass through the Revolution, achieving first political, and later, pecuniary independence of their oppressors.

It is a pleasing incident and relief in this time of party strife and national peril to find an honorable gentleman on this floor [Mr. STREIBER] from the great city of the continent, not a formal supporter of the Administration, forgetting the local claims of commerce and party ties to reclothe the policy of the philosopher of the Revolution, and prove the necessity of encouraging home industry and independence of rival nations. I regret that ill health will deprive us of listening to his voice on this, one of the great measures of Congress, and I quote his language in a speech made on the internal revenue bill. Anticipating a high tariff, he said:

"A bill which shall strike down that part of our foreign commerce which fills the land with the extravagant luxuries of the Old World, should speedily follow this one. It should also establish a tariff of duties so high on other articles that every part of our manufacturing industry will spring into active and vigorous life. We Americans should live within ourselves during the continuance of this war."

Referring to the sympathy of France and England for the rebels, he continues:

"We have nothing to ask from these two nations. Their policy has already destroyed or rendered useless the greatest commercial marine in the world. All the injuries they could inflict have been inflicted. Let us, then, labor hereafter only for the certain reestablishment of the American Union upon a basis as broad and as long as this continent, so that we may 'establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity.' Make your legislation conform to this idea, and see what a splendid spectacle the American people will present to the world. Prohibit the exportation of every dollar of gold and silver, of every bushel of grain, of every pound of beef and pork, or adopt the policy of a prohibitory tariff, and thus announce to mankind in every part of the globe that America will perpetuate her great principles throughout all time; and that, until the question as to her power and right to do so is definitely settled, she will draw the resources for the contest in which she is engaged from her own broad domain, and from the inexhaustible treasury of her own prosperous people; that she will hold no intercourse with foreign nations until after the war, none whatever. Sir, such a course would secure a triumphant success to the American arms, to American industry in its multifarious branches, and render us forever independent of the world."

The organization of the Ladies' National Covenant Associations, founded on the pledge to forego the purchase of foreign fabrics during the war, is making practical the idea of this statesman. I hail this patriotic movement, with its manifold promise of an arrest in the drain of gold from the country and an encouragement to those who would wear what is simple and becoming, and who would encourage home industry and not the introduction of foreign fabrics. It is a movement which will enhance the value of our currency and cheapen food to the Government and the soldier's family. In history it will be mentioned as a noble attestation of the love of wives and daughters for our holy cause.

The devotees of fashion may decry patriotic women who refuse to fill the coffers of our foreign enemies. Those of doubtful loyalty may rest in indifference to the soldier's sufferings and his sister's sacrifice, who gladly shares with them, saving from the wardrobe to make richer contributions to the hospital supplies; but so true as the national exchequer is in greater danger than our Army, the ladies of the "Covenant" will not be forgotten; they will live in history, and have a remembrance for doing "what they could" with pure and patriotic motives.

If I might speak in the ear of fashion and to those reckless in expenditure as I do to those who can mold public opinion, I would cite as an example for us an historic incident. In the time when Europe was shaken with the tread of armies, and Prussia had drawn the sword and thrown away the scabbard, the king instituted the Order of the Iron Cross to reward his subjects for sacrifices which they were called upon to make in behalf of their country. These symbols were held as at once the evidence of past wealth and succeeding patriotism, and even the emperor appeared in public decorated with the new order.

Then art, genius, and industry were turned into a new channel. The women universally sent their precious ornaments to the public treasury and received in return a beautiful ornament in bronze with this simple inscription: "I gave gold for iron, 1813." This is the origin of the iron cross so highly prized in every country of Europe. Chivalry cannot boast of a nobler fountain of honor, nor fashion of a more touching memorial of virtue, and it is this patriotism which is being imitated by our loyal women in 1864, whose covenant badge will for centuries be a record of our national grief and peril, and represent the virtues of those who wore them.

Passing from this, Mr. Chairman, there are reasons why the grain States should not look on the policy of high duties with disfavor. You can feed the world, is the address often made to our local pride. This has stimulated production, and we have defied nature to furnish the proof that a distant country should be the workshop and the new States the Egyptian granary. The drain on the natural properties of the soil which produce wheat has often been stated as the gift of millions of pounds for a hundred; and nature has cried out against an infraction of her laws by decreasing the crop and compelling the grain-producer to seek the virgin soil for his home or diversify his labors.

Many press on and on, slow to learn the lesson that the discriminations of trade are all against him who is distant from market and relies on the sale of heavy products to gain a competence. He must confront these figures. Taking New York or Boston for the market, and the average price of our staples for the past ten years, his corn for exportation is worth nothing fifty miles from a railroad, his wheat valueless at one hundred miles, pork at four hundred, beef at five hundred, wool at four hundred miles.

Railroad markets will furnish the same comparative values, which necessitate this conclusion, that the closer the proximity of the exchangers, the grower and the fabricator, producer and consumer, the greater the advantage to the former. Hence the ready assent to this proposition: if we cannot have the factory and the forge near, let us cherish them at home on our soil and not abroad. Wars and blockades have done for other countries what this war may do for us, but we cannot hope that until the fruits of diversified labor are seen that the real vassalage of the distant agriculturist will be apparent.

Two fifths of the market value of the farmer's grain is now expended by him in effecting a foreign exchange with the manufacturer of woolen, cotton, leather, and hardware, while the fabricator may reach our market with his light concentrated articles, by a transportation tax of two per cent. of their value. As political economists it becomes our duty to reduce these home burdens by one fifth, as we may when the manufacturer shall be on our own soil, and make a still further reduction by establishing our artisans by the nearest water-power or coal-bed.

Let me give an illustration of the arm's-length expenses and exchanges by the farmers of the Northwest.

The keeper of a herd has an exchange with the bootmaker. For a pair of boots he will pay six dollars, and the hide of a bullock, which he exchanges fifty miles from a railroad, is worth three dollars. And how is this price determined? Not by a tannery process in his own village, where he may find indigenous weeds and can bring from abroad concentrated tannin, but by first selling the hide to the country dealer, he to the merchant at the depot, he to a Chicago dealer, who consigns to a commission house in New York, who finds a tanner for a purchaser in Greene county, New York, who sells to a leather dealer in New York, who finds a customer in a Massachusetts bootmaker, who sells his stock to a Boston jobber, and he finds a customer in a Chicago merchant, and he wholesales to the town retailer, who supplies the farmer from whom the bullock's hide was bought two years before, after the hide has paid transportation for three thousand miles, passed through eleven hands, including the tanner and bootmaker, with a commission to each. The wonder is that there is no greater disparity in the price of that which he raised and that which was bought. It is three dollars, and that money is obtained by the price of wheat in Lynn, where he fed the bootmaker, which would be about six bushels; thus the raiser of a heavy product distant from a customer got but half a price for what he sold, and was taxed three prices, regarding his means of payment, for what he was compelled to buy. Such exchanges properly expose our western grain-raisers to the ridicule of the Englishman by the German tradesmen when they boasted that they bought from the Englishman the skin of a fox for a groat and then sold him the tail for a shilling.

The proposition is too plain to require proof that the future wealth and independence of the new States is to be found in establishing home manufactures which will bring population to the State, and by a diversified industry enrich rather than impoverish the soil. Let those who have no manufactures encourage a home industry, and a national currency will tend to equalize interest, and cheap food and fuel will attract the operative, and all will conspire to the general welfare. If it be said that this policy will depress commerce, I answer that it will promote profitable home trade, and by it our foreign commerce will be increased and become more profitable by dealing in concentrated values rather than gross products after a few years of prosperity, as in France. Granted that a portion of the capital now employed in foreign commerce should be diverted, that does not imply its destruction. The money required to build a ship will build a factory, and it is as honorable to employ a spinner as a sailor; while, if the history of nations proves anything, it does that a people who protect their own industry will enjoy the most profitable commerce. Our sea-captains and merchantmen have a world-wide fame; and the generosity and patriotism of gentlemen who, trusting to the ocean winds and waves and adventurous life, have retired with fortunes, is well known; but they cannot ask us to credit the ship which only carries between a people with similar soil and climate as the great producer, nor can the poetry of sails whitening every sea, and keels vexing every shore, and national pride which would make us first on the ocean, draw from distant States the contributions of the farmer in sending abroad heavy products at great cost, while the fabricator of another country performs his part in making the exchange with trivial expense.

The great cities of antiquity which are now no more seemed to have a temporary use as centers of rude society and nomadic races and for protection, but would domestic commerce and suitable protection to our industry congregate hundreds of thousands where the masses climb in despair to garrets or go down to the death-damps of cellars, struggling like a pitcher of tamed Egyptian vipers each to get the head above the other?

Jefferson, who saw our great cities at less than half their present size, designated them as the "eye-sores on the body-politic." To prefer foreign to domestic commerce is to decimate the country and contribute to the colossal growth of the city, aggravating rather than ameliorating the miseries of the race, who are described not inaptly in the large cities as being in those larger prisons to the soul, "like cages to birds or pounds to beasts."

It is in the city supported by commerce that crime abounds. Their government costs double that of the same number of people in the country, and since all who can flee the city's tainted air in the months of summer do so, the claims of commerce for the part which it performs in building up the city cannot be regarded with favor on any theory of morals, of advantage to the masses, or public economy.

There is a practical question for occupations, interests, and localities; and their immediate representatives will inquire what should we yield and what can we justly ask.

I will enumerate some of the articles on which protection was sought to be afforded by the tariff of 1862. They were tobacco, woolen manufactures, iron, and wool. These come in direct competition with our home industry.

Tobacco was protected from twenty-five to thirty-five cents a pound, and in its production there is invested from seventy-five to one hundred million dollars; and it has since the rebellion advanced in price 75 per cent.

Woolen cloth had an average protection of eighteen cents specific and thirty cents ad valorem, and in its production there is invested $50,000,000. Goods during the last three years have appreciated 65 per cent.

Iron has an average protection of eighteen to twenty dollars per ton, and in its manufacture there is invested $50,000,000. Its advance in price has been 100 per cent. within three years.

Wool has protection in specific duty of from three to nine cents per pound, yet on an ad valorem tax, with a foreign valuation, three fourths of the importation paid only nine mills a pound. There is an investment of $100,000,000 in its production, and the price has appreciated less than 40 per cent. since 1860.

Whatever other interests may ask, it is plain that the American wool-grower, while more wool has the past year been brought into the country than has been raised at home, receives next to no protection. The present tariff bill, such are the tricks of foreign trade, will furnish unequal protection to this great interest. As we pass to the details I hope to see it improved.

Passing to a more general discussion, I will say that the increase of spindles will augment the home production with proper encouragement; and no producer of food or wool or any fabricator of iron can desire to remove these home looms and spindles across the ocean. That would necessitate his payment of freight, insurance, and commissions on his heavy productions, which would so much lessen the value of grain, wool, and iron exported. There is no party to war against the manufacturers. They have honored their employment and placed themselves in the front rank as artisans, and established communities which commanded the praise of De Tocqueville, the philosopher, in this language:

"The civilization of New England has been like a beacon lit upon a hill, which after it has diffused its warmth around, lingers the distant horizon with its glow."

Intelligent travelers, however prepossessed in favor of foreign countries, can but concur in this:

"In no country in the world are industrial, social, and educational advantages so equally diffused or so highly enjoyed as in our manufacturing States. In no land enjoying centuries on the road of improvement is there the same proportion to the number of square miles of school-houses, churches, and printing offices. In no country in the world is intelligence so widely spread, or morality so general, or domestic comfort so universal."

A well-earned preëminence, which would arouse none but a base mind to jealousy, and may well stimulate newer communities and more remote from the seaboard to a generous rivalry. Every western farmer will prefer to make his exchanges in New England to Old England, sparing himself the tolls of middle-men and the ocean transportation of heavy products. He is well assured, too, that this protection will, at no late day, redound to his benefit in a newer locality.

Concentration, and the domestic economy of districts, will be studied; and to-day it is learned that land, however rich, is dear to the occupant if far removed from a railroad, except he be a gold-hunter or content with semi-barbarous society.

In this age of steam the law of the movement of manufactures is toward the coal-measures, and since the once strong free-trade party is powerless and railroad communication is so well established that the East and the West have formed intimate business relations, and a national currency will tend to a uniform interest on the Mis-issippi and the Merrimac; it being also demonstrated that in the new States where the raw material is found and numerous consumers that fuel and food are cheaper by from thirty to fifty per cent. than in the older States, for not a long period shall we wait for the presence and benefits of numerous manufactures.

This tariff bill, in the main, looks to a stable policy; it will quiet the fears of the timid capitalist, while from actual observation and the figures of the census we shall not be slow in demonstrating that equal longevity and comfort may be found toward the setting sun, where the star of empire takes its way.

The war prices of cotton goods have again brought into use the wheels and the loom, and as if by magic the factories are springing up which will give an exchange of wool for cloth, thus sparing our people the heavy burdens of transportation, commissions, and insurance, and cheapening to the masses the price of fabrics. That glow is a welcome light in our horizon, and the more welcome as it promises to illumine and enliven the solitudes of the water-fall and exhaustless coal-beds, diverting our people from the wasting of their lands as wheat exporters to efforts at home production; that the deputed exchangers by the ocean may not be our masters; that enterprise and capital from the manufacturing States and sweltering crowds from the cities may find employment and wealth by the side of the producer. More mills and good profits should be the motto of this Congress.

Natural laws and the benefit of all parties require such an increase, making protection to our industry not dependent upon a party or upon the representatives of a locality, but upon a well-understood national policy.

In advance, for one I am prepared to advocate a gradual increase of duties which shall look to a prohibition of such articles as are made from our raw material, which are readily produced here; and since for the present we must import merchandise or men, let us bring the men to our shores, and make those now poorly clothed and fed operatives in the mill producers in the field and consumers, the value of whose presence may be estimated by the well-considered statement that the immigration for the last decade was two and a half million people, who brought with them in coin $100,000,000, and whose labor added to the national wealth not less than $1,500,000,000. With the alternative presented to the distant farming communities of the Northwest of sending at their own cost heavy products to Europe and making there their exchanges or inviting laborers where their toil can be lightened and food cheapened and pay increased, there can be but one rational choice.

In the Old World population and poverty have been synonymous, while here population is wealth, and more emphatically in the new States where but ten persons are found to a square mile, and not a hundred and fifty, as in Massachusetts, where population is not too much crowded for social comfort and prosperity.

A high tariff will establish our manufacturing interest on a permanent basis, and until the capacity of home looms is equal to our wants the revenue on goods imported will be considerable, and higher wages paid here than in Europe, and a less demand for foreign fabrics will stimulate emigration, and bring about that to which good policy looks, a national community of interests and a cheapening of exchanges.

We have not hitherto been one. The South clamored for free trade and a transfer of the wealth by commerce to her own ports. The great West aspired to grow grain for the world, and I do not remember that she ever made a plea for the manufacturing interests. History furnishes no such record of success as ours, whereby a sparse population has exported $100,000,000 a year in grain; but is that all to which that great country aspires? They have paid $40,000,000 out of every $100,000,000 to get their grain to a market. They have defied the God of nature, who does not allow the properties which secure a wheat crop to abide indefinitely. Without compensation three years is the limit of the soil's endurance of exhaustion.

Since the learning of this dear lesson the champions of the wheat are not the farmers, but the free-traders, the brokers, and ship-masters, who have a direct interest in extending that hallucination, that our new States to be rich must aspire to feed the world. Correcting this erroneous policy there has been a concentration of grasses and corn into well-fattened animals for export which has brought a fair return. Even in this the producer has paid fifty per cent. of the value of his farm to the exchangers, while the foreign manufacturer has been taxed less than two per cent. to bring his light expensive fabrics to us. To spare the soil and escape the burdens of transportation on heavy articles to a distant market, manufacturing and wool-growing are engrossing more of the attention of our farmers, and these occupations will have their place in the front rank from considerations of local adaptation and the laws of trade which the intelligent agriculturalist will not overlook. With these economical facts in mind the once advocate of free trade and lukewarm friend of home manufactures becomes a convert to the policy of concentration as a great national idea, and to such protection for skilled labor that it may flourish near to us and indirectly bring us revenue and people from the Old World.

Let me say, without offense to other sections I trust, that the prairie States of the West are the proper home of the flock; a fact which furnishes a potential reason why this interest may at least ask indirect protection.

It is there that the animal attains to its highest perfection, and regarding outlay and labor, promises the largest returns. Every true American was proud of the high standing attained by our "bloods" at the world's sheep exhibition at Hamburg, in 1863, when on a second trial, as on the first, American merinos, for beauty of form, strength of constitution, weight and quality of fleece, secured the award of premiums over the first of European flocks, which had been bred with princely care and skill in varying climes for a half century, and in attestation to their superiority were purchased at almost fabulous cost by rival exhibitors to lay the foundation of American stock, being held in the highest repute of any on the globe.

The commentary on our policy was far from being complimentary when our estimate of the "golden-hoofed" animal was determined by the comparatively few flocks kept on our rich and wide domain. It was shown that France, with a stock far inferior to ours, and with a crowded population, on a territory not larger than the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa, folds eight million more sheep than all the United States, and in addition maintains three hundred people to the square mile; while these States, with one fifth of the number of flocks, have only one twentieth of the population. Great Britain, too, with an area little larger than the States of Illinois and Missouri, has several millions more than all in North America; having not less than a sheep to each acre, exclusive of mountain and forest. The damaging comparison is this, that the best clothed people in the world have but twenty-five million sheep, giving the range of one hundred acres to each, and are submitting to a drain of their country of gold by importing one hundred million pounds of wool and cloth, an amount equal to our entire home production.

Can it for a moment be doubted which is the true policy, that of the crowded States of Europe augmenting their flocks, or that of our Government refusing to yield protection to wool, which neglect was followed by a decrease in the flocks during the last decade in all the New England States save Maine, and in Pennsylvania, Ohio, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Illinois, and Indiana? Higher prices and a more rational policy has arrested this decline, and it becomes the American economist and legislator to look forward to that day when we shall not only produce all the wool required for home consumption, but export a light product with little toil, the raising of which enriches the soil rather than those heavy products that crush the laborer and tend to impoverish the field.

What a domain is ours awaiting settlement! Not in the world is there spread out such beauty of surface and richness of soil, rendered attractive by diversity of climate and the promise of health to the landless of all nationalities, embracing a range of latitude which furnishes the natural home for the animal-races and soil for the growth of cereals and the culture of the vine which distinguishes the country between St. Petersburg and Constantinople, within which extremes of latitude are concentrated so large a proportion of the enterprise, wealth, and happiness of civilized society.

Our natural advantages are preëminent, and no political economist can justify the policy of such a country as ours, richer in grasses than Assyria or Andalusia, with hundreds of millions of acres unoccupied, stretching from the upper Mississippi to the Rio Grande, in the annual average importation of 75,000,000 pounds of wool, and cloth to the value of $15,000,000. The fact is suggestive of our dependence, and awakens the inquiry, how can we change that balance-sheet which shows our imports for twelve months to be more than $100,000,000 in excess of our exports? True patriotism will create a demand only for home-made fabrics, and when a policy of national independence is aroused our native resources will be developed as an astonishment to the world, to show that the new State of Iowa alone has greater mineral wealth than Great Britain, and annually produces a sufficiency of grass which is unclipped and left to be consumed by autumnal fires, to feed all the flocks of the United States.

This is the argument. It will be for the advantage of the producer of the cereals to be spared the heavy tax of transportation, which can be done by the extension of our home manufactures; and it will be proved more for the grain-grower's interests still when capital shall pass to the new States, where food is cheap, motive-power abundant, and to which population may be attracted. Then will follow the enhancement of the value of grain, animals, and wool, by so much as the producer in the West now pays in freight, exchange, and commissions.

These considerations justify a policy of protection to manufactures of iron, cotton, and woolen goods. The revenue derived from imports and the elevation of American labor will give further assurance of the continuance of the protective policy. Here, I ask, has the farmer, brought into direct competition with the producer of grain, meat, and wool the same claim to protection as the manufacturer of cloth and iron? It is as plain as any demonstration by figures that since more than three fourths of our imported wool paid a duty of only nine mills a pound, that the tariff of 1862 did not afford adequate protection, being rather a discrimination against a great interest. I have shown that good policy will encourage the home fabricating of the goods necessary for our population; that the motive-power is at hand; that the skill of our artisans is unrivaled, and that to furnish near consumers of our textile staples is a question of pecuniary concern to our agriculturists.

It is conceded that the manufacturing communities of laborers in intelligence, patriotism, and morality have reflected honor on the national character. Can less be said of the rural people of the new States? When have they been found wanting in the time of national conflict and peril? Never. Their simplicity of life has developed the sternest virtue; the integrity and courage of intelligent freemen, illustrated by the revolutionary fathers when "They left the plowshare in the mold,

The flocks and herds without a fold,
The sickle in the unshorn grain,
The corn half garnered on the plain," as examples to their children, who, with heroic sacrifices, in these years of rebellion have, as agriculturists, perpetuated the fame of their fathers by promptness of enlistment and sturdy valor, which properly moves the legislator to devise for the most profitable culture of the untilled and deserted farm; for the maimed returning soldiers, and the orphans incapable of severe labor, yet competent to watch the flock and bestow those little attentions which are indispensable to successful sheep husbandry.

Where shall we find and how shall we economize labor is a problem not easily solved in the rural districts. I cannot forget the sacrifices of the people of my own State, where few dwell in cities or thrive by commerce or contracts. Iowa furnished ten thousand soldiers in excess of all calls by the Government, and then in the warmth of her patriotism made a proffer of ten thousand men additional for temporary service, draining the farming districts of more than one third of their laborers.

If it be said of their achievements in campaigns and battles that they have seemingly eclipsed those of troops bred to other pursuits, it will not be attributed to superior courage or patriotism, but to muscular development and capacity for endurance which distinguishes a rural population; and I shall not waste time in proving that such a people should be encouraged in their employments; that they have a right to protection equal to any class of our citizens. None of our operatives are brought to the condition of the pauper laborer of Europe; and can Government reasonably ask the flock-master, wounded in our battles, returning home to his farm, a man of education, meeting the responsibilities of a citizen and the head of a family, to compete with nomads, the half clothed tribes of South America and South Africa who sleep in huts, subsist on tropical fruits, contributing nothing to social order and the stability of government, races who now flood our markets with wool?

These pioneer farmers have entered upon the least-favored and poorest-requited labor of American citizens; yet the vanguard of civilization, reclaiming States from the savages, and by reason of their remoteness from market, as the rule, have left little else as a heritage to their children than lands on the frontier without a cash value, and the stern virtues of a people whose daughters are to-day supplying the places of their brothers-in-arms, dropping the corn in the furrows, vying in patriotism with the youth in our universities and colleges, who have, as one man; professors and students, suspended the scanning of Virgil to scan our murderous foe; dropped their Euclid with problems unsolved, donning the soldier's uniform and seizing the gun to solve the bloody problem of war.

It is not enough that such men carry victorious banners, and that their place is assured in the hearts of a grateful people by the records of history, song, and traditional heroism. Government should recognize their service to the nation in the midst of its perils, confer honor upon industry by furnishing protection to those in States remote from the marts of trade, who, while competing with the labor of squalid hirelings, offensive barbarians, and Australian convicts, in climates which never produce men, are converting into wool and food that which, for unknown centuries, has gone to waste and been swept by fires, thus directly opening the route for that railway which is to join with bonds of iron the golden gate of the Pacific, the rich quartz mines of the Territories, the prairie farms, the forges of the mountains, and factories by the eastern shore. As legislators, that blending of sympathies becomes us which is found among our soldiers when they forget their State and locality in devotion to the common cause. Let, then, the weakest in numerical strength have just consideration. Let the poorest requited and honorable industry have protection, and every rural scene will have a well-bred flock in the foreground. Give incipient art encouragement, and if eventually enterprise and capital do not distribute their blessings in the West generously, as nature does the sunshine and the rain, we will forget localities, to devise for and rejoice in general prosperity, and cherish the regard for each other of a Joseph and a Benjamin, though one was reared in Egypt and the other in Canaan; and, until an honorable peace is attained for our bleeding country, we will war upon the enemies of liberty in the name of God:

"Still as the breeze but dreadful as the storm."

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, the importance of proper tax and tariff bills is evident. The present financial condition of the country invites our earnest attention, and every effort should be made to maintain the public credit. A fundamental error was long ago committed in enacting the system of legal tender; and the earnest convictions of many who knew better than to depart from truth and reality have been changed into faint scruples and then entirely overcome. The spectral doctrine that we can make money by printing it has superseded the dissolving views of specie payments; and the effect of all the redundancy of paper is that $100 in gold will buy national securities to the amount of $190. This is the deliberate estimate placed upon our system, our credit, our honor, and the policy we are pursuing by the capitalists of our own country and of the world.

I speak of things as they are. The national debt is increasing, and will continue to increase. We can judge of the future in no better way than by the experience of the past; and if the Secretary of the Treasury has hitherto, when the prevailing temper of the people has naturally been more sanguine and enthusiastic than it will be hereafter, found himself unable to place any larger proportion of the public debt in the shape of permanent loans; it is impossible to avoid the darkest forebodings as to the future. Every day the war continues we grow poorer and poorer; the most vigorous and energetic portion of our people, those who are best capable of productive labor, are transferred from the fields of ordinary industry to the work of mutual destruction, and their number is diminished to an extent which already has fearful results upon the actual income of the nation.

We must treat the public debt as something to be actually paid. We must treble our revenue by a well-considered system of taxation, pressing as lightly as possible upon the working and producing classes, and we must cease to inflate the currency by fictitious values. There is no subject of more essential and permanent importance to the people than this collective indebtedness. One dollar raised by taxation is, as has been said by the Secretary of the Treasury, of more real value to the country than two made as money is now supposed to be made; and the tariff should be so arranged as to yield the largest possible revenue to the country with the least possible inconvenience to the people.

When the war is over, and the enthusiasm and passion it has created and kept alive have subsided, the monument of debt will remain. It cannot be obliterated by brave words and patriotic apostrophes. The public creditor will demand that the mortgage he holds upon the bones and sinews of the producing population shall be satisfied to the last fraction. Our legislation, therefore, should tend to no inflation of prices. We should make our money go as far as we can, by no means creating artificial values and incurring liabilities to be paid when the currency will be measured by a different standard.

For my own part I do not believe it is now possible to end this war without having incurred a debt of at least $4,000,000,000. Our expenses are increasing with the rise of prices and the increased necessity of more vigorous exertions. Under the policy we have adopted no spirit of reunion with us exists in the southern confederacy. Some of its people—many of them—desire peace, but as was remarked by the honorable member from Maryland, on the other side of the House, during the present session, who knows them well, it is not peace and union but peace and disunion. They desire peace, but only with victory and triumph for themselves and defeat of our forces. Under these circumstances it is impossible to foresee how long the war will continue or what will be its ultimate cost in money or in men; but, in my judgment, the debt we shall incur cannot be less than $4,000,000,000, and may be far more.

I take it for granted that, under the policy of the Administration, we are engaged in a war of subjugation, and I assume, for the purpose of this argument, that the party at present in power will realize its wishes, will conquer and forcibly revolutionize, by external force, the whole political, social, and industrial system of the South, in direct opposition to the opinions, or, if we choose so to call them, the prejudices, most cherished by them—forming their habits and the basis of their thoughts and sentiments.

Let us calculate the cost of retaining the fruits of the victories we have yet to gain. We may be sure that we cannot compel a population numbering eight millions, and equaling ourselves in courage, determination, and all the essential elements of military character and power, to submit to the absolute control of our Government unless we have a standing army of at least three hundred thousand men. At sea we shall need a force quite as powerful as at present. Our civil list will be increased by the large number of officials necessary to collect the additional revenue required for the support of the Army and Navy. I endeavor to estimate, on the most moderate basis, the amount of our expenditure when such a peace as is sought by the majority of this House shall be attained. We shall need annually, at least, for—

The War Department.....	$300,000,000
The Navy Department.....	100,000,000
Interest on public debt, of say $3,000,000,000.....	180,000,000
Civil list, collection of revenue, foreign interest, course, and miscellaneous.....	40,000,000
Interior, pensions, Indians, &c.....	25,000,000
Total.....	$645,000,000

If the South should willingly return to the Union we shall, at least, need an army of a hundred thousand men. Taking this estimate and reducing the cost of the War Department by two thirds, there will yet remain the necessity for a revenue of $450,000,000, to be paid by taxation and duties.

As England is the only country on the globe which is cursed with so large a national debt as we shall incur before the war is ended, comparisons are often made with her as to ability to pay the principal and endure the interest. What are the facts? The real and personal property of the British Isles is stated to be $32,000,000,000. The value of the property, both real and personal, in the States of the Union which are supposed to adhere to the national Government is about $11,000,000,000, and that of the free States is little more than $9,000,000,000. By this it appears that Great Britain has three times as much property as the United States, and therefore has, in this respect, three times as much ability to pay her debt. Ultimately as our country is developed and our population augmented, the relative position will be changed, but the disparity in our present resources is even greater than this. The wealth of Great Britain is largely in manufactures and commerce, easily convertible into money and paying large revenue upon the investment. That of the United States is principally in land and in agriculture which is not easily convertible into money, and which pays but a small per cent. upon the investment. Great Britain has immense colonies in all parts of the world, whose wealth and productive industry, through the medium of her commerce and manufactures, contribute to her prosperity. If peace should now be made it would be three times more difficult for the United States to pay their debt than for Great Britain, whose statesmen and people, in consequence of the vast magnitude of the obligation, never expect to discharge its principal.

Now, sir, let us look at the interest of the respective debts. That of England is from three to three and a half, that of the United States from five to seven per cent. The interest of our debt, estimating it at even $3,000,000,000, will be $180,000,000, while the interest on the British debt is $140,000,000; in other words $180,000,000 interest money will have to be collected off our $11,000,000,000 of property, while England only collects $140,000,000 from her $32,000,000,000 of property. The burden of our interest will therefore be three times as great as that of Great Britain, whose debt in this comparison with ours appears light. For generations to come the laboring men of the United States must labor for several hours more per day. They must stint themselves and their families in necessary comforts, not to speak of accustomed and almost necessary luxuries, in order to repair the results of this deplorable war.

I have mentioned these facts because it has been too common upon the floor of this House to exaggerate the manufacturing, agricultural, and commercial resources of the country, so far as regards their ability to bear taxation with the present population, after the vast destruction which the war has produced among the most valuable classes of our producers. I know the ultimate magnitude of our resources, but no true and wise friend of his country can speak of our appalling debt as if it were an affair of trifling moment, and could be discharged as readily as it has been and yet continues to be created. I believe there is a disposition on the part of the people to sustain the Government in this war and to bear the just burdens which result from this source. It is of vital moment that this rebellion should be put down, and that the problem of self-government should be successfully solved. The revolt is an attempt on the part of the few to create a revolution against the wishes of the many. If we admit the right of secession there is an end to the Government; and if we cannot put down the rebellion this Republic will cease to occupy its proper position among the nations of the world.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the city of New York is willing to agree to any just tariff to meet the exigencies of the country. But all the communications that I have received on the subject are to the effect that the tariff should be for revenue and not prohibitory. In the tax bill I noticed some peculiar features in the imposition of taxes where taxation was injudicious. It passed from one extreme to another; from a disposition to tax lightly it rushed to inordinate and indiscriminating taxation. The same course also has been pursued in reference to this tariff bill.

I pass now to the consideration of the joint resolution in reference to the tariff which passed Congress some time since. I suppose that scarcely ever has such a spectacle been exhibited in any legislative body so free and so well disposed as this. The joint resolution raised the tariff fifty per cent. upon all articles, without regard to what effects it might produce, whom it might injure, or what it might prohibit. Some articles would bear the increased taxation; and others would not; yet this was a tariff to continue only for sixty days, and included goods in bonded warehouse and on shipboard. What is the effect of it upon goods on hand? There are large firms which, upon the first intimation that congressional action was expected, probably took from the custom-house merchandise of the value of millions and millions of dollars. They at once put up the price of these goods at rates corresponding to this new tariff of fifty per cent., although they paid no portion of the increase; while others, of smaller pecuniary means, being unable to remove their property from the warehouses upon such a brief notice, were compelled to pay the additional duty. Goods on shipboard were also subject to this increase. There is no equality or justice in such hasty action.

I object on behalf of the great interests I represent to this kind of abrupt, unstable, and temporary legislation. It creates a feeling of danger and insecurity exceedingly prejudicial to the public welfare. Impose a tariff fair and just, impose taxes which are liberal, and my constituents will submit to them cheerfully; but what I ask for them is that they shall not be subject to fluctuations in legislation which shall break up and destroy their trade.

My statements may be illustrated by reference to our action on the subject of taxing liquors on hand, a subject which is very familiar to this House. A tax of forty cents was imposed upon whisky on hand, and in conformity with the general tenor of these measures my proposal in this House to exempt foreign liquors which were in bonded warehouses or on shipboard in transitu to this country was defeated. The bill passed the House, went to the Senate, passed that body in an amended form, came back, and was returned to the Senate again. The Senate finally receded from their amendments to which we had disagreed, thus striking off the tax on domestic whisky on hand, but leaving it to operate upon imported liquors. Thus our importing merchants were compelled to pay a duty or tax of forty cents per gallon on foreign liquors on hand.

I think few enactments can be more likely to alienate important interests from the support of the constituted authorities than this system of legislation and taxation. No Government can afford to destroy or weaken the friendship of those who propose to support it, and who intend to support it honestly, fairly, justly, and liberally. The measures to which I have referred were no sooner passed than a discontented feeling was created. And now to-day that tax of forty cents on foreign liquors on hand is charged to the importers of New York, while there is none on liquors of domestic manufacture. I opposed and voted against the imposition of any tax on stock on hand. I believe it would have been far better for the Government if the House had, when the revenue bill was reported, promptly passed the bill putting a liberal tax on liquor thereafter manufactured, but leaving stock on hand untouched. We should have realized a larger revenue, for we should not have lost two months during which the bill was pending between the two Houses in the collection of additional taxes.

I have seldom thought proper to quote in this House from articles published in the newspapers. I will, however, read an extract from an article published in one of the most sound, impartial, reliable journals in this country, entirely in conformity with my own views. In speaking of this tariff resolution it says:

"The suddenness and absoluteness of this sixty days' tariff savors more of the edict of some absolute monarch than the acts of representatives of a free people. Not the least consideration is shown for the convenience of traders, although they are the parties to whom the Government has to look for its chief support. The contracts of importers are totally disregarded, and they are treated as though they had no other business than to pay the levies of arbitrary enactments. Such conduct tends to convulse and paralyze legitimate business; it goes on the supposition that merchants have no interests that ought to be respected by the Government, and that they are bound to submit to every whim and caprice of an arbitrary power without warning or redress. There is no Government in Christendom that, in these days, would be found guilty of such discourtesy and injustice toward foreign traders and the large class of domestic merchants whose interests are interwoven with foreign commerce. Such legislation is producing the most serious alarm among commercial men, and wearing their affections from a Government which they have proudly esteemed as the truest protector of commerce, because the truest representative of the people, in whom all the interests of commerce are invested."

It will be seen that there is a great deal of truth and force in the article. Now, all I ask of the House is to so adjust the tariff duties as to do justice to my region as well as to others. I am willing you should tax liberally, but to whatever extent you prohibit or prevent the importation of foreign goods to that extent you diminish the power of the foreigner to purchase the produce of this country. We injure ourselves when we injure the foreign laborer. I am willing that the tariff shall be largely increased on many articles; but I ask that you shall not tax articles on hand, and that you shall not by these sudden and violent changes affect the great interests of the country disastrously.

I trust before this session closes the House will correct much of its past legislation. If you do that, you will appeal powerfully to the support of the people of my section. The interests affected are too great to be treated hastily with immature or hostile consideration. Let us not make rash experiments where so much of the welfare of our country is at stake. We passed a measure called the gold bill because honorable members alleged this would put down the price of gold; but it ought to have been evident to every member of this House that the sale of $11,000,000 would not reduce the relative value of the precious metal. The steady increase in price is caused by the inflation of the currency, and until that is diminished the price cannot be permanently reduced. The nominal value of specie did not go down upon the passage of the gold bill, but continued to go up, and I presume that to-day it is over ninety per cent. premium.

The House took an alarm, and we sought by legislation to do that which no nation in the world has ever accomplished, to reduce the price of gold by legislation. But as gold continued to increase steadily, a sort of panic was created in the House, and the cry was, "Tariff! tariff! tariff!" "Tax! tax! tax!" This has been done indiscriminately. I ask the House to deliberate upon these questions, affecting, as they do, all the interests of the country. I trust that we shall not permit ourselves to commit injustice because gold may have gone up or down. Calm and deliberate legislation is absolutely needed in an emergency like this. I ask that we shall not legislate hastily or intemperately on any subject. But as men comprehending the great issue before the country and the great stake involved in the gigantic war on our hands, we should consider measures carefully in all their aspects, and endeavor to raise as large a revenue as possible with the least injustice to any interest.

I have no doubt that by a judicious system of internal revenue and by duties on imports we shall be able to raise in time a sufficient revenue to meet the exigencies of the country. But we shall certainly gain nothing by such a course of legislation as we have pursued for the last sixty days. Every member who will reflect one moment on the subject must see that it is far better for us to be deliberative rather than hasty, and to examine and weigh well every measure, and see what are to be its results and effects. In appealing to the House in behalf of the city of New York, I appeal to them in behalf of a city equal in population to one or two of the smaller States of the Union, and in behalf of a community that has a large and vital interest in everything affecting the preservation of the Union. That city has done everything in its power to aid the Government, and it will continue to do it whatever may be said to the contrary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to this question of taxation and tariff, there are many features in the modern policy of England, enacted there by the earnest advocacy and efforts of the middle and laboring classes, which, I think, we might advantageously adopt. My colleague, [Mr. STEBENS,] whose absence I regret, said, in substance, during his remarks on the tax bill, that he was in favor of our surrounding ourselves as with a Chinese wall, isolating ourselves from all foreign communication and commerce, and making ourselves, as it were, a self-sustaining machine. "Prohibit," said he, "the exportation of every dollar of gold and silver, of every bushel of grain and every pound of beef and pork, or adopt the policy of a prohibitory tariff." He would "hold no intercourse with foreign nations until the war was over; none whatever." In my judgment, we need all the support we can derive from every source, and none of the accustomed supplies should be cut off. We should derive all the strength we can from profitable commerce as well as agricultural and manufacturing industry. Perhaps this thought also was suggested to the mind of my colleague, for almost in the next breath he told us that we should derive $100,000,000 from such an increase of the duties on imports as would not be prohibitory. It would be a very unwise policy for us to isolate ourselves now from the rest of the world. We are in a position when we cannot well afford to lose the sympathies of the people of foreign nations, especially when so great an effort is now being made on the part of the confederate States to secure it. We should not needlessly and unprofitably alienate from ourselves the laboring and producing population of other countries.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question if he will allow me, whether, in referring to the sympathies of foreign nations, he refers to the English sympathy which this nation has experienced since the war began?

Mr. WARD. I do not refer to the sympathy of any nation in particular. I merely ask whether it is our duty or advantage to pursue an isolating and alienating policy.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman used the expression that we could not afford to dispense with the sympathy of foreign nations. I should like to know to what nation we are indebted for that sympathy.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman wants no sympathy from Great Britain or any other nation. I am free to confess that in some instances the British Government has behaved very badly toward us; but it is not clear to me that this has been the case with a majority of the people. If Great Britain and France had taken a position of open antagonism to us at the beginning of the contest it would have been very injurious. If other nations have, for a time, gone wrong, there is no reason why we should not allow them to go right. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knows very well that if those nations should now engage in a war with us, that, with the war already on our hands, would be perhaps more than we could attend to.

Mr. THAYER. I did not say that I did not wish the sympathy of foreign nations. All I asked the gentleman to do was to point to the foreign nation whose sympathies we have had in this great struggle for republican institutions since the war began. While I would be glad to have the sympathy of every free and enlightened nation in the world, I say that we are not indebted to that country which is most of all concerned in the settlement of our tariff for one grain of sympathy in our great struggle. On the contrary, she has been in the position of a public enemy of this country ever since this struggle began. I therefore ask what country the gentleman alludes to when he speaks of the sympathy to which we are indebted.

Mr. WARD. I allude to all foreign nations. Mr. THAYER. I must except, in the remarks which I have made, the empire of Russia, from which we have received some sympathy. I deny that we have received one grain of sympathy from either of those nations that are most intimately concerned in the construction of an American tariff.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, all this amounts to nothing. I am willing to concede that Great Britain has done many acts which have weakened my respect for her. Some other nations have done so, likewise. I presume no one will deny that foreign Governments have looked on this rebellion as something that would tend to break up our republican institutions. There always has been, probably, a certain amount of sympathy with the confederate States. But, in the main, foreign nations have conducted themselves fairly, with certain exceptions; while it is indisputable that if foreign nations had interfered in favor of the confederate States we should have lost them long since. What I desire to say is simply this: that we should legislate as statesmen, not as partisans; we should legislate in a manner to comprehend all the great interests of the country. Let us do justice to other nations, even though they do not do justice to us. I have yet to learn that two wrongs make one right.

As to the sympathy of foreign Powers I do not ask for it. I only ask justice, and I want to do justice. I hope Congress will rise above partisan prejudices and consider all leading questions in their broad and international aspect. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has anything more to say, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. THAYER. I have nothing more to say; for I understand the gentleman to have taken back all he said. I do not understand him now to say that we are indebted to any nation for sympathy in the great cause in which we are embarked.

Mr. WARD. The gentleman clings to the word "sympathy;" I simply mean that other nations have to a considerable extent observed a sort of neutrality which has been beneficial to our cause. We had better get rid of one war before we commence another.

Mr. THAYER. My friend hardly calls that sympathy, I presume. It is no more sympathy than the act of the thief in keeping his hand out of my pocket.

Mr. WARD. My time will not permit me to give way further to the gentleman.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman to allow me to put a question to him. I merely desire to know if he is aware of the sympathy manifested by the British manufacturers and members of the British Parliament in signing a certain pledge by which they became known as members of a southern association?

Mr. WARD. I have not seen that paper. I presume there are a great many in England whose sympathies are with the confederate States.

Mr. MORRILL. I have seen that paper.

Mr. WARD. I will be obliged to the gentleman if he will give me his authority.

Mr. MORRILL. I saw it published in the New York Times, with the names and all appended.

Mr. WARD. Whether that was so or not, this House has the common sense to perceive that it would not be prudent for this Government at present to legislate so as to lead these Governments into a more hostile condition than they now are. I think we had better devote our energies first to putting down this rebellion, and when the time comes we will adjust our difficulties with other nations, if any exist.

Now, what I understand we desire to attain in the adoption of a new tariff system in this country is to secure the most revenue in the best way, and that it should be derived as far as practicable more especially from articles of luxury; and while my friend feels great hostility to the British Government, there are still certain features in the policy of that Government which I presume he will admit we may follow to advantage so far as they are beneficial to the masses of the people. Now, in Great Britain the receipts in 1862 from customs were $120,000,000, and of that amount ninety per cent. was obtained from five or six articles, namely: coffee, tea, sugar, spirituous liquors, and tobacco, as will appear in the following statement:

The revenue of the United Kingdom in 1862 was about $355,000,000, and was derived as follows:

Customs.....	$120,000,000
Excise.....	90,000,000
Stamps.....	45,000,000
Lands and assessed taxes.....	15,000,000
Property tax.....	55,000,000
Post Office.....	18,000,000
Other receipts.....	12,000,000

Total.....$355,000,000

Of the receipts from customs ninety per cent. are obtained from six articles, namely, coffee, spirits, sugar, tea, tobacco, and wines, as will appear from the following statement:

Coffee, duty 6 cents per pound.....	$2,000,000
Spirits, duty $2 50 per gallon.....	13,000,000
Sugar, duty 3 cents per pound.....	35,000,000
Tea, duty 35 cents per pound.....	128,000,000
Tobacco, duty 75 cents per pound.....	28,000,000
Wines, duty 50 cents per gallon.....	5,000,000

Six articles.....	$109,000,000
All other articles.....	11,000,000

Total.....$120,000,000

The published accounts show some remarkable facts.

1. That of the whole revenue of $355,000,000, spirits contribute $63,000,000, or 17½ per cent.; beer contributes $30,000,000, or 8½ per cent.; tea and coffee contribute $30,000,000, or 8½ per cent.; tobacco contributes $28,000,000, or 8 per cent.; sugar contributes $33,000,000, or 9 per cent.; wine contributes $5,000,000, or 1½ per cent.; stamps contribute $45,000,000, or 12½ per cent.; income and property contribute $55,000,000, or 15½ per cent.; land tax contributes $6,000,000, or 1½ per cent.; excise, besides spirits, contributes $10,000,000, or 2½ per cent.; post office contributes $18,000,000, or 5 per cent.; assessed taxes contribute $9,000,000, or 2½ per cent.; sundries contribute $23,000,000, or 6½ per cent.

2. The whole amount of revenue is double the amount of circulation, thus disposing of an alleged necessity for a great expansion of currency in order to collect high taxes.

One of the objects of a tariff bill, as of every description of tax bill, is to realize as large an amount as can be raised on articles of luxury, to simplify the whole system, to diminish the expense of collection, prevent smuggling or illegal trade, and subject the public to as little vexation and inconvenience, as few unnecessary burdens as possible; to relieve the masses of the people as far as possible from any increased price in the necessary articles of living; but we, on the contrary, as will be noticed by this bill now before us, propose to put a tariff upon almost every article that is imported.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I hope this House will endeavor, in the course they may pursue in regard to this and every other measure affecting the revenue, to adopt such a policy as will enable me to support the bill. At the proper time I shall move some amendments to the different sections of the bill, and I hope it may be so amended as to obviate the objections which now present themselves to my mind.

ARMY NEWS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that a communication from the Secretary of War has been placed upon his table containing dispatches relative to army movements, which, if there be no objection, the Chair will have read.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

A dispatch from General Grant's headquarters, dated yesterday, June 1, at ten a. m., has been received by the War Department. It states that at "about five p. m. yesterday, Sheridan, perceiving a force of rebel cavalry at Cold Harbor, (which proved to be Fitz Lee's division,) attacked, and after a hard fight, routed it, together with Clingman's brigade of infantry, which came to Lee's support."

"Sheridan remained in possession of the place. He reported at dark that he had a considerable number of prisoners, and that there were many rebel dead and wounded on the field. He was ordered to hold the position, and at ten p. m. the sixth corps set out to occupy it."

"We have not yet heard from Wright or Sheridan this morning, and do not know whether the former has got his troops to their destination. Smith must be close upon Wright's column."

"This morning the enemy was also moving a heavy column in the same direction. The order has just gone to Warren to fall upon their flank."

"Wilson had a fight last evening near Hanover Court-House with Young's brigade of rebel cavalry. He routed Young, killing and capturing many; but there has been a good deal of artillery firing in that direction this morning."

"Warren reported last night that in his fight of Monday afternoon near Bethesda Church, Colonel Tyrrell, of the thirteenth Virginia, and Colonel Willis, commanding Pegram's brigade, (rebs,) were killed, Colonel Christian, of the forty-ninth Pennsylvania, was wounded and captured; so was the assistant adjutant general of Ramsey's brigade—name not reported. Ten other commissioned officers were captured and seventy privates. Sixty rebels were buried on the field."

"In our center, Burnside reports his advanced line as being this morning within a mile and a half of Mechanicsville."

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor. Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the gentleman from New York will yield me the floor, as it is but eight minutes of the time for taking a recess, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I yield the floor for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that I understand there is no gentleman who desires to speak upon the tariff bill except the gentleman from New York who has the floor. The gentleman will understand, therefore, that the evening session will be for the purpose of transacting business.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to instructions, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LAND GRANT TO MINNESOTA.

Mr. WINDOM, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill making an additional grant of land to the State of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of railroads in the said State; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. WADSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to Colonel J. W. McHenry the mileage of a member for one session, and the monthly pay from the beginning of this session to date, as compensation for contesting the seat of Hon. GEORGE H. YEAMAN.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the resolution so as to include Judge Birch.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was then referred to the Committee of Elections.

GOLD BILL.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 106, to prohibit certain sales of gold and foreign exchange, with a view to moving an amendment, having it printed, and its further consideration postponed to another day.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not object to the printing of the amendment, but I do object to taking the bill up out of its order.

The proposed amendment, by unanimous consent, was ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE, of New York. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow has been set apart for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia; but as the tariff bill will consume all of this week, I move that that business be postponed till the day after that fixed for reports from the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CARLISLE DOBLE.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, moved to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution No. 40, for the relief of Carlisle Doble.

The motion was agreed to.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NAHUM WARD.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution to refer the claim of Nahum Ward back to the Court of Claims.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

It now being half past four o'clock p. m., the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House, at half past seven o'clock, p. m., resumed its session.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the bankrupt bill, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] was entitled to the floor.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the question before the committee was the tariff bill, on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, it is quite impossible to say anything new on the general principles involved in this bill. I think if there is any subject of legislation that has been exhausted it is this one. Not only in this country, but in every commercial nation of Europe, the theories governing tariffs or of collecting duties on imports have been the subject of mature investigation, deliberation, and concern. England especially has paid a great deal of attention to these questions. In the debates of the Twenty-Seventh Congress, when the tariff was under discussion, reference was made to the care with which England always approached the consideration of any proposed alteration or modification of its tariff. So cautious is Parliament that Mr. Hume, of the House of Commons, for the purpose of gathering information bearing on the different interests to be affected by a tariff, instituted a special committee for a thorough investigation into all the interests, manufacturing, agricultural, and commerce, to be affected. The information then obtained was used as a basis on which to frame a judicious law. In this country until within the last two years no attempt has been made to make any alteration in a measure of this character without proceeding with extraordinary deliberation and care. Ever since the Federal Government had authority to collect duties on imports, which was given by the present Constitution, all the revenue, except what has been derived from public lands, has been obtained from this source. We have until within three years supported the Government altogether in this way. We have built this Capitol and the costly Government structures throughout the country, borne the expenses of the wars, that of 1812, the war with Mexico, the Indian wars, the acquisitions of territory, the purchase of Louisiana and Florida, the purchase from Mexico by which we acquired California and our Pacific possessions; and the other immense expenditures from 1789 down to the present time have been procured from a revenue created in this way.

And hence, sir, in the consideration of the various revenue bills which have from time to time been adopted, the subject has commanded the ablest intellects. As was said here to-day in the debate upon this subject between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] that Calhoun upon the one side and Webster upon the other (probably two of the greatest statesmen known to the legislative history of this country) changed positions on the tariff question; in consequence, doubtless, so far as Mr. Webster was concerned, of the change of local influences and interests of his section. When New England had her interest in navigation and importations exclusively, she was opposed to a high tariff because it was supposed that it would restrict the commerce and trade of that section. But when the manufacturing interest predominated, her interest changed, and very naturally the views of her public men changed. I have no complaint to make of that. I repeat that the very best intellects this country has ever produced have fully exhausted all the principles and theories that can be conceived or invented with reference to this question. Therefore I assert it is impossible to say anything new, it is impossible to advance a single original idea upon this subject; and certainly I have not the temerity to make the attempt.

But, sir, representing, as I do, a commercial constituency, I have felt bound to say something upon this subject, and I therefore have examined with some degree of care the details of the bill which is now before the committee for its action. Bills of this character are either for protection or for revenue. If for revenue and protection together, it is a very nice question of adjustment. If the object be to derive income, and to so regulate the duty proposed to be imposed upon any specific article to accomplish that object, the calculation is nice, and requires practical ability, information derived from men whose practical professions and avocations give them peculiar personal knowledge with reference to the article upon which it is proposed to impose the duty.

If the object be protection exclusively, there again you require particular information. If you want to protect home industry a variety of questions arises. It will not do to advocate any measure that is proposed to protect a particular branch of industry, nor will it do to propose any measure that will in itself favor any particular section of country at the expense of the other. Other interests besides manufacturing have a right to the care and protection of the Government, provided it is the legitimate function of the Government to travel out of its way for the purpose of protecting private interests or interfering with them at all either to their advantage or disadvantage, which I for one entirely disavow. But if your object be protection, I contend that you must protect equally all branches of private interests; that agriculture must not suffer in your efforts to protect manufactures; and that commerce and navigation and the trading interests, mainly important to this great country, and upon which we have heretofore relied for our support and the development of our great and varied resources, and which have so far furnished the entire revenue until this war, should not be sacrificed for the purpose of aiding the other two.

Therefore I repeat, that if you propose to pass a bill of this character, it requires the utmost care and calculation, and the most delicate adjustment of the interests to be affected.

Is the object prohibition? It has been said here by gentlemen, in the discussion of the various bills of this character in this House during this session, that it was desirable that the Government should prohibit these extraordinary importations. It has been argued here at times that the only way to check the advancing price of gold was to check the importation of foreign merchandise. Associations of great magnitude, patronized by high functionaries, are being formed now in this country, having for their avowed object the curtailment, by non-consumption, of some articles which pay a heavy interest to your Government. Therefore, sir, I repeat that in levying imposts, there is not only the question of revenue to be considered, not only the question of our home interests to be considered, but there is this greater question, which is entirely new in the polity of this Government, to be considered, that of prohibiting entirely by the imposition of extraordinary duties the importation of a particular class of articles.

Now, this bill—although I think it has been printed only about forty-eight hours—has already been examined by practical men in the city of New York—practical men, importing merchants whose interests will be directly affected, and who have extraordinary facilities for the investigation of bills of this character.

I will now ask the Clerk to read an extract from the Shipping and Commercial List of New York, a paper of an entirely non-partisan character, and that never contains a word of politics of any kind, name, or nature in its columns.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The least that can be said concerning the new tariff bill is that it fails altogether to meet the public expectation. We have not devoted much attention to its examination ourselves as yet, but we have seen enough of it to warrant us in indorsing the verdict of the mercantile public that it is an abortion, and in asserting, without fear of contradiction, that almost any half dozen intelligent New York merchants could, in five days, frame a bill eminently better calculated to meet the requirements of the Government and the public expectation than the miserable conglomeration which is now put forth as the fruit of a five months' deliberation on the part of Congress.

"This may seem like rather strong language, but it must be considered that in view of the painful situation of our national affairs, the immense issues of paper money, and its consequent great depreciation, and of the fact that the country has looked to Congress with the confident expectation that it would provide ways and means for carrying the war to a successful issue, and at the same time provide for a contraction of the currency and a gradual extinction of the national debt, something a little more commensurate with the requirements of the times was to have been expected of our national Representatives. The tariff and tax bills have been looked to during all these months as the predestined source of relief from all our financial troubles; and the public impatience has meantime been repressed by the vain hope that Congress would grasp the subject in its full scope, and that the result of their labors would prove satisfactory to the general public. And yet the crudeness of the tariff bill just published appears to be even more apparent than almost any of its predecessors. In the free list, which many people looked to see almost wholly done away with, are contained many articles which could far better afford to pay a higher rate of duty than many other articles, the duty on which has been doubled. Among these we may cite indigo. Can any one tell why this article should not pay a duty commensurate with its value as an article of merchandise? The mercantile public confidently expected that a pretty heavy tariff would be laid on foreign fruits, &c., &c.; instead of which they are either left on the free list or come in at the old rates, while it is well known that they would easily bear a moderately heavy tax. Many other crudities might be cited, but these are sufficient to indicate the general character of the new tariff bill, which it has taken Congress over five months to bring forth.

"There is much doubt as to whether the bill is really a new bill, or the old one revised. If it is a new bill, then very many articles on which duties have hitherto been paid, and of which there is no mention made in the bill, are included in the free list; but if it is the old bill revised, they are left untouched, and, of course, come under the old rates; while a great proportion of them would bear an addition of fifty per cent. to the duties hitherto paid. The expectation that a large revenue would accrue to the Government from this source is destined to be disappointed if the bill becomes a law, and it undoubtedly will, unless some steps be immediately taken to arrest its progress. We would suggest that hereafter, whenever the consideration of any such important measure touching commerce and trade as the revision of the tariff bill may be rendered necessary, the New York Chamber of Commerce, or a committee of merchants from each of the principal cities, be consulted, with a view of obtaining the benefit of their mercantile knowledge and experience. We respectfully suggest that the country has had quite enough of the loose kind of legislation now in vogue, and the sooner Congress makes haste to retract its steps the better it will be for its own reputation and the country at large. It may not be too late even now to induce Congress to ignore the major part of the recommendations of the Committee of Ways and Means, and it would be well for the Chamber of Commerce to put forth the endeavor to procure a revision of the new bill before action shall have been taken upon it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, these views are the views of the entire mercantile interest of the city of New York. I repeat, and I challenge contradiction, that the views expressed in the slip of paper which the Clerk has just read, taken from the great commercial paper of the country, having no political bias whatever, and never having contained a paragraph or a word on any political subject, are the views of all the men in this country who are capable of giving a disinterested opinion upon questions of this character. Sir, I acquit the distinguished member of the Committee of Ways and Means who has charge of this bill, [Mr. MORRILL,] of any design to propose any measure that is not in his judgment for the true interests of the country; but I complain that in the formation of a bill of this kind the committee should have abstained from calling to their aid the information which only practical experienced men could give them, and that relying upon their book knowledge, upon their investigation of previous tariff bills, and upon the speeches of men who have dealt in theories and not in facts, instead of doing what English statesmen have always done under similar circumstances, have given us a bill, which, as has been properly stated in the extract which has been read, is an exceedingly crude and improper measure.

Now, if revenue is the object, why is there so large a free list?

Mr. MORRILL. I merely desire to say that more gentlemen representing the commercial interests of New York have appeared before the Committee of Ways and Means during the present session than those representing any other interest.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I have no doubt that particular individuals, whose individual interests are to be affected, have appeared before that committee to protect themselves. But I would ask whether the committee have called to their aid the leading and disinterested retired merchants of New York, and whose individual interests are not to be affected by the passage of your bill. They have not sought information of that character from that class of persons who could give them not only a disinterested opinion but judicious counsel.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say, in response to the gentleman from New York, that the present bill is based upon the bill of 1861. When that bill was framed, gentlemen from all parts of the country were here, some of them voluntarily and some of them by invitation of the Committee of Ways and Means. As suggested in my remarks upon this bill to-day, the Committee of Ways and Means have no power to summon gentlemen from abroad, or to ask them to come here except at their own expense. It is not to be expected that they will do that. If we had the power, I admit that it would be of incalculable service to the Committee of Ways and Means to summon gentlemen from all parts of the country, including the gentleman's constituents, and to put them upon their oaths in relation to these matters. I believe it would be better for the country if we had that power. But in framing this bill, it was only intended to make an increase of duties on such articles as becomes necessary in consequence of the operation of the internal revenue bill.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman admits that so far as this bill is concerned, the Committee of Ways and Means has not sought the information which, in my judgment, it should have sought.

Mr. MORRILL. I beg pardon of the gentleman again. The Committee of Ways and Means has sought information from various individuals, but not extending over the whole country as it would have done if it had the power.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I understand the gentleman entirely. He says that on a previous occasion the Committee of Ways and Means did seek information, but that on the present occasion it has had voluntary information from gentlemen who could afford to pay their own expenses in coming here to influence the action of the committee. Outside of them the committee has not sought information.

Mr. MORRILL. Again I beg the gentleman's pardon. The committee has sought information to some extent outside of them; and gentlemen have been brought here to give the committee information.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. I regret if the Committee of Ways and Means has sought the information, that it has not sought it in quarters capable of giving it good advice. I assume that the Committee of Ways and Means is earnestly desirous that Congress shall pass a tariff bill, and that it has attempted to frame one for the purposes of revenue. Do I understand that to be the object of the bill? I wait for a reply.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated, and think the repetition unnecessary, that we have raised the duties on imported goods wherever it became necessary in consequence of our action on the internal revenue bill, and, in addition to that, wherever we thought any considerable amount of revenue would be obtained.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is not entirely frank in his reply. Is it a bill for revenue or not? I desire an answer to that one question.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I think I have been perfectly frank. The bill is for the purpose of revenue. We could not obtain the revenue from the internal duties unless we had put an equivalent tax on imported goods.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Very well, sir. Then if it be a bill for revenue I think it is really open to the objection made to it to-day by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] with this addition, that it omits entirely duty upon almost every article that enters into New England cotton manufactures. They remain, as under existing tariffs, on the free list, while it proposes that all articles that enter into the employment and consumption of agriculturists and of the commercial and trading communities shall bear increased duties. If revenue be the object, why is it that the article indigo, the importation of which amounts to millions and millions of dollars into the port of the city of New York alone every year, is exempt from any duty whatever? Not only is that the case, in regard to indigo, which is exclusively used in the cotton manufactures of New England, but barrilla, madder, sumac, and dye-woods of all kinds, numbering some ten or twelve different classes, which are used to make different dyes and colors, and are used almost exclusively in the manufacturing institutions of the country, are on the free list; while iron of every character and kind, an article that enters into the necessities of husbandry, in ship-building, and indeed in almost all the pursuits of life, is very heavily taxed under this bill. I repeat, if the object of the bill be revenue, why is it that importations, amounting to millions and millions per annum, of a peculiar kind of foreign products pay no duty whatever? The same may be said of spices, fruits, and other articles of luxury, on which the proposed increase is either nothing at all or very small.

Then, sir, with reference to foreign fruits, an article of luxury of which there is a large consumption and a large importation, the duty is not raised at all.

I have no doubt that if the Committee of Ways and Means, with the practical information they have before them now, would take up the various lists of articles that are imported into the various collection districts of the country, and frame a bill exclusively for revenue, without thinking of the protection of particular articles or particular classes of industry, they would produce a bill which, in my judgment, would produce double the amount which this bill will, without any detriment to the country whatever.

But, sir, there are other objections to this bill. The fourteenth section, as well as the fifteenth, introduces a new principle in the legislation of the country. It says, in substance, that an importer who is aggrieved by the decision of the collector of the port of New York shall have no redress aside from the right to appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury. But if the appeal is not made within a limited period there is no redress whatever. He cannot go to the courts for redress.

It is the first time in the history of the legislation of the country, the first time even in the extraordinary legislation of the last two years, that such a principle has been introduced into any bill proposed in either House of Congress.

Let me illustrate. I am an importing merchant in the city of New York. I receive a cargo of wine, or any other article of merchandise which pays an ad valorem duty. The ad valorem duty is regulated by the invoice, or cost price at port of exportation, the invoice properly certified according to all the requirements of law. My entries are made at the custom-house. My invoices are sworn to and everything is regular. The collector of the port, through caprice or ignorance, takes exception. The collectors at that port are sometimes lawyers, although, in my judgment, they should invariably be merchants. I say through ignorance or through caprice, or from some motive, the collector says my invoice is a false invoice, and that the duty should not be collected upon it. An appraisement is made, and fifty or one hundred per cent. is added to the invoice value. I have no recourse; my goods may have been seized, or if I pay, say under protest, I am denied the usual judicial remedies. I cannot prove the correctness of my invoice without sending to a foreign port; the testimony is out of the way. In the mean time weeks and months elapse, and the period covered by the limit of time in this bill is passed.

I repeat that it is the first time it has been attempted by Congress to pass an act which substantially and in effect virtually would prevent an aggrieved party from seeking a judicial remedy.

Again, it will be recollected that in March, I think it was, Congress passed a resolution imposing an additional duty of fifty per cent. upon all imported goods. Without any notice to the importer, without any notice to this House, and without notice, I believe, to some members of the Committee of Ways and Means, the joint resolution was precipitated upon the House, immediately to take effect, imposing this large addition upon all duties under the existing law.

It was said to be a necessary "war measure," and of course it became a law. It was defended here on the principle that the highwayman seeks his prey on the road, "Your purse or your life." But as extraordinary necessities may require a resort to this extraordinary species of legislation, I cannot complain. It only becomes necessary for me, in reference to this bill, to refer to the fact.

Now, sir, under the operation of that joint resolution the merchants and importers in this country everywhere have bonded their goods, so far as practicable. Instead of paying the additional duty, or any duty imposed by the operation of this law, they have preferred to put their goods in bonded warehouses and hold them until the expiration of the sixty days, the period for which the joint resolution is operative, in the expectation that this law may relieve them from these extraordinary additional burdens. Well, sir, they were right in doing that. In the various tariff bills which heretofore have been passed in this country there is not a single exception where goods in bonded warehouses have not been protected. That has been the policy of this country and of every other country as far as I know. As early as March, 1861, when a similar question arose, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Chase, issued a circular, reaching a case analogous to this, in which he said:

"The same privilege will be extended to all merchandise in public store, unclaimed on the 1st proximo, when entered for consumption or warehousing in pursuance of law; and all merchandise in warehouse under bond on the 1st proximo will be entitled to entry for withdrawal at rates of duty now existing, or if the rates of duty on the merchandise are lessened by the tariff of 1861, the entry thereof may, at the option of the importer or owner, be made at the lesser rates."

Mr. Chairman, in this connection, as directly pertinent to this question, I will read an extract from a letter which I received yesterday from the very largest importing house in this country:

New York, May 31, 1864.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty to address you in regard to the new tariff proposed to go in operation after July 1st next. Under the present tariff, with the fifty per cent. extra duties for two months from April 30 last, a good many goods are warehoused in the expectation that they can be withdrawn after July 1, at the rates charged under the expected tariff. At least such privilege has so far always been given whenever a tariff was altered, and a clause to that effect has been inserted in the tariff bill. Some parties, however, pretend that under the law being made now, such a privilege would not be granted, and that goods being bonded between May 1 and July 1 would have to pay the fifty per cent. extra duties no matter when withdrawn. As this would work to great disadvantage to the parties concerned, in fact would be imposing a fine on parties who are utterly enough to have imported goods during these two months, (which must of necessity be the case with almost every regular importing house.) I take the liberty to call your attention to this matter and transmit you a circular of the Secretary of the Treasury of March 20, 1861, the contents of which if inserted in the new tariff law will protect the interests of the importer.

Very respectfully yours,

HOB. FERNANDO WOOD, Washington City.

Mr. Chairman, my object in these extracts is for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that in my opinion this bill carefully avoids protection to bonded goods coming in since its adoption of the joint resolution. If I am right in this construction of the nineteenth section, we should not tolerate legislation of that character. At the proper time it will be my duty to offer an amendment that will remedy this omission.

Now, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding what I have said in reference to the interests of the importer, I think I am justified in saying that it is stability of legislation that the importing interest requires more than anything else. They want to know upon what to depend. They want all laws regulating the banking and commercial interests of the country established permanently, so that they may pursue their business with some reliance on the future. It is impossible for any man transacting any business of this character in this country at this time under this species of legislation to tell anything about his interests or property; ay, sir, or his life or liberty.

It is this instability of legislation and imbecility of administration that is destroying this great and glorious country. Look at this House. Take our proceedings on the gold question. Suddenly one fine morning the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rose and reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the gold on hand. It threw the city of New York into a state of excitement, because what affects gold affects not only the value of the Government's irredeemable currency, but also the value of all merchandise, labor, exchange, and directly the importing interests of the country.

Mr. MORRILL. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman from New York, but I must insist that the discussion shall be confined to the pending bill. The gold bill is not now before the House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It has direct connection with this question. After we discussed that measure here one or two days the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rose in his place and asked that the bill should be recommended. Of course the House consented to it. It was taken back into committee, and we were told next day that the committee disagreed entirely on the subject, and we thought we had heard the last of it until my colleague, [Mr. STEBBINS,] who is a member of that committee, suddenly reported the bill again. The belief was that it would reserve in the sinking fund gold to pay the interest on the public debt, but such was not the case. The bill was forced through under the pretext that it was necessary to depress the price of gold.

Again, in reference to the joint resolution increasing the tariff to which I have referred, I made an effort to protect goods already imported and in bonded warehouses. It was voted down at the instance of the gentleman, but it was not a fortnight afterwards when the Senate adopted the proviso I had attempted to ingraft on the resolution, and it passed this House unanimously. It is vacillation like this; the continual change of policy; that has characterized the legislation of the country. It has been manifested in the prosecution of the war, it has been manifested in the execution of your laws, and flagrantly and corruptly manifested in the various departments of the Government for the last three years.

Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition in a debate of this character to allude to political matters. The session is near its close, and every moment should be devoted to necessary business.

So far as I am personally concerned, I believe I have occupied but a small portion of the attention of this House. I have rarely attempted to introduce any extraneous subjects whatever; but when a bill of this character, directly affecting the home policy of the country, is proposed, when we are asked to raise a revenue of $100,000,000 from my constituents, when I attempt to show that by your wrong legislation and by your extravagant policy measures of this kind become necessary, I am told it is necessary for me to confine the discussion to the bill immediately under consideration. The bill is to be discussed by details under the minute rule, and I had supposed that this anticipatory debate was to deal with the general principles and questions appertaining to the bill in its general character and features. It would be legitimate to discuss the war upon this bill, because but for this war this bill would not be here. It would be legitimate to discuss the conduct of this war, the weakness and folly with which the war has been prosecuted, and the popular errors pervading the land, affecting not only this country, but liberty throughout the civilized world.

Mr. Chairman, I am earnestly desirous that this bill, if it be necessary for the purposes of the Government, may be rectified of its various and manifest errors. If we are to have a revenue I want all interests to contribute: I do not want the agricultural interests of the country to pay all the taxes, or to pay any more than other interests pay. I want duties imposed for revenue and not for protection at all. I believe the manufacturers of this country can protect themselves; I believe that circumstances alone will protect them; I believe cotton manufacturers are amassing fortunes upon fortunes out of this war, and I do not believe it is necessary for the Government to interfere in their behalf, and add to the immense wealth they have accumulated during the last few years.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, desirous that the imperfections of this bill may be amended, and hoping that the gentlemen who have charge of it will, at the proper time, upon the different sections as they come up, lend an ear to any suggestions we may make, and desirous, personally, to contribute my feeble aid toward the perfection of a judicious measure, which shall be just and proper not only to the Government but to all the interests to be affected by it, I am very sure it will give me pleasure to vote for it if it shall be so framed and amended as to meet the approbation of my judgment.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not rise to make a speech, nor did I design to make any remarks; but I have a word or two to say, suggested by the remarks made by the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat. He has asked several times what this tariff was designed for. In my judgment it was designed for two things: to raise a revenue and to protect domestic industry. If it fails in either of those objects, it fails in its legitimate purpose.

Mr. Chairman, we are bound to put upon the people large burdens if we intend to carry on this war and pay the expenses of it. This Congress has that unpleasant duty assigned to it. Those burdens are to be placed in the shape of excises—which you may call direct taxes upon personal property—and duties upon imports laid for the same purpose of raising revenue and paying expenses. At the present time about three hundred millions are required, and at a future time no doubt more will be required. In some way that has to be raised; and I pray gentlemen who can easier find fault than correct an error—gentlemen who can easier pull down than build up—to tell us how this is to be raised; to tell us where it is to come from; or to say frankly that they do not wish it to come from any quarter, because they do not wish to sustain the Government. Let them tell us one or the other of these things. If they are for sustaining the Government, for carrying on the war, and discharging the public obligations, let them tell us how to do it if they find fault with our system of taxation, by internal taxes upon foreign importations. I know of no other way.

The burden of internal taxes which are to be laid upon the people will, in any event, be more than two thirds of the whole. It will be three fourths of the whole; for every dollar that we raise by imports we shall raise three dollars by excise. Now, how are you to raise your income? Under your internal revenue law there are various small sources from which you derive some revenue, but, according to my estimation, more than two thirds of the whole is to be raised from the manufactures of the country. And when gentlemen know that two thirds of this vast amount required to sustain the Government is to be a burden upon the manufacturing interests, will they seriously complain of that protection which we give to those people for the purpose of enabling them to carry on their business? If you do not protect these interests it would be impossible to raise these large sums. They could not pay them, for their establishments would go down, and that large revenue under the internal tax law, amounting, as I understand it will, to the sum of $150,000,000, will be lost. And yet I hear gentlemen across the way complaining that the dyestuffs which are used in Massachusetts—and it is because they are used in Massachusetts, and she has been guilty of the unpardonable sin of being from the first, and consistently, a supporter of universal liberty, so odious to gentlemen on the other side of the House—are not subject to a prohibitory tax, or so burdened that the manufacturers must necessarily go down.

The gentlemen opposite complain that this bill is "crude and defective." I have heard these words "crude and defective" used in regard to this bill often. I am a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. I do not attempt to vindicate its action from the criticism of the very learned gentleman who uses such epithets, without telling us in what respect the bill is crude or defective.

I understood the gentleman from New York to say that we had not provided for goods in bonded warehouses. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I said that this bill did not protect goods now in the bonded warehouses imported since the passage of the joint resolution. I know that they are under the existing tariff.

Mr. STEVENS. That shows that so "crude" was this bill, according to the gentleman's idea, that he sickened and nauseated at it before he got through reading it, and that he did not read the nineteenth section.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I did read the nineteenth section; I read it two or three times, and tried very hard to understand it in connection with previous sections of the bill; and, sir, I reached the conclusion that even the ingenuity of the gentleman himself, or of the Secretary of the Treasury, could not construe that section so as to protect goods imported since the passage of that joint resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. The resolution provides that all goods, wares, and merchandise which may be in public stores on the day aforesaid, (that is to say, on the 1st July), shall be subject to no other duties than the entry thereof. The gentleman knows that is a technical term.

I did not say the gentleman could not understand that; I only said that plain provision was there, and there it is. I have read it, and every other member of the House does understand it, I presume.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. This is an exceedingly important reference, and I shall be very happy indeed to find that I have been mistaken. But, as I understand the nineteenth section of the bill, it protects the goods imported after "that day." I understand "that day" to be the day referred to in the previous section, which designates the time at which this law is to be operative, 1st day of July, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Well, if imported after that day they cannot be contracted, although already imported and in bonded warehouses.

Mr. STEVENS. Any goods in bonded warehouses on the 1st day of July, when they are entered for consumption, will pay the same duty as if they were imported the day after. I did not like that provision myself, but it was the decision of the committee.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania excuse me one moment?

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the construction of the gentleman's colleagues and of the Treasury Department will concur with the construction he now gives it. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means construed his joint resolution some time since to protect goods in bond; but the Secretary of the Treasury did not so construe it, and the two distinguished gentlemen differed as to the construction of the law which the gentleman himself framed. I hope there will be no difference in this case.

Mr. STEVENS. I can no more make the Secretary of the Treasury know and understand it right than I can make the gentleman from New York. But we at once told the Secretary of the Treasury what it did mean, and it was just as plain as this.

Now, I said before that with respect to manufactures from which two thirds and I think three fourths of the whole revenue is to be derived, the question is whether they are to be protected and whether you are to enable them to manufacture so largely as to produce this amount of taxation. If you break them up you lose that whole large amount which we are desirous to raise. And how are you to enable them to go on and do their business unless you favor them in two ways? Those things that cannot be produced in this country, and the introduction of which free of duty does not affect domestic industry, and which enter as essential parts into the manufacturing establishments of the nation—such as dye-stuffs and chemicals—must be admitted free of duty. How else can you possibly enable manufacturers to compete with European labor? The bill was framed in that view. And for a statesman to tell me that these are the articles to raise a few hundred thousands of revenue on, and to exclude $150,000,000 of revenue by the very fact, looks to me as being as crude as the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, that is one of the reasons why these things are left free. But as we have raised the tax almost one half on this important and productive industry of the country, it becomes us to take care that the place of these manufactures shall not be taken and filled by foreign fabrics. It becomes us to take care that while we are asking manufacturers to pay $150,000,000 a year on the net proceeds of their labor we shall not let the pauper labor of Germany, France, and England supply our market with goods, and fill up all the places that ought to be left open to our own manufactures, and on which foreign goods we could not raise more than $80,000,000. That was the distinct object we had in framing this bill.

I know how easy it is for newspaper editors, who have never attempted to frame a bill, who have never worked day and night for a session, to get up a tax bill and a revenue bill. I know how easy it is for such sciolists as the gentleman from New York to tell us that after six months nothing has been produced but a crude tax bill and a crude revenue bill. But let them produce something themselves. When they are attempting to destroy these things let them show their ingenuity and their ripe scholarship in these matters, which will do credit to the country, and which I will not call crude, whatever it may be. Are we here for no other purpose but to growl and grumble, and find fault with those who are attempting, according to the best of their humble abilities, to do those things which would support the country, at the least burden to the interests that are least able to bear it?

Sir, I do not find fault; the committee do not find fault; the distinguished gentleman who has charge of this bill does not find fault. He has a name for skill, industry, and talents which will go down to posterity with this very legislation when all the rest of us are unknown ten days after our death. Therefore neither he nor we have in any case found fault with the criticisms that are passed upon us. But there is one thing I do complain of: I do complain that in this day of our trouble, that in this day when the effort of every man who loves his country is required to put down the rebellion, men should attempt to make political capital by arraying section against section, by complaining of one particular portion of the country and attempting to raise hostility in another portion toward it, when every portion ought to be united and act together as a single man. He who in this time will pursue such a course of argument for the mere purpose of party can never hope to be ranked among statesmen; nay, sir, he will not even rise to the dignity of a respectable demagogue. I move that the committee rise. [Laughter.]

Mr. ODELL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the motion for the purpose of enabling me to ask a single question.

Mr. STEVENS. I will withdraw it.

Mr. ODELL. The nineteenth section of this bill, to which reference has been made by my colleague and the distinguished gentleman himself, does not use the words "bonded warehouse." It simply says "public store." My attention has been called to it from the fact that a number of importers have written to me to know whether it was the intention of this bill to make that expression cover bonded warehouses.

Mr. STEVENS. Several of the authorities hold them to be the same. When the Government declares them to be in public storehouse, all in bonded warehouses are covered by the expression. However, to avoid any difficulty on the part of the distinguished gentleman from New York and the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, I propose at the proper time to move to amend, by putting in the words "bonded warehouses."

Mr. ODELL. The gentleman will have no difficulty with the gentleman from New York, but in the city of New York, among the merchants there, the term "public store" is an expression of particular significance, always meaning among the merchants there simply the appraiser's stores. Hence the inquiry was suggested by the merchants as to the meaning of the term in this section.

Mr. STEVENS. The definition known to the authorities of "public store" is any place where goods are in public warehouses.

Mr. ODELL. The explanation is perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. STEVENS. I renew the motion that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SCHENCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

E. F. AND S. A. WOOD.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the joint resolution (H. R. No. 85) repealing the act entitled "An act for the relief of E. F. and Samuel A. Wood," assigned as a special order for to-day at the morning hour.

The joint resolution was read. It repeals the act passed during the present session authorizing the issue of duplicate bonds of the Oregon war debt claimed to have been lost.

Mr. HALE. I am informed by the gentleman who had this bill in charge that the bonds issued to these particular parties have not been found. Other bonds have been found, but these particular ones have not been. I therefore hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to have it postponed?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. STEVENS. The bonds provided for in the act which this joint resolution is to repeal were lost in the steamer Golden Gate. Some of these bonds have been recovered, and have been presented at the Department. The mail of that steamer was, I believe, all recovered. If my colleague, however, desires to have the resolution postponed, and will name the day, I will not object.

Mr. HALE. I will suggest this day week.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was postponed for one week, and continued as a special order after the morning hour.

BUSINESS ON THE SPEAKER'S TABLE.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know whether there is anything requiring immediate action on the Speaker's table, but I suppose we might as well dispose of what there is. I move to go to the business on the Speaker's table.

The motion was agreed to; and the bills on the Speaker's table were accordingly taken up in their order, and disposed of as indicated.

FRIENDLESS WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

House bill No. 383, to incorporate a home for friendless women and children, with amendments of the Senate thereto, was taken from the Speaker's table, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

RHODA WOLCOTT.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was House bill No. 290, for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, returned from the Senate with the following amendment:

Strike out the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to issue to Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, deceased, who was a private in the company of "New York United States detached militia" of the regiment commanded by Colonel Thomas B. Benedict, a certificate of pension, which shall grant to the said Rhoda Wolcott a pension of four dollars per month, commencing on the 24th day of December, 1812, the time of the decease of said Henry Wolcott, and to continue during the natural life of the said Rhoda Wolcott: Provided, however, That in the event of the marriage or death of the said Rhoda Wolcott the said pension shall cease: Also provided, That all pledges or mortgages of the said pension shall be void, and that the said pension shall inure solely to the use and benefit of the said Rhoda Wolcott.

And in lieu thereof insert as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, who was a private in a company of New York United States detached militia of the regiment commanded by Colonel Thomas B. Benedict, in the war of 1812, on the pension roll at the rate of four dollars a month, said pension to begin on the 1st day of January, 1861, and to continue during her widowhood.

Mr. KERNAN. I move that the amendment of the Senate be non-concurred in, so that the whole subject may go to a committee of conference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that the gentleman's motion will not be adopted, but that on the contrary the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in. It conforms to the uniform practice of the Government up to within the last one or two years, that of paying the pension from the time the application was made, and not from the time the injury occurred which is the foundation of the pension. It seems to me to be safer to pursue the old practice, which has been adhered to for so many years, than to go back beyond the period of the application.

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman from Indiana correctly states the difference between the original bill and the amendment of the Senate. Yet I shall regret if it turns out that this widow will only get a pension of four dollars a month from the 1st of January, 1861. The papers sent to this House from the Pension Office show that the only reason for rejecting her claim at that office was that a captain, who is proved to have been an intemperate man, omitted to make some entry upon the muster-roll. I was not before the committee, and do not know all of the facts precisely, and only take an interest in this bill because the widow lives in my district.

I want the case to go to a committee of conference for examination, and to see whether this woman has not been entitled to this pension for some fifteen or twenty years. She is now seventy years of age, and a pension in the future would last but a few years. It may be that the Senate will be willing to allow a pension back to the time that the application has been pending in the Pension Office.

Mr. HOLMAN. When was the application made for this pension to the Pension Office?

Mr. KERNAN. I think that they would allow it for the time that the application has been pending in the Pension Office. I have not examined it, but I am told that it has been there for eight or ten years. I have moved that it be referred to a committee of conference, to see whether it is not proper to allow her a pension for that time. She is an ignorant woman, without friends to look after this matter; and I hope that the amendment of the Senate will be non-concurred in, so that she will get paid at least from the time her application was pending in the Pension Office. If she had had friends to look after it she would have had it long since.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. If it be in order I move that the bill and amendment be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions. If the bill allows the pension to run back to 1812, then it is different from what the committee intended. Our rule always has been to make the pension begin at the date of the application here.

Mr. KERNAN. Is the gentleman a member of that committee?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I am, and I want the bill to go there for examination.

Mr. KERNAN. I should prefer to have it go to a committee of conference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. It was never the intention of the committee or the House to have any pension run back to 1812, and there must be some mistake here which I want corrected.

Mr. HERRICK. There could be no mistake before the committee on the subject. The bill was prepared and a majority of the committee authorized it to be reported to the House. It was reported to the House and passed.

My colleague [Mr. KERNAN] has stated the reason why this pension has not been paid before. This man died in December, and his name appears upon the muster-roll for January, and the Pension Office refused to take parole evidence to override that record. It was afterwards proved by half a dozen witnesses, who attended his funeral, that the man died in December. If the fact had been properly reported, the widow would have had her pension long ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill came from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, not, as he has supposed, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Then I move that this bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, where it properly belongs.

Mr. HERRICK. It is not a pension for an invalid.

Mr. FENTON. I merely wish to say that this is a proper case for an invalid pension, and I hope it will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The first question is upon the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the resolution is pending to refer the bill to the Committee on Invalid Pensions I will withdraw the motion to concur, and allow it to be referred.

The question was put on the motion to refer, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion that the House non-concur in the Senate amendment, and ask a committee of conference, it was put and agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXPENSES OF LAND SURVEYS.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. No. 28) explanatory of the tenth section of an act to reduce the expenses of the surveys and sale of the public lands in the United States, approved May 30, 1862; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SAILORS' LOSS OF CLOTHING.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was a joint resolution (S. No. 35) to compensate the sailors on the gunboat Baron de Kalb for loss of clothing; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The resolution authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of the petty officers, seamen, sailors, and others of the crew of the gunboat Baron de Kalb, to allow to each a sum not exceeding fifty dollars as a remuneration for damage they may have sustained in the loss of clothing by the destruction of said vessel.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion, as I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill makes an appropriation, and can be considered in the House now only by unanimous consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. I want to hear the bill read.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will not object if he understands what the bill is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not understand it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will explain it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objected, and the bill has gone to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I simply asked to have the bill reported that I might know what it is.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The amendment I desire to offer is in the shape of a general law to cover all cases like those embraced in the Senate resolution. Since the breaking out of the present rebellion there have been a great many instances in which vessels have been lost in action or in which they have been so far disabled as that the officers and crew have lost their clothing and personal effects. There is no provision of law now which will allow the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the accounts of officers and seamen on board of vessels in such cases, and recourse must be had in all cases to a special act of Congress. That would answer very well in times of peace when there would be only occasionally a loss of a vessel, but it is the opinion of the Navy Department that in justice to all parties interested in these losses there ought to be some general law which will authorize the settlement of their accounts, upon the proper evidence being furnished to the proper accounting officers of the Department that actual losses have been sustained.

If the House will grant their indulgence so far as to hear the substitute I propose read, I have no doubt they will assent to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to any general bill upon this subject. I do not think there are many cases of this kind, and they can be brought before Congress. I fear that a general bill would lead to abuses, but I will not object to the present bill being considered, if the motion to substitute a general bill is not made.

No objection being made, the resolution was considered in the House, and ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WARREN W. GREEN.

The next bill taken from the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 217) for the relief of Warren W. Green; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Warren W. Green the sum of $47 79, being for his services on the Fort Kearney and Honey Lake wagon road in the year 1857.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

GOLD SALES.

Bill of the Senate No. 106, to prohibit certain sales of gold and foreign exchange.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that by unanimous consent that bill will be allowed to remain on the Speaker's table. There are some amendments which a colleague of mine on the Committee of Ways and Means desires to offer, but he is not here.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would suggest that this bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, no! I would rather that we should pass it over informally.

Mr. PENDLETON. I think the Judiciary Committee ought to examine a bill of so much importance as this.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOOPER,] who has the charge of this bill, and who desires to offer some amendments, is now absent from the House. If there is no objection, therefore, the bill will be passed over informally. The Chair hears no objection.

LAND GRANT TO MINNESOTA.

Joint resolution (S. No. 17) relative to a certain grant of land for railroad purposes made to the Territory of Minnesota in the year 1857 was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GARRET R. BARRY.

Joint resolution (S. No. 41) for the relief of Garret R. Barry, a paymaster in the United States Navy, was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. HOLMAN. That bill seems to involve the question of a great many claims. I think it ought to have consideration in some committee. I move its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was so referred.

CLERKS IN UNITED STATES NAVY-YARDS.

Joint resolution (S. No. 44) for the relief of clerks at the Kittery and Philadelphia navy-yards was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

DISCHARGE OF COAL-HEAVERS.

An act (S. No. 236) to provide for granting an honorable discharge to coal-heavers and firemen in the naval service was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I appeal to the gentleman to allow that bill to be put upon its passage at once. It merely provides for putting coal-heavers and firemen on the same footing as ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys employed in the Navy.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I will not insist on my motion.

The bill was ordered to its third reading, received its third reading, and was passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PATENT LAWS.

An act (S. No. 162) amendatory of an act to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the progress of the useful arts," approved March 3, 1863, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

GRADE OF LINE OFFICERS.

An act (S. No. 276) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish and equalize the grade of line officers of the United States Navy," approved July 16, 1862, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SURGEON SOLOMON SHARP.

The next bill on the Speaker's table was joint resolution (S. No. 51) authorizing the acceptance of a certain testimonial from the Government of Great Britain.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time. It authorizes Surgeon Solomon Sharp, of the Navy of the United States, to accept a piece of plate presented to him by the Government of Great Britain as a mark of its high appreciation of the unremitting attention and kindness shown by him to certain officers of the Greyhound while in the naval hospital under his charge at Norfolk, Virginia.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FRIENDLY INDIANS IN MINNESOTA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 225) for the relief of certain friendly Indians of the Sioux nation in Minnesota.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SALARY OF AN INDIAN AGENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 247) in relation to the salary of the United States agent for the Indians near Green Bay.

The bill was read a first and second time. It directs that the salary of the agent of the United States for the Indians in the vicinity of Green Bay shall be hereafter $1,500 a year, to commence next fiscal year.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that bill had better go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WINDOM. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ELLEN M. WHIPPLE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 2) granting a pension to Ellen M. Whipple, widow of the late Major General Amiel N. Whipple, of the United States Army.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

GENERAL BERRY'S WIDOW.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 44) granting a pension to the widow of the late Major General Hiram G. Berry.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

EFFICIENCY OF THE NAVY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 253) to amend the act of the 21st of December, 1861, entitled "An act to further promote the efficiency of the Navy."

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SWAMP LANDS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 164) to extend the time within which the States may select their swamp lands.

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE YOSEMITE VALLEY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 203) authorizing a grant to the State of California of the Yosemite valley, and of the land embracing the Mariposa Big Tree Grove.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. ALLISON moved to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Would it be in order to move to refer it to the Cleveland convention? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, as that convention is not known to the rules. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I hope the House will pass the bill now.

The question was taken on Mr. ALLISON's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

RAILROAD LANDS IN MICHIGAN.

The next business on the Speaker's table was an act (S. No. 250) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes."

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. UPSON. I desire that the bill be acted upon now.

Mr. WILSON. Does this bill allow lands to be taken in the State of Kansas?

Mr. UPSON. No, sir. The object of the bill is not so much to increase the amount of the public lands granted to the State of Michigan as it is to apply the grant to the whole line of the road and secure its early completion. The line has been extended beyond its original location, and the lands cannot be got now continuous and exactly opposite the line. The Committee on Public Lands is familiar with the whole question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has this bill ever been before any committee of the House?

Mr. UPSON. A bill similar to it has once been before the Committee on Public Lands. This bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Public Lands in the Senate, and was passed unanimously, I believe, by the Senate. It has been considered informally by the Committee on Public Lands in the House, and there is no objection to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. How many million acres are appropriated by this grant?

Mr. UPSON. The original grant was for about seven hundred thousand acres.

Mr. SCHENCK. It cannot go with that. I think about three million acres would take it through. [Laughter.]

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a question of order. I think I am entitled to an answer to the question I asked some time ago, how many acres of public land are left?

Mr. UPSON. That information had better be drawn out on some other bill. This bill does not increase the amount of the grant per mile at all. It merely extends the line of the road and also the limit within which the land may be selected from fifteen to twenty miles on each side of the road, in accordance with all the bill which have been passed for Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. It is no new grant.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. I would like to inquire of the gentleman how many acres will be transferred to the State of Michigan by this bill?

Mr. UPSON. I have already stated that the original grant was for about seven hundred thousand acres, and that this bill does not change the amount of that grant. It merely extends the limit within which the lands may be selected five miles each side of the road and extends the line of the road.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that this bill has been informally considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and so far as they are concerned they have no objection at all to its passage. It makes no new grant; it merely provides where the lands may be selected.

Mr. UPSON. The explanation of the gentleman from Iowa shows that the reference of this bill is not necessary, for the Committee on Public Lands have already examined it, and they recommend its passage. It only makes the same provision which has been made in other cases, and I see no reason for its delay. I therefore move the previous question on its third reading.

On seconding the demand for the previous question, 36 rose in the affirmative and 36 in the negative—no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he withdraw his demand for a division, and allow the bill to go to the Committee on Public Lands, with leave to report at any time.

Mr. UPSON. I will consent to that.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will then order tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we have done a pretty good amount of business this evening, and as I see that Judge SPALDING is not here, [laughter.] I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. KERNAN. Before the vote is taken, I simply desire to say in reference to the committee of conference which is ordered on my motion, that I do not wish to serve on that committee, and hope in my place the gentleman who reported the bill will be appointed.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow this bill to be referred or disposed of in some way.

Mr. UPSON. I am willing that the bill shall be passed over informally.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the vote may as well be taken on my motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 48, noes 41; and thereupon (at half past nine o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 3, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. BOWMAN.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a petition of officers of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the southern district of New York, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON presented seven petitions of men and women of the United States, praying for the abolition of slavery, and for such an amendment of the Constitution as will forever prohibit its existence in any portion of the Union; which were referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

He also presented a petition of men and women of Massachusetts, praying for the suppression of the use of intoxicating liquors in the United States Army, and that the Senate refuse to confirm the nomination of any general or surgeon who has not an unblemished character for personal sobriety and freedom from the companionship of intemperate associates; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I present to the Senate a preamble and a series of resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in relation to a naval depot. I will read to the Senate the concluding portion of this memorial:

"And whereas a majority of the said board, after devoting more than two months to a careful, laborious, and thorough survey and examination of said sites, and after a full discussion of their advantages, immediate and incidental, came to the conclusion 'that the harbor of New London possessed the necessary capacity and fitness for such yard, and that the public interests would be promoted by its establishment there instead of League Island;' and whereas during the present session of Congress the Naval Committee, together with a delegation from the Military Committee and the Committee of Ways and Means, have visited and personally examined the said sites, and a majority has recently reported in favor of the harbor of New London: Therefore,

"Resolved, That in view of the importance of this question to the whole country, and especially to the interests of commerce and navigation, which are especially protected by the Navy, and in which this city is so deeply interested, this Chamber fully concurs in the expression of opinion of the said board of naval officers and engineers and of said Naval Committee, and do earnestly urge upon Congress to speedily pass a law establishing the navy yard and depot at New London, and to appropriate the necessary means for carrying the same into effect."

I move that the document be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand additional copies of the act (H. R. No. 395) to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof, reported it without amendment; and the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 280) to amend an act entitled "An act to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph," approved June 16, 1860, reported it with an amendment.

MARQUETTE AND ONTONAGON RAILROAD.

Mr. CARLILE. The Committee on Public Lands have instructed me to report back, with a recommendation that it be passed, the bill (H. R. No. 469) extending the time for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan. It merely extends the time for the completion of this work five years, and I am requested by the committee to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to extend the time limited for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon railroad of the State of Michigan for the term of five years beyond the time fixed for its completion by the act of Congress of June 3, 1856, "making a grant of alternate sections of the public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes;" but the State of Michigan is to have the same control over the grant of lands hereby extended for the benefit of the railroad which was given to the State under the original act of Congress; and the State may prescribe the time within which the several sections of the road shall be completed.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 298) to incorporate the Potomac Ferry Company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (No. 236) to provide for granting an honorable discharge to coal-heavers and firemen in the naval service;

A joint resolution (No. 35) to compensate the sailors of the gunboat Baron de Kalb for loss of clothing; and

A joint resolution (No. 51) authorizing the acceptance of a certain testimonial from the Government of Great Britain.

The message further announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (No. 90) to refer the claim of Nahum Ward back to the Court of Claims; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 290) for the relief of Rhoda Wolcott, widow of Henry Wolcott, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ANSON HERRICK of New York, Mr. W. B. WASHBURN of Massachusetts, and Mr. JAMES T. HALE of Pennsylvania, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the bill of the Senate (No. 250) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes," with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had yesterday approved and signed the following acts and joint resolutions:

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Frederick A. Beelen, late secretary of legation to Chili;

An act (H. R. No. 381) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," approved May 15, 1856;

An act (H. R. No. 484) to incorporate the Newsboys' Home; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) to settle the account of James Keenan, late consul at Hong Kong, China.

JAMES P. JOHNSON.

Mr. HARLAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be instructed to examine the claim of James P. Johnson, for services as a veterinary surgeon in the fourth Iowa cavalry, under a contract with the colonel of said regiment, and, if found to be just, to report a bill for his relief.

LAND CLAIMS OF WISCONSIN.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 8) for the relief of the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. COLLAMER. I was submitting some remarks on this joint resolution when it was last up. I understood the honorable Senator from Iowa to suggest that we ought to pay over to the State of Wisconsin the five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in that State, and to leave the State to settle with the company. Did I understand him aright?

Mr. HARLAN. That was my suggestion.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think that will hardly do. It is difficult to talk about this matter without going into a history of how the case arises. The United States owe to the State of Wisconsin five per cent. on the sales of the public lands in that State since the State was admitted into the Union. That account has not been settled. That money remains in the Treasury of the United States for the State of Wisconsin. The reason it has not been settled and paid, as I understand, is that it is understood that the State of Wisconsin has in its hands some money which really belongs to the United States, money which the State obtained while a Territory for some public lands that it sold. The account of the money which it received for that public land has not been adjusted. When adjusted, it should be deducted from the amount of the five per cent. coming to the State from our Treasury. The object of the present joint resolution is to adjust that business, and not to withhold any longer the five per cent. from the State, but to ascertain whether, in point of fact, the State has any such money in her hands as I have supposed; and if she has, how much, so that it may be deducted from what we owe her, and have the question settled in relation to the five per cent. I would here inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin about how much the five per cent. amounts to.

Mr. HOWE. It was $249,000 in 1861.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is a little more than that now, I suppose.

Mr. HOWE. There has not been much increase since that.

Mr. COLLAMER. Probably in these times the increase would not be very great. Let us suppose that $250,000 is due to that State, lying in our Treasury, which the State wants. I take it she is willing to account for whatever she received for the lands which she sold. If she really received money for them she is willing to account to us, but she wants to settle the whole; hence the object of this joint resolution is to adjust the accounts.

In settling and adjusting the accounts, if I understand the subject aright, and I think I do, a difficulty arises about the claims to the money which, as I say, is held by the State—claims between the United States and a certain canal company. The origin of that dispute can be readily stated. The United States made a grant to the Territory of Wisconsin of certain alternate sections of land to construct a certain canal, and a company was organized for the purpose of doing that, and the Territory was to sell those sections of land at $2 50 an acre in order to carry on that enterprise. The Territory sold some of the land and paid over some of the money to the company. The company went on and put in money of their own, together with the money received from the Territory. They worked on the canal for awhile; but at last, however, I know not for what cause, and I will not ascribe it to any bad cause, the Territory of Wisconsin refused to go any further with it; the Territory directed its agents who had charge of the sale of the lands to sell them at $1 25, and to put the money into the treasury and use it for their ordinary governmental purposes. They did so; but I understand they did not sell all the land. When the Territory came to be admitted as a State, there was a particular provision in the law for her admission which declared that the State should stand in the same relation and be subject to the same responsibilities as the Territory was under in relation to the sales of that land. The State assumed that obligation.

As a matter of course when those sales stopped, or when the proceeds ceased to be appropriated to the purpose for which the grant was made, the work on the canal ceased. It is said now that it could hardly have succeeded at any rate for the want of water, or something of that kind. No matter about that now, for I understand that the company do not desire to go any further with their enterprise, but they want to be paid for what they have laid out of their own money; and it seems to be agreed on all hands, if I understand the report of the legislative committee in Wisconsin, that they ought to be paid.

Now, the question is how to arrange this business. The joint resolution provides for arranging it. It provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall adjust the account. In the first place he is to make out how much is due to Wisconsin for her five per cent. which we have in our Treasury. Then he is to adjust the account with the State for all those canal lands which the Territory sold and got pay for, at whatever price it realized beyond what it paid to the company, and to deduct that sum from the five per cent. fund, and pay the balance to the State of Wisconsin. Then we, having reserved in the Treasury the money which Wisconsin got from the sale of the canal lands, have the fund with which to settle with the company; and the Secretary of the Interior is directed by the resolution to go on and adjust the account of that company and to settle with them with that money, not exceeding the amount reserved from the State.

That I understand to be the outline of the resolution. On this plain statement of it I have nothing to say against it except in two respects, which may perhaps be considered small matters. The first question is whether Wisconsin ought to be called on to account merely for what she obtained from the sale of the canal lands, or whether she ought to be called on to account for them at $2 50 an acre, the price stipulated at the time the grant was made. The act making the grant fixed the price at $2 50 an acre. The Territory of Wisconsin sold much of it for less than that. What she sold at $1 25 was sold at that rate without any license or authority from this Government to do so. I believe it is said that we fixed the price of that land too high. They understood perfectly well what the price was at the time the land was granted. They knew the price the Government fixed on it. I do not know why they should have had any right to sell that land for less than $2 50 an acre. I do not know why they did it. I believe they did it; and this resolution only holds them to account for the amount which they actually received. To my mind they ought to account in justice and propriety for the land at $2 50 an acre. It is not for them to complain that we fixed the price too high. They might at least have had the common prudence of the man who broke into a store and would not steal the goods because they were marked so high. [Laughter.] They had nothing to do but let the land alone if they did not like the price; but they actually took it and disposed of it for $1 25 an acre; and the joint resolution only calls upon them to pay over what they received. The question is whether they should not be called on to account at $2 50 an acre. I will not occupy further time on that point. I state it to the Senate, and they can do what they please.

But there is another matter. The five per cent. which by a general law is payable to the new States out of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, was originally confined to the making of roads and bridges under the direction of the State. When the State of Wisconsin was admitted, she asked Congress to change that, and to permit her to hold the five per cent. as a school fund for common schools. Congress consented to that, and it was agreed that that should be a school fund. You will perceive, Mr. President, that by the operation of this joint resolution, what the State received for the canal lands being deducted from the amount to be paid over to her as a school fund, the result is that she is permitted to pay off her old debt out of the school fund so far as it goes. I object to that perversion of the fund. When we granted Wisconsin the five per cent. for common schools at her request, which was all right enough, I choose that it shall be kept to that purpose. As to this old debt of hers for the money she received for the canal lands, for which she is accountable, it should not be paid out of the school fund. I speak now for the children and for the cause of education, for the purpose for which the grant was made; and in order to secure that I propose the following amendment as an additional section, and if it be adopted I shall have no further objections to the resolution:

And be it further resolved, That this joint resolution is passed on the condition that before anything is paid to said State under the same, the State shall make provision that whatever sum is deducted from the five per cent. on the sales of public lands in said State, in pursuance hereof, shall by said State be replaced for the use of schools in said State.

Before taking my seat I will make a few remarks in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa that we should do nothing in regard to settling with the canal company. What will be the result if we settle with the State and pay her the five per cent. and make no deduction of the money which she received for the canal lands and which should go to pay the company as far as they laid out money of their own and which all agree should be paid? It follows as a matter of course that the company will at once come to us and make a claim on us to pay them. They will say to us, "You have taken the fund which you appropriated for building this canal, and in reliance upon which we laid out our own money; and with it you have settled your debt with the State as far as it would go, and if you do that you should certainly pay us." I do not know how much the claim of the company is. I presume, however, it is a great deal less than the amount of money which the Territory received for the canal lands which it sold. But if, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa, we do not make any settlement with the State about the canal lands, but deduct the money received from them from the five per cent. fund and just pay the State the balance, and leave the company to make a claim on the State, it will be an injustice to the company whom we created in fact under the grant, for I doubt very much whether they will ever get anything from the State. There is a further objection that we leave that amount of money in the hands of the State. If she settles the account of the company, which is a great deal less than what the State received from the canal lands, she will take the balance entirely to herself; it will not go to pay us, or pay anybody else. It seems to me that is a very great injustice. It is a risk which we certainly ought not to run to leave the State in possession of the money even if it should settle the company's account, and we ought not to put off the company and refer them to the State.

The amendment which I have offered is nothing but a simple provision that whatever amount of the five per cent. fund is deducted for the purpose of paying this old debt shall by the State be replaced in the school fund.

Mr. HARLAN. The Senator from Vermont I think is in error in this. The five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands, as well as five hundred thousand acres of the public lands, were granted to each new State for the purpose of carrying on works of internal improvement within its limits, under the direction of the State government, and not for the support of schools.

Mr. COLLAMER. The five per cent. was for roads and bridges.

Mr. HARLAN. Roads and bridges and canals may be denominated works of internal improvement. By a general provision of law the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands within its limits and five hundred thousand acres of public lands were given to each new State to aid in carrying on such works of internal improvement as the State might inaugurate. But Wisconsin, in her application for admission as a State, requested leave to divert this five per cent. fund as well as the five hundred thousand acres from the original purpose intended by Congress, enacted in 1841, when this system was originated, to school purposes; and this diversion was acquiesced in by this Government. But before this diversion was made lands had been received by Wisconsin and applied to the original object, to aid in the construction of a canal. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] provides that the value of these lands thus applied to a work of internal improvement in accordance with the original policy of the Government, and in accordance with law, shall be also added to the school fund by the State of Wisconsin, so as to make her school fund equal to the entire amount of the five per cent. of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the whole of the value of the five hundred thousand acre grant. This Government had provided other means for the support of schools—the sixteenth sections and university lands. It was not the interest of the United States to divert the internal improvement fund to the support of schools. The construction of roads and bridges and canals through the public lands would enhance their value and hasten their sale. This Government was therefore interested in the application of this internal improvement fund as originally designed. The diversion was adverse to the interest of the United States. It was agreed to because Wisconsin deemed it to be advantageous to her as a State. I do not, therefore, perceive any sufficient reason for compelling Wisconsin to add to the school fund of the State the value of lands which were never school lands, and which were sold and applied to the purposes indicated by Congress before she became a State of the Union.

I will now come to the main proposition, and state the facts as I understand them as briefly as I can. While Wisconsin was a Territory, Congress made a grant of land, not to the canal company but to the Territory of Wisconsin, to aid the Territory in constructing a canal. It is true that preceding this grant a company had been incorporated by the Legislature of Wisconsin for the purpose of constructing a canal, and in that charter they were authorized to petition Congress for a grant of land to the company; but when the subject was considered by Congress they did not make an appropriation of lands to the company in pursuance of its request, but they made the grant directly to the Territory of Wisconsin, and provided the mode in which the land should be disposed of. The law provided that the proceeds of the sales of the land should be applied in the construction of the proposed canal, the whole amount to be credited to the Territory of Wisconsin for the use of the future State as so much full-paid stock. It was not to be turned over to the company and become the property of the company as it was derived from the sales of the lands, but was to be invested in this work by the Territory of Wisconsin, and held by her as so much full-paid stock to become the property of the State.

The work was commenced. The company paid in some money, some sales of lands were effected and applied. But in the course of a few years the territorial authorities, despairing of final success, declined to make further investments in the canal enterprise, and diverted the proceeds of the sales of the canal lands to other purposes.

The law of Congress granting the lands to aid in the construction of the canal contained the condition that if the canal should not be completed in ten years all the lands sold should be accounted for to the United States by Wisconsin at the rate of $2 50 per acre. The work was not completed, and accordingly the State stands charged with the value of the land at the rate named. This bill proposes to reduce the estimated value of the land as charged from $2 50 to $1 25 per acre. This would operate as a credit to the State to the amount of about $156,000. The amendment proposed by the committee provides for the payment to the canal company the total amount of the means invested by it in this work out of the five per cent. fund, now due the State from the United States, not exceeding the above credit.

It will be seen, if I am correct in this statement of facts, that this Government never did charter the company, never came under obligations to pay its debts or to guaranty the success of the work, but made provisions to enable the Territory of Wisconsin to become a joint owner of the work, stipulating that if she should in the future so decide she might purchase the whole, paying, however, only the amount invested by the company from its own funds.

Mr. HOWE. Will my friend allow me to suggest one mistake he has fallen into on a question of fact?

Mr. HARLAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. And that is, that the State could ever have any stock, ever be beneficially interested in any stock of the canal company. The proceeds of the grant were, to be sure, to be invested in stock, but the State was only to hold the stock as it held the land, in trust; and whenever, from the dividends on the State stock, or from any other cause, the private stock was extinguished, then the stock was to be held for the public, and there were no tolls to be collected thereafter more than sufficient to keep the work in repair. The treasury of the State never could get a dollar of benefit either from the grant or from the stock.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not perceive that the fact stated by the Senator affects the question either one way or the other. It is true that Congress stipulated that after the work should have been completed and after it should have become the property of the State of Wisconsin, no higher tolls should be charged than sufficient to keep the work in repair; but I do not see that that affects the liability of this Government the one way or the other. This Government never chartered the company, never organized the company, never donated or promised to donate a dollar to its funds, but simply provided means to enable the State of Wisconsin to become a joint owner. This Government never guaranteed, either directly or indirectly, the success of the enterprise; never agreed to reimburse the stockholders the capital invested, if the enterprise should fail. The enterprise was a private voluntary undertaking. The hazard was their own. The right was secured to Wisconsin to purchase out the stock to the extent of the private means invested if she chose to do so; but this was left for her to decide according to her own volition. She was not required either by the terms or the spirit of the law to make the purchase, nor was this Government in any way thus obligated either by the letter or spirit of the law. The character of the future tolls, whether small or great, could not affect this question in the least.

As I was about to observe, Wisconsin probably distrusted the ability of the company to complete the canal. By an examination of the history of this case as it will be found in a report made by a commissioner of the State of Wisconsin, appointed under a law of the State, it will appear that the company invested a very small amount of its own means. Their charter provided that they might raise stock to the amount of $1,000,000. One hundred thousand dollars' worth of stock was subscribed, and it is said that but a small amount was actually paid in; I think not exceeding $14,000. The company does not claim to have paid in exceeding forty or fifty thousand dollars from the beginning to the suspension of the work. The Territory paid over $30,000 of money; the company probably much less. The commissioner previously mentioned also states that the company had exhausted its means; were unable to collect the stock subscribed, were unable to borrow money, and were absorbing the proceeds of the sales of the lands only in prosecuting the work and paying the salaries of their officers. The estimated cost of the work by the company's engineers was nearly one million dollars; they had secured subscriptions of stock only to the amount of $100,000; probably not more than one sixth, certainly less than one half of this was ever paid in. The land grant amounted to less than one hundred and forty thousand acres, which was being sold very slowly at the rate of $1 25 per acre to settlers and $2 50 to others. It was perfectly manifest that with these means only the work could never be completed, and that all future investments by the Territory from the proceeds of the land grant would be a total loss. The Territory therefore suspended any further investments and applied the proceeds of the sales to other uses. This was clearly her right as one of the parties in interest, when the other party failed to meet her engagements. But the company, the defaulting party, the party unable to pay the stock she had subscribed, unable to raise an additional dollar, demands to be indemnified for the capital invested! Such a proposition made by an individual in the private affairs of life would not be entertained for a moment. And yet this is the purport of the committee's amendment, which was sustained by the speech of the Senator from Vermont.

I suggest to the Senator that the claim would be quite as valid if set up by the State of Wisconsin against the company. Why should not the company be compelled to pay the State of Wisconsin the $30,000 that she invested and lost in this futile effort to build a canal? On every principle of justice and equity with which I am acquainted the claim of the State to indemnity from the company is the stronger. The company first failed to fulfill its engagement; it never paid the $100,000 of stock subscribed; according to the report of the commissioner it never paid over $14,000 of it. The company was not carrying out in good faith its own contract to build the canal; it failed to pay in the money subscribed; it tried in vain to borrow. It was after this that Wisconsin, despairing of the success of the work after having paid in and thrown away about thirty thousand dollars of money, suspended future payments. If either party has a right to be reimbursed by the other, it is the State of Wisconsin. It will be seen by examining the report previously mentioned that the company claims indemnity for all losses on the value of land purchased along the line of this work, and also salaries of officers and agents, and the cost of lobbying here to secure the land grant, as well as money invested in the work, and interest on the aggregate amount up to the present moment, amounting in all to over two hundred thousand dollars.

If I am correct in these statements, it follows that this Government at least is under no obligations to the company. And it is not material to the real question at issue to decide the liabilities of the State of Wisconsin. This Government made a grant of land to Wisconsin to aid in constructing this canal, conditioned that if the work was not completed in ten years the State should pay the United States for the land at $2 50 per acre. The work failed; the liability was incurred; and the State stands charged on the books of the Treasury on this account to the amount of over three hundred thousand dollars. This account has been credited the amount falling due to Wisconsin on the five per cent. fund from year to year since 1851. As the account now stands the State owes this Government over sixty-three thousand dollars.

The only remaining question which arises is, has Wisconsin been charged too much for these lands? She agreed in receiving the land, if the work should not be completed within ten years, to pay the Government of the United States for the land at the rate of $2 50 an acre, which amounts to $313,579 55. Most of the lands were, however, sold by Wisconsin at $1 25 an acre. It is not necessary that I should narrate how this occurred. It was done to protect settlers on the land, with the consent of the company. The policy was afterwards indirectly approved by Congress. The quantity of land sold amounted to 125,431 acres; leaving unsold when Wisconsin became a State 13,564 acres. At her request this was conveyed to her as a part of the 500,000 acres due to the State on becoming a member of the Union.

Under existing laws Wisconsin has no right to a reduction of the price of the land. But should this Government insist on a technical advantage? It was doubtless the purpose to place the new land States on a footing of equality in making these grants. Each of the other new land States receives the total five per cent. of the net proceeds of sales of public lands and 500,000 acres for internal improvement purposes. Wisconsin has received under this head in money and in credits on the books of the Treasury the five per cent. fund and 625,000 acres—125,000 acres more under this head than the other new land States. For this excess this Government has charged her at the rate of $2 50 per acre; but she sold the lands at about $1 25 per acre. This does not seem to me to be just. Hence I propose an amendment which if adopted will reduce this charge against the State for this excess of lands from $2 50 to $1 25 per acre, the price at which they were mostly sold.

Mr. HOWE. I wish my friend when he undertakes to state the liabilities of Wisconsin would state upon what evidence it rests. He says that Wisconsin agreed to pay the United States $2 50 for these lands. I never saw the agreement. I never saw the slightest evidence of it.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not feel inclined at this time to enter into an argument of that kind. Attorney General Cushing and Attorney General Crittenden, after examining that subject, fully decided, in their official capacity as the law officers of this Government, that the State of Wisconsin had obligated herself to pay this Government $2 50 an acre for the land on the failure of the construction of that canal. I choose, therefore, for the purposes of my statement here this morning, to consider that as res adjudicata. The State, in receiving the five per cent. fund and the five hundred thousand acres of land and disposing of it in the mode indicated by the Congress of the United States, has availed herself of the advantage growing out of that agreement. It seems to me it is now too late for her to come in and deny its existence and the obligations it imposes on her. I therefore assume that she did obligate herself to pay $2 50 an acre for the land; but she sold the land for $1 25 an acre, and I suppose that this Government ought not to charge her more than the minimum price, at any rate not more than she derived from the sales, being not less than $1 25 an acre.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that that is just what this joint resolution provides.

Mr. HARLAN. I know it is; but the joint resolution also provides that the State of Wisconsin shall be credited for all the money she has invested in the work. This will operate as an additional grant.

The joint resolution also provides that this Government shall ascertain how much the canal company has invested, and pay it out of the five per cent. fund due the State. Why should this be done? What right has this Congress to assume that Wisconsin is indebted to the canal company or any other party? And if thus indebted, what right has this Congress to authorize a suit to be brought against the State, and to institute a court under the name of a commissioner to hear such a cause? But if the authority exists, is it expedient? is it courteous to Wisconsin? Why not permit her to settle with her own creditors? If she has incurred liabilities either directly or indirectly to individuals or companies in the construction of a public work within her limits, why not let her discharge them? What right have the creditors of a State to come here and garnish the Government of the United States? for this is the effect of the proposition. This company says, "Wisconsin owes us, and Wisconsin declines to pay us; you owe Wisconsin, and now we will attach the money in your hands and have it paid over to us, and thus coerce our dishonest debtor that is withholding from us our just demand." This is the only interpretation that can be placed on such a transaction. Is not this a severe reflection to be cast on the people of Wisconsin? Are they thus dishonest? Have they persistently, for more than twenty years, refused to pay an honest debt? I will not admit the probability of such an aspersion. I have too much faith in the honesty of men to permit it. If, through prejudice or passion, one Legislative Assembly should fail to do justice, the Legislatures change; the term of office of the members expires; other incumbents are elected from year to year. To suppose that legislative bodies thus constituted would persist in refusing or delaying justice would be to pronounce republics a failure and man incapable of self-government. The presumption with me is that the State of Wisconsin can be more safely trusted in adjudicating a cause between herself and her own people than any tribunal that this Government would be likely to institute; if, indeed, this Government has the constitutional right to coerce the collection of a claim against a State.

I am not willing as a member of this body to assume that Wisconsin is dishonest, that she is disposed to defraud these creditors of hers if they are such. In my opinion, personally, Wisconsin does not owe the company one dime. The company is under as much obligations to pay Wisconsin all the money that she invested in the work as Wisconsin is to pay the company the money that the company invested. It was all money thrown away; but that ought not to influence the judgment of the Senate in deciding the question of the price per acre to be charged Wisconsin on the excess of land received by her above that granted to other new States.

We are under obligations to do justice to Wisconsin, and when we shall have charged her at the rate of $1 25 an acre for this excess and then shall have credited her with the five per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of the public lands, she will have been put on an equal footing in this respect with the other States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It becomes necessary for the Chair to call up the order of the day at this hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that this bill be assigned for fifteen minutes after twelve o'clock to-morrow. I do not want to struggle for the floor to get it up. I should think it would be the pleasure of the Senate now, since the discussion has gone so far, to complete this matter. I suppose it will take about half an hour longer, and I ask that it be postponed to and made the special order for a quarter past twelve o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. COLLAMER. I shall have to request the yeas and nays on that motion, making special orders in the morning hour.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Rather than have the yeas and nays called, I will withdraw the motion and struggle again for the floor.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to inquire whether this resolution does not come up itself in the morning hour as unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Has there been any change in the rule on that subject?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no such rule.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 405) to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the Senate with the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask to except—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed that all the amendments shall be excepted for the present until other amendments are received.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment as an additional section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will inform the Senator from Kentucky and all gentlemen who were not present when we adjourned last evening that the understanding was that the amendments which had been made in committee should none of them be acted on until all gentlemen had an opportunity to request a separate vote on anything upon which they desire a separate vote, and to offer any other amendments they may wish to present.

Mr. DAVIS. I was present when the Senate adjourned last night. I wish to offer an amendment as an additional section to the bill. I am willing to defer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole are first in order; but those amendments are subject to amendment.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to offer an amendment on page 161, line seven of section one hundred and nine, to strike out the word "an" be- "act," and add a final "s" to "act," making it "acts," and inserting the words "the several," so as to read, "the several acts, to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof;" to strike out the quotation marks, and strike out the words in lines ten and eleven, "approved February 25, 1863;" so as to make it read:

Other than associations organized and established under and by virtue of the several acts to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof.

Both those acts have the same title, and this exception should apply to associations organized under both acts.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to make the same amendment in line forty-two and the following lines of the same section, on page 162, so as to read, "of the several acts to provide a national currency."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I have some amendments which I am instructed by the Finance Committee to offer; and if it is in order to offer them before the amendments of the Committee of the Whole are acted upon, I will offer them now. I propose to amend the first section in the eleventh line by striking out the word "who" after "dollars" and putting in the enacting clause of a new section, "And be it further enacted, that such Commissioner," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You mean to close the first section with the word "dollars."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That section has already been amended, and the Clerk will report the amendment as made in Committee of the Whole to that section.

The Secretary read the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, which was to strike out after the word "same" in line six to the word "who" in line eleven, and to insert in lieu thereof "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose annual salary shall be $4,000, shall be charged," &c.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That was for the purpose of retaining the Commissioner without having him reappointed.

Mr. HOWE. Is there any amendment in that section after line twenty-seven?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is none.

Mr. HOWE. Then I propose to divide the section after the word "advertisements" in line twenty-eight, by striking out "and" and inserting "Section 2. And be it further enacted, That."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend that section in line twenty-eight, as it now stands, by inserting after the word "may" the words "at any time prior to the 1st day of July, 1865;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may at any time prior to the 1st day of July, 1865, assign to the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue such number of clerks, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill further by striking out section two, in the following words:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to pay over to the Treasurer of the United States monthly, or oftener if required by the Secretary of the Treasury, all public moneys which may come into his possession, for which the Treasurer shall give proper receipts and keep a faithful account; and at the end of each month the Commissioner shall render true and faithful accounts of all public moneys received or paid out, or paid to the Treasurer of the United States, exhibiting proper vouchers therefor, and the same shall be received and examined by the Fifth Auditor of the Treasury, who shall thereafter certify the balance, if any, and transmit the accounts, with the vouchers and certificate, to the First Comptroller for his decision thereon; and the Commissioner, when such accounts are settled as herein provided for, shall transmit a copy thereof to the Secretary of the Treasury. He shall at all times submit to the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller, or either of them, the inspection of moneys in his hands, and shall, prior to the entering upon the duties of his office, execute a bond, with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the First Comptroller, in a sum of not less than $100,000, payable to the United States, conditioned that said Commissioner shall faithfully perform the duties of his office according to law, and shall justly and faithfully account for and pay over to the United States, in obedience to law and in compliance with the order or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, all public moneys which may come into his hands or possession, and for the safe-keeping and faithful account of all stamps, adhesive stamps, or vellum, parchment or paper bearing a stamp denoting any duty thereon; which bond shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And such Commissioner shall, from time to time, renew, strengthen, and increase his official bond as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill further by striking out the sixth section, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the cashier of internal duties, whose salary shall be $2,500 shall have charge of the moneys received in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and shall perform such duties as may be assigned to his office by said Commissioner, under the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, and before entering upon his duties as cashier he shall give a bond with sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury and by the Solicitor, that he will faithfully account for all the moneys or other articles of value belonging to the United States which may come into his hands, and perform all the duties enjoined upon his office according to law and regulations, as aforesaid; which bond shall be deposited with the First Comptroller of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill on page 14, section fifteen, lines ten and eleven, by striking out after the word "exceeding" the words "three hundred" and inserting "one thousand."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In line eleven of that section after the word "for" I move to strike out "six months" and insert "not exceeding one year," so as to read, "he fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000, or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill further on page 22, line four of section twenty-one, by striking out the word "fail" after "shall," and inserting the words "willfully neglect," and in lines six and seven strike out "not being prevented by sickness or other unavoidable accident."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the same section, in line fourteen, I propose to strike out after "fine of" the words "$500 and to a forfeiture of his compensation as assessor or assistant assessor," and insert "not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the sixteenth line, after the word "for," I move to insert "not exceeding" before "one year."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the eighteenth line I move to strike out the words "internal revenue laws" and insert "Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On the 23d page, line twelve of section twenty-two, after the word "actually" I move to insert the words "and necessarily."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the same line after "expended" I move to strike out "with the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," and insert:

But no account for such rent shall be allowed or paid until it shall have been verified in such manner as the Commissioner shall require, and shall have been audited and approved by the proper officer of the Treasury Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On the same page, in line fourteen, after the words "per annum," I move to strike out the words "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to allow each assessor such clerks as he may deem necessary for the proper transaction of business, and to fix their compensation;" and to insert:

And the several assessors shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire, but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the name or names of the clerk or clerks employed, and the precise periods of time for which they were respectively employed, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the assessor stating that such service was actually required by the necessities of his office and was actually rendered, and also by the affidavit of each of his clerks stating he has rendered the service charged in such account on his behalf, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, nor contracted to pay, deposit, or assign any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, or in any way directly or indirectly paid or given nor contracted to pay or give any reward or compensation for his office or employment or the emoluments thereof.

Mr. COLLAMER. It seems to me that when you require a clerk to swear that he has rendered the service, he should also state that he has received the amount. He should at least state that he has had his pay, or what it is to be. Neither of them is required to be stated in the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I have modified the amendment to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, so as to read:

And the several assessors shall be paid, after the account thereof shall have been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, their necessary and reasonable charges for clerk hire, but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the name or names of the clerk or clerks employed, and the precise periods of time for which they were respectively employed and the rate of compensation agreed upon, and shall be accompanied by an affidavit of the assessor, stating that such service was actually required by the necessities of his office, and was actually rendered, and also by an affidavit of each of his clerks, stating he has rendered the service charged in such account on his behalf, the compensation agreed upon, and that he has not paid, deposited, or assigned, nor contracted to pay, deposit, or assign any part of such compensation to the use of any other person, nor in any way directly or indirectly paid or given nor contracted to pay or give any reward or compensation for his office or employment or the emoluments thereof.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the committee if they think we ought not to have more limitations, restrictions, and checks. I think under this provision we shall find precisely what we find now, that the clerks are not paid in proportion to the amount of labor needed and performed, but according to the conscience of assessors. Now, in some offices where double the work is done that is done in others, the clerk hire is less. I know that to be so because I have examined the returns of nearly every district in the country. I think we ought not to allow the officers to go beyond a certain amount for clerk hire. I think the sum of $3,000 large enough in any district of country, and the officers have already carried it up to $4,000 and over, I think, in some districts. I am glad that this oath is to be required; it was adopted in the office and some of the officers would not settle by it. I am glad that it is to become the law by legislation instead of being only a rule in the Fifth Auditor's office; I do not think we ought to give this large discretion to men to say what number of clerks they think they need. Take the number of pages written in these offices; they are all easily ascertained; we find the greatest inequalities. We are giving too much power to these men; it ought to be limited, and certainly no office should exceed $3,000 for clerk hire.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish the Senator from Massachusetts would suggest a better mode than the one contained in this proposition. I would ask the Senator who should determine and who should know what amount of aid is necessary in an office but the head of that office.

Mr. WILSON. That is a very easy thing to settle. It is the easiest thing in the world to take and compare every office in the country and see precisely what they need. It is all a matter of record before you; it is an easy thing to ascertain the number of dollars collected, the number of clerks employed, the number of pages written in every office in the country. I have given some little attention to this subject, and I think it is a thing easily enough ascertained and settled. In a majority of these offices in the country the business is well conducted, but there are offices where it has been dishonestly conducted. There ought not to be an office that should exceed $3,000 for clerk hire; I think that sum abundant for the largest office.

Mr. CONNESS. It is very easy to make general statements such as the honorable Senator is engaged in making. By qualifying those general statements, too, they appear to be just. "I know," he says, "that in some of the offices it is all right; but I tell you that in some others of them it is all wrong." That is the kind of statement. My cure, if I find delinquencies in my State, is to report those delinquencies at once and specify them.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will allow me: I did that five months ago, and it has been done more than once; facts and dates were given, and some of those dishonest officers have been held responsible for their conduct, and I have reason to believe others will be so held. I have reason to believe, and in fact I have read statements going to show, that there are some other offices where the practices are not what they ought to be. Sir, the internal revenue department of the Government is too loosely administered, and in many of the districts dishonestly administered. Every check which can be put in this bill we ought to put into it; and I thank the Senator from Wisconsin, who is now doing some of the work that is needed.

Mr. CONNESS. When I made the suggestion that I did as to the remedy to be applied in the class of cases referred to by the Senator, I did not doubt but that he would report a case of palpable error which had come to his mind. Now I suggest again that the only cure and only remedy is what I stated. These difficulties are purely administrative in their character. You cannot carry on a Government rightly the offices of which are in the hands of bad men; it is simply impossible; and unless we have a guarantee in the persons who shall dispose of these appointments and in the conduct of Senators and Representatives who recommend persons for appointment, I do not know any other way by which we can reach those evils that result from bad administration. I too am very glad that such safeguards and conditions are to be thrown around the law as will give us whatever security we can get; but the Senator is not entirely right, I think, in the general declarations that he makes that there is infinite and immense corruption in connection with the Treasury Department, or in other words in the collection of the revenue. I think the Senator is not right in this. Such statements are very easily made. They are very general and very loose.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to say to the Senator that I did not use the word "infinite," but what I did say was that there were dishonest practices in some of the offices; shameful practices that men of honor ought to have nothing to do with. In some of the offices the accounts were held up for months by the accounting officers. We cannot put too many guards upon these revenue officers.

Mr. CONNESS. I presume the Senator is speaking from his information and experience. I am very sorry to hear such descriptions of officers coming from the Senator from Massachusetts as occurring in that State. I am very certain that no such vile abuses as the Senator has been describing— I was addressing myself to the Senator from Massachusetts, and I find that he is not listening.

Mr. WILSON. I will listen to the Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply said that I regretted to hear the Senator give us so woeful an experience from the State of Massachusetts. I had really believed that in that State in administrative places they had reached and practiced a degree of exactness that was not known in our newer community; but I can assure the Senator that those practices are not carried on in the State that I in part represent here. I believe that the internal revenue officers in that State do their duty with as much fidelity as any officers of this Government, and I think that it would perhaps be a pretty good thing to change the officers in Massachusetts and suppress and put a stop to these little practices. I do not hear the Senators from other States complaining, and I am very sorry indeed to have my opinions changed of that State and office-holders there. I thank the Senator for having given so much of his attention to this subject. I hope he will continue it and hunt them down.

Mr. HOWE. I will say a single word. The committee undoubtedly felt as desirous of throwing every limitation about these expenditures that was possible or practicable as the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. They did deliberate upon the expediency of imposing just such a limitation as the Senator suggests. Upon consideration, however, it was the opinion of the committee that they had not data enough as yet upon which to venture to fix the limit, and therefore they thought it wiser at present to impose these restrictions and await further developments before they undertook to tie up the action of this bureau more closely than is now proposed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask my friend from Wisconsin to allow me to make a little amendment here for fear I may forget it. On page 138, line two hundred and eighty-four of section ninety-three, I move to strike out the words "or rods" after "bars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend the bill further on the 24th page, in the thirty-sixth line of section twenty-two, by inserting after the word "business" the words:

Provided, That no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of such assessor or assistant assessor.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to know whether the Senator retains the words, "and the compensation herein specified shall be in full for all expenses not otherwise particularly authorized?"

Mr. HOWE. That is to be retained.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that a part of the proviso? If so, it would stand awkwardly to put in a proviso in that way before you get to the end of the section.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know how the words which follow affect the proviso.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Perhaps it will do as it is.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I now move to amend that section further by striking the proviso, beginning with line thirty-eight and ending in line forty-seven, out of that place and making it a new section, and preceding it with the words, "and be it further enacted." The amendment is to strike out the word "provided," and make it a new section to follow this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move to amend by inserting after "same," in line four of section twenty-three, the words "verified by oath or affirmation."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. In the sixth line of section twenty-three I move to strike out all after the first "and," down to and including the word "final" in the sixteenth line of the twenty-third section, and to insert what I send to the Chair.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out, as follows:

If it appear just and in accordance with law, he shall indorse his approval thereon, but otherwise shall return the same with objections. Any such account so approved may be presented by the assistant assessor to the collector of the district for payment, who shall thereupon pay the same, and, when receipted by the assistant assessor, be allowed therefor upon presentation to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Where any account, so transmitted to the assessor, shall be objected to, in whole or in part, the assistant assessor may appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, whose decision on the case shall be final.

The words to be inserted are:

Shall transmit it with his approval thereof or his objections thereto indorsed thereupon to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be audited by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to inquire of the gentlemen who have charge of this bill if that is the only provision for the payment to deputy assessors.

Mr. HOWE. It is the only provision reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES. That may be; but I am fearful that this is not enough. They have hitherto, I believe, had their accounts audited by the man who appointed them, and who of course felt an interest in their success and prosperity. This amendment proposes that they shall be sent to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and let him audit them.

Mr. HOWE. As other similar accounts are audited.

Mr. GRIMES. How is this officer here in Washington to know what have been the demands upon the time and attention of an assistant assessor in Oregon or in the rural districts of New York, and how many days it has been necessary for him to expend in the public service? You have at last to come right back to the personal integrity of the deputy assessor, who is appointed by the assessor living in the district where he does his business, and not by anybody here who can eject him from his place.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the Senator from Iowa is alarmed. I am glad to see that he recognizes the necessity of guarding these expenditures more carefully than they have been guarded heretofore; and if he will now turn his attention to the manner of doing it, and will invent a better one, as I have no doubt he can, I, for one individual, shall be very glad to accept it. I have given considerable attention to this subject. The auditing officers will not be destitute entirely of the means of settling these accounts, for in addition to the certificate of the assessor and the affidavit of the assistant assessor or stating the number of days' work done, and the actual dates on which the work was rendered, they know in what quarter of the country the service was rendered, and may ascertain what such services are worth in that quarter of the country, and they have before them a great part of the actual work done. The work of that assistant assessor is returned to the assessor, and by him is sent up to the Commissioner. They have, therefore, the opportunity of inspecting actually the very work done by the assistant assessor. Still, in spite of these things, abuses may occur, and I have no doubt if we had time, and if the Senator from Iowa would really give as much attention and as much thought to the subject as I have, he would devise a better method of protecting the Treasury than I have. This is the best that occurred to the committee, and this is the one I am instructed to offer. I think the Senator will admit it is a great deal better than the section as it stands.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir; I admit it is an improvement on the law as it stands.

Sir, this is no fresh alarm on my part, as some Senators very well know, in regard to the way these deputy assessors have been paid, for I have called the attention of Senators and of the Senate also to it once or twice before.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We have been trying to do something in that direction.

Mr. GRIMES. I am glad that the committee have made as good progress as they have; but I would in some way or another connect the collector of the district, whose interests are not identical with the deputy assessor or with the assessor himself, with this matter, and cause some returns or some investigations of the duties performed by the assessors to be reported to the Department by the collector; but I have not thought enough about it to give any very correct information on the subject. I want to see some check put upon the swindling that has been going on in this regard; and I am fearful that an accounting officer here in Washington will not know very much about the duties of an assessor out in Illinois or Iowa.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend will have time, probably, in the course of to-day and to-morrow, to elaborate that idea and provide something that will be better, if he will give his attention to it, and we shall be very glad to receive it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I suggest that a period should follow the amendment that has just been made, and the word "and" should commence with a capital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

Mr. HOWE. On page 27, section twenty-four, line nineteen, after the words "official business," I move to insert the words "but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the collector;" so that the clause will read:

And there shall be further paid, after the account thereof has been rendered to and approved by the proper officers of the Treasury, to each collector his necessary and reasonable charges for stationery and blank-books used in the performance of his official duties, and for postage actually paid on letters and documents received or sent, and exclusively relating to official business; but no such account shall be approved unless it shall state the date and the particular items of every such expenditure, and shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 30, section twenty-seven, line twenty-five, after the word "taxes,"

I move to insert the words "with the penalty aforesaid;" so that the clause will read:

And if such person shall not pay the duties or taxes with the penalty aforesaid and the fee of twenty cents and mileage as aforesaid, within ten days after the service or the sending by mail of such notice, it shall be the duty of the collector or his deputy to collect the said duties or taxes and fee of twenty cents and mileage, with ten per cent. penalty as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 40, section thirty-two, line thirteen, I move to strike out the word "final" before "account," and to add the letter "s" to the word "account," so as to make it plural.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 41, section thirty-two, line fifteen, after the word "and" I move to strike out the words "within six months from and after the day when he shall have received the collection lists from the said assessors or assistant assessors, as aforesaid," and to insert "at least once in each month;" so that the clause will read:

And each of the said collectors shall complete the collection of all sums assigned to him for collection, as aforesaid, shall pay over the same into the Treasury, and shall render his accounts to the Treasury Department as often as he may be required, and at least once in each month.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 41, section thirty-three, line six, after the word "thereto" I move to strike out the words "and amount of penalties or forfeitures collected, and shall be credited with all payments of duties or taxes collected," and to insert in lieu thereof "with the par value of all stamps deposited with him, and with all moneys collected for passports, penalties, forfeitures, fees, or costs, and he shall be credited with all payments made as provided by law, with all stamps returned by him uncanceled to the Treasury, with the salary, fee, and commissions allowed by law;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 33. And be it further enacted, That each collector shall be charged with the whole amount of taxes, whether contained in lists delivered to him by the assessors, respectively, or delivered or transmitted to him by assistant assessors from time to time, or by other collectors, and with the additions thereto, with the par value of all stamps deposited with him, and with all moneys collected for passports, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 42, section thirty-four, line nine, after the word "amount" I move to strike out the words "of the taxes;" and in line twelve, after the word "ascertainable," to strike out the words "in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue;" so that it will read:

That if any collector shall fail either to collect or to render his account, or to pay over in the manner or within the times hereinbefore provided, it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and he is hereby authorized and required, immediately after evidence of such delinquency, to report the same to the Solicitor of the Treasury, who shall issue a warrant of distress against such delinquent collector, directed to the marshal of the district, therein expressing the amount with which the said collector is chargeable, and the sums, if any, which have been paid over by him, so far as the same are ascertainable.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 44, section thirty-five, line nine, after the words "fine of" I move to strike out the words "$500 and to a forfeiture of his compensation," and to insert "not exceeding $1,000;" and in line eleven, before the words "one year," I move to insert the words "not exceeding;" so that it will read:

That each and every collector, or his deputy, who shall be guilty of any extortion or willful oppression, under color of law, or shall knowingly demand other or greater sums than shall be authorized by law, or shall receive any fee, compensation, or reward, except as herein prescribed, for the performance of any duty, or shall willfully neglect to perform any of the duties enjoined by this act, shall, upon conviction, be subject to a fine of not exceeding $1,000, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court, and be dismissed from office and be forever thereafter incapable of holding any office under the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 45, section thirty-six, line two, after the words "assistant assessor" I move to insert the words "revenue agent," so as to allow revenue agents to enter any brewery, distillery, &c., in the day time for the purpose of examination.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 49, section forty-two, line eight, after the word "compensation" I move to insert the words "and for allowances."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 71, section sixty, line fifty-two, there is a misprint, I suppose. The word "or," at the commencement of the line, should be "on."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That correction will be made.

Mr. HOWE. On page 158, section one hundred and five, line seven, after the word "him," I move to insert these words: "to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there to be charged to the account of such collector;" so that it will read:

Sec. 105. And be it further enacted, That for every passport issued from the office of the Secretary of State, there shall be paid the sum of five dollars; which amount may be paid to any collector appointed under this act, and his receipt therefor shall be forwarded with the application for such passport to the office of the Secretary of State, or any agent appointed by him, to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there to be charged to the account of such collector.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I am not instructed by the committee to move the amendment which I am about to move, but I will move to amend this same section in the third line by striking out "five" and inserting "ten" before the word "dollars."

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that would operate very hard upon the poor people who are naturalized in going back to their own country. A person who travels for pleasure ought to pay $100; but there are a great many people who cross the ocean to see their friends in Germany and the old countries, and I think ten dollars for a passport would be an unreasonable tax and would be oppressive. Their fare is only about seventeen dollars, from ten to twenty-five dollars.

Mr. HOWE. I agree that an unreasonable tax would be oppressive. This does not strike me as an unreasonable tax. It is true it would be a large sum for a poor person to pay; but the number of poor persons who visit Europe I suppose to be very small. Indeed, I did not suppose poverty went so far to make a visit. I know that a great many people are in the habit of going to Europe who are not poor, and I never happened to know of one proposing to visit that distant country to whom the payment of ten dollars for a passport would be any obstacle. Such people may make such a trip; I have not happened to know them.

Mr. GRIMES. I have known a great many of them, men from my own town, neighbors of mine who are in quite moderate circumstances, quite poor, who, upon the death or in consequence of the sickness of their relatives in Sweden or Norway or Germany, have raked and scraped together money enough to enable them to go to the old country; but if you now put a burden of ten dollars upon them in place of allowing them, as we did last year or the year before, to go free—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Under the old bill we charged them three dollars.

Mr. GRIMES. And now to raise it to ten dollars would be burdensome to that class of people.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will ask the gentleman if very many of those people are naturalized, because foreigners do not have to obtain any passport.

Mr. GRIMES. They are naturalized generally. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. On page 179, section one hundred and nineteen, line twenty, I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and to insert the word "collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 182, section one hundred and twenty-one, line twenty-seven, I move the same amendment, to strike out the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and to insert the word "collector."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 184, section one hundred and twenty-two, line twenty-six, I move to strike out the words "Commissioner of Internal Revenue" and to insert "Treasurer of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 209 I move to strike out all of the one hundred and sixtieth section after the words "that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," and to insert what I send to the Chair as a substitute.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I presume it is unnecessary to read the section proposed to be stricken out. Let the Secretary read what is proposed to be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be inserted, as follows:

Shall cause to be printed or engraved upon all stamped vellum, paper, and adhesive stamps prepared after the passage of this act the date of the approval thereof, and thereafter he shall cause all stamped vellum, parchment, paper, and adhesive stamps to be distributed and delivered to the several collectors of internal revenue throughout the United States without prepayment therefor, so that each of said collectors and each of his deputies shall be kept constantly supplied therewith; and said collectors and deputy collectors shall at all times sell the same to parties applying therefor at the par value thereof. And each of said collectors shall be allowed a commission upon all such sales not exceeding four per cent., in addition to the compensation herein provided for other services, which commission shall be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. And all sales of such stamped vellum, parchment, paper, or adhesive stamps, after the passage of this act, by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or by any party other than such collectors, deputy collectors, their vendors, or by those who at that date were the bona fide holders thereof, is hereby prohibited: Provided, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue may from time to time furnish, supply, and deliver to any manufacturer of friction or other matches, cigar lights, or wax tapers a suitable quantity of adhesive or other stamps, such as may be prescribed for use in such cases, without repayment therefor, on a credit not exceeding sixty days, requiring in advance such security as he may judge necessary to secure payment therefor to the Treasurer of the United States within the time prescribed for such payment. And upon all bonds or other securities taken by said Commissioner under the provisions of this act suits may be maintained by said Treasurer in the circuit or district court of the United States in the several districts where any of the persons giving said bonds or other securities reside or may be found, in any appropriate form of action.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 211, section one hundred and sixty-one, line eight, I move to strike out the word "thereof" and to insert "therefor." It is a mere verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. On page 218, section one hundred and sixty-nine, I move to strike out all of the section after the word "that," in the first line, down to the commencement of the stamp schedules, and to insert in lieu thereof:

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, immediately upon the passage of this act, deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, or with the Assistant Treasurer nearest to the place of engraving, all stamped vellum, parchment, paper, and adhesive stamps on hand and unsold, keeping an account thereof; and all subsequent issues of such adhesive or other stamps shall be deposited in like manner daily. And the Commissioner aforesaid shall demand and receive from all persons employed in the printing or engraving of such new issues sworn statements in duplicate, showing the whole number and par value of such new issues printed or engraved each day, one copy of which statements shall be preserved by the said Commissioner, and the other deposited with the First Comptroller of the Treasury. And the Secretary of the Treasury may, from time to time, make such further regulations as he may find necessary to insure the safe-keeping and prevent the illegal use of all such stamped vellum, parchment, paper, and adhesive stamps.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move further to amend the bill by adding the following as additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1864, the gross amount of all moneys received for duties, taxes, charges, or revenue, received by virtue of the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government and to pay the interest on the public debt," approved July 1, 1862, or any other act in force connected with the internal revenue, shall be paid by the officer, collector, or agent receiving the same into the Treasury of the United States without any abatement or deduction on account of salary, fees, costs, charges, expenses, or claims of any description whatever, any act or part of an act to the contrary notwithstanding.

And be it further enacted, That so much money as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses incident to carrying into effect the various acts connected with internal revenue which are or may be authorized and payable after the 1st of July, 1864, be, and is hereby, appropriated for that purpose, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. And it shall be the duty of the collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, as the Secretary may direct, to act as disbursing agents to pay the aforesaid expenses without increased compensation therefor, who shall give good and sufficient bonds for the faithful performance of their duties as such disbursing agents for such sum and in such form as shall be prescribed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury; subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the aforesaid appropriation shall continue in force to the 30th day of June, 1865, and thereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall embrace in his annual estimates the amount which, in his opinion, will be required for the expenses of this branch of the public service.

And be it further enacted, That all moneys now directed by law to be paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall, from and after the 1st of July, 1864, be paid into the Treasury of the United States, the party making such payment taking a certificate therefor, which certificate shall state the name of the depositor and on what specific account the deposit was made. The certificate of deposit, when transmitted to and received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be considered a compliance with the law requiring payment to be made to such Commissioner, any act or part of an act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Some of these amendments seem to be very elaborate, and it is impossible to tell their effect from merely hearing them read. I think it is due to the Senate that the gentlemen who present them should make a very brief statement of them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Do you mean the one just read?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have noticed several proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the bill. My purpose merely is to suggest that a brief explanation ought to be made of the effect of the amendments. Of course I do not want a discussion upon them.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will tell the Senator what all these amendments mean.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I want to know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We came to the conclusion, and the Secretary of the Treasury came to the same conclusion, that the system which has heretofore prevailed of making the Commissioner of Internal Revenue an officer who received large sums of money and disbursed large sums of money ought to be abandoned, and we should make him merely an executive officer, and disconnect him entirely with all that matter, as other officers of the Government of a similar description are, and therefore we had to make a great many amendments to the bill to accomplish that object. The last amendment, the Senator will notice, provides for the payment of all this money into the Treasury of the United States, and that the payments out of it shall be made by draft in the ordinary form. With the exception of a few verbal amendments, the other amendments that have been adopted on the motion of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, who was charged by the committee with the duty of examining the bill thoroughly to see where it should be altered, were the necessary alterations to carry that improved system into effect.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I wish now to move an amendment upon my own responsibility, and then I will yield the floor. On page 49, section forty-three, line one, after the word "that" to strike out the words "the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, subject to regulations prescribed by;" in line four, after the word "Treasury" to strike out the words "shall be, and;" and after the word "authorized" in the same line to strike out the words "on appeal to him made, to remit, refund, and pay back all duties erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, and all duties that shall appear to be unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected, and also," and to insert the word "to;" so that the section will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to repay to collectors or deputy collectors the full amount of such sums of money as shall or may be recovered against them or any of them in any court, for any internal duties or licenses collected by them, with the costs and expenses of suit, and all damages and costs recovered against assessors, assistant assessors, collectors, deputy collectors, and inspectors, in any suit which shall be brought against them or any of them by reason of anything that shall or may be done in the due performance of their official duties, and also compromise such suits and all others relating to internal revenue.

Perhaps I ought to say a word in explanation of this amendment. The amendments which the Senate has already agreed to have made a very essential change in the character of this bill. As the bill stood originally this whole revenue was placed under the control of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. It was not only in his custody, but it was subject to his disposition. He audited the accounts and claims, and I do not know that there was any limitation to his authority to charge that fund with expenditures. He procured the printing of the stamps provided for the purpose of collecting a part of this revenue. He contracts for them as a matter of fact. The law gave him no directions whatever.

It has charged him with the duty of providing revenue stamps, but did not tell him how to do it, gave him no directions, no instructions, and imposed upon him no limitations; so that as a matter of practice, I understand, he contracts with competent engravers to furnish the Government with stamps, and they keep on hand enough to supply the Government. Stamps are like money in one respect, and in another respect they are a mere article of merchandise, because the law authorizes the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to sell them at a discount, to put them into the market and sell them by wholesale at a discount, and they are retailed at the price fixed by law; so that it was impossible upon that system of doing business for the Commissioner or for anybody else to know whether the amount of stamps afloat in the community was one million or one hundred million dollars. There was no possibility of his knowing anything about it.

The amendments which the Senate has already agreed to have provided that all the revenues collected under this bill shall be paid by the collecting agents just as the revenues derived from customs are paid into the Treasury of the United States, and being in the Treasury of the United States, they are under the same protection that the revenues derived from customs are, and can be only paid out upon appropriation; and every such payment is to be audited and adjusted hereafter as other payments have been heretofore. They provide also for placing these stamps under some restriction. That they are adequate for the protection of the Treasury I do not undertake to say. They afford some security, whereas before we had none.

There is one very essential advantage, I think, gained by these changes. The law as it stood, in addition to allowing the Commissioner to sell these stamps to everybody who would buy in sums of fifty dollars and upwards at a discount of five per cent., allowed him to sell such stamps as are required by the owners and proprietors of medicines at a discount of ten per cent., and then allowed him to select depositories wherever he chooses to do so, and to deposit with them these stamps without prepayment, and to allow them the highest rate of commission, which is ten per cent. for selling, taking of them a bond to pay over the proceeds once a month. By these amendments your stamps are disposed of by collectors. They are deposited with the collectors and their deputies throughout the whole country, and they are disposed of upon commission, never to exceed four per cent. in any case; and you have all these collectors and their deputies as their guardians. They are made the exclusive vendors of the stamps; they are made the guardians of this part of the revenue, and have an interest in watching over it and allowing no competitors in the work of selling stamps; so that I think this revenue is, by the amendments already adopted, placed in a more safe position than it was before.

But still there is one power given to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue in the section which I am now proposing to amend, which, it seems to me, if the Senate adhere to it, makes all the amendments you have agreed to entirely futile and useless; for I conceive that this section in the very words which I have proposed to strike out still gives the Commissioner of Internal Revenue unlimited and unrestricted authority over this whole revenue, all that part of it, at least, that is not derived from stamps; because it will be noticed that the words which I propose to strike out authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue—under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, to be sure—

On appeal to him made, to remit, refund, and pay back all duties erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, and all duties that shall appear to be unjustly assessed or excessive in amount, or in any manner wrongfully collected.

On appeal made to him, the Commissioner is authorized and empowered to remit and pay back to any man and every man just such part or the whole of his tax as he sees fit. This is on appeal to him, it is said; but it will be understood that this is not an appeal brought up to him regularly; it is an ex parte application made to him. It is heard on just such a case as the party sees fit to make up, subject, of course, always to the vigilance and integrity of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The present law provides that these different kinds of taxes shall be assessed by the assistant assessors. It gives to every man assessed a right to appeal to the assessor. It gives also to the Government the right to appeal to the assessor from the work of the assistant assessor. It is a qualified and quasi appeal that the Government has, and it is only to be exercised in certain cases. If an individual makes a return of the property he has to be assessed under oath, and the assistant assessor or the assessor is not satisfied with it, if he thinks it is not true, he may have a rehearing and investigation of it; he takes proof, examines witnesses, looks into papers, books, and all that on the subject of inquiry makes up the case, and if he judges the return to be untrue, then he imposes an additional tax, and the individual assessed can appeal also to the assessor, but the judgment of the assessor is final. After he has pronounced upon the sum that ought to be paid there is no further appeal. Then the warrant goes to the collector, and he is told the precise amount of money for him to collect of every individual. He collects it and it is paid into the Treasury. But when it gets to the Treasury, this provision which I propose to strike out tells any and every individual, "Let those papers, that evidence, that proof, remain with the assessor, but make your own application to the Commissioner; he has authority to remit any part of the tax that he sees fit." As I said before, if you give him that authority you will never know whether you have $10,000,000 in the Treasury belonging to you or $100,000; you will never know to whom the money in the Treasury belongs. It is for the Commissioner to tell you how much is yours and how much belongs to these individuals, and it is a power substantially in the Commissioner to adjust the taxation of every individual who is subject to taxation. I do not know of anything more dangerous than it is.

But now it is said that this authority must be somewhere, and it is said furthermore that it will not do to have this authority final in assistant assessor or in the assessor; I put it to the judgment of every Senator if it be not better made final with the assessor than with the Commissioner. The assessor is nearer the residence, the locality, of the person assessed. He has better opportunities of getting evidence, of examining the evidence in the case. He is likely to be as uninfluenced as the Commissioner, and is likely to be as unprejudiced as the Commissioner. Then he acts in the very community where the applicant lives, that is, in the very region, and the result of his action is going to be known. If he is perjured, if he is bribed, if he is dishonest, corrupt, or weak, and he remits the amount of this man's tax, it is known to the community. Then the collector knows how much the man pays. He makes it known to his neighbors, and the neighbors know whether he pays a less tax than those living about him. But when he makes an application to get a part of the tax he has paid out of the Treasury of the United States nobody knows anything about it.

It does seem to me that the only party who is ever going to be wronged in the assessment of these taxes is the Government. Individuals cannot be wronged. The power exists in the assistant assessor to do wrong, but he must do it willfully. In the first place, there is the oath of the party. Every man can limit the amount of his own tax by his own oath under this bill, unless his statement can be impeached by proof. When an individual goes to the assistant assessor with the schedule of the property that ought to be assessed and swears that that is true, the assistant assessor must take that as true unless he can impeach it upon proof. If he can find evidence that it is not true and submits that evidence to the assessor, the assessor may impose a higher tax. When the individual will not swear to his property, then the assistant assessor is directed by the law to get at the best estimate he can of the amount of property to be taxed, and to add a certain penalty, a certain percentage to it. It is meant to doom the man to pay an extravagant tax for refusing to make an exhibit of his property. In that case he may be injured, but it is his own fault, because he ought to have presented his schedule himself and sworn to it, giving this evidence himself. Therefore I see no probability, scarcely a possibility, for a man who is willing to pay an honest tax and will make an honest return ever to be oppressed by the action of the assessor or assistant assessor.

But suppose we admit there is a possibility of this, can any one tell me that that possibility or probability is any greater or any more imminent if you allow final jurisdiction to be exercised by the district assessor than it is when it is exercised by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue? The Commissioner of Internal Revenue having this final jurisdiction, there is just one man who has in his power the whole revenues of the Union. But if you give this final jurisdiction to the several district assessors, if any one or more of them are utterly corrupt, the jurisdiction of each one is limited to his own district; some of them will prove honest and faithful, and you will get some revenue; you will have the satisfaction of believing that it is not all under the control of any one man.

The revenues collected from customs are put into the Treasury. When a man wants to get his duties remitted he must come to Congress, or, after there has been a trial in the courts and a judgment, upon the record of that judgment he may appeal to the Secretary of the Treasury, as I understand the law. Here no such necessity is imposed upon the party dissatisfied with the amount of taxes he pays under this bill. Without any trial, without any proof, without any contestant, he can appeal to the Commissioner, and the Commissioner has the authority to remit just as much of his tax as he sees fit.

I think the amendment ought to be adopted, and I hope it will be. I had not the authority of the committee to move the amendment. There was not a majority of the committee in favor of it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say that the view which the committee had in relation to it (for this matter was discussed in committee) was simply this: they thought, taking the United States through, considering the number of officers and the number of persons in the community to be taxed, there would be very likely to be a great many errors in the assessment of these taxes, and that it would be rather oppressive to oblige every man who felt himself injured, and upon whom the taxes had been illegally assessed, to pay those taxes on the judgment of the assessor, and then come to Congress for relief; that there must be some officer charged with examining these matters and correcting the errors made by the assessors and assistant assessors. They concluded, therefore, to leave this section substantially as it is. We know how very difficult it is to get a bill through Congress, and we supposed that the matter would cost a great deal more to individuals than they would think it worth while to contend for by following it up. Besides the matter of fact, it might be very embarrassing to Congress itself. They concluded, therefore, to leave the Commissioner in the possession of this power.

The theory of our Government is that high officers are competent to discharge their duties and are honest men. If they are not, they should be removed and men in whom we have confidence should be appointed in their place. We cannot go upon the supposition that a man will abuse his power, especially a man holding an office of so much importance as this. It is an office of importance to almost every one under the Government.

The views which have been presented by my friend from Wisconsin are very strong, to be sure, but the committee could not, on the whole, come to the conclusion to strike out the section. It is for the Senate to decide. We have no feeling on the subject except to make the bill as good as possible.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if by his amendment he proposes to take away from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to refund a tax after it has been paid into the Treasury because of an error on the part of the assessor.

Mr. HOWE. The Secretary of the Treasury has no such authority; it is the Commissioner of Internal Revenue; but it is all the same. I propose to take it from all of them.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am not prepared to go that far.

Mr. CLARK. I hope this amendment will not be made, for the Senate will see at once that if all these assessors have the final power of adjudicating, and their decisions are to be final, we may have a great many very different decisions in different parts of the country. A man in one State may be compelled to pay a tax at a different rate or on almost a different article from another man in another State. An assessor in one State will hold this to be right, and an assessor in another State or district will hold that to be right. There should be some supervising power; there should be some head to whom we can all come. If I pay taxes in New Hampshire and another man pays taxes in Missouri, he should pay the taxes upon the same rate and principle that I do. If this amendment should be adopted the assessor in New Hampshire may say, you shall pay so and so, and the assessor in Missouri may say, you shall pay differently; and there will be nobody to whom we can appeal to say how that fact shall be. There should be somebody to whom we can come, and the committee saw no better way than to retain this provision in the bill, and I hope it will be retained.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The amendment was lengthy, and the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin upon it was very able and lengthy; but I do not understand it very fully. It seems to me that when a tax has been paid into the Treasury, it ought not to be paid back again upon the discretion of any Treasury officer, but a correction should be made if a man is illegally assessed before the money is paid. I admit all that the Senator from New Hampshire says, that there are likely to be errors in the assessment; but they ought to be corrected before the tax is paid. If a man is wronged in the assessment, he ought to make his application before he pays the money. If the bill does not provide a relief of that sort, it should be so amended as to give him a remedy before he pays the money; but I am not in favor of allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay money out of the Treasury unless Congress appropriates it. It seems to me that money cannot be paid out except by an appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. CLARK. This does not provide for that. There is a provision, however, that the Commissioner may refund it; but if the section is retained, that may be corrected; so that we can have the appeal without the payment of the money, and have the assessment corrected.

Mr. HOWE. The difficulties which the Senator from New Hampshire desires to avoid I think are just as likely to be encountered by retaining this section, and a great deal more so, than by making the amendment that I propose. He says, if this jurisdiction be final with the several district assessors you may have a different rule of taxation in one district from what you have in another. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue under this bill as it stands is never going to settle any rule of taxation by any decision that he makes. Why? Simply because it is an ex parte application made by this individual or that to the Commissioner for some reason or other to remit a part of the tax that he has paid. He makes out his own case. The public never knows what it is unless the Commissioner sees fit to make it public.

But if such a provision was inserted in the bill as the Senator from Indiana suggests the case would be very different. The assistant assessor adopts some wrong principle or comes to some wrong conclusion from which the individual appeals to the assessor, or upon some appeal to the assessor the assessor adopts a wrong principle or comes to a wrong conclusion: what then? The individual is dissatisfied, still complains, and still prosecutes his appeal to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or the Secretary of the Treasury. What is the result? Then the papers, the very proof which the assistant assessor or the assessor is acting upon, go out; the fact that there is an appeal is known to the community; the fact that this individual protests against the sum imposed upon him is known to the community; they look at the case; it becomes a piece of litigation in which the neighborhood are more or less interested, and with which they are more or less conversant. That makes a cause, and when that cause is decided that judgment will be as public as the cause was.

There is but little danger from such a course of procedure except the danger that arises from overwhelming the head of a single bureau with the number of these applications. Whether there is any great danger of that or not, I cannot say. I should not have serious objection to such a provision as that; but this is a very different thing. This is an authority which allows the Commissioner to put his hand right into the Treasury, or rather to make the Secretary put his hand in any time on the application of any man to draw out to the extent of the whole fund there, or rather to the extent of that portion of the fund which the applicant has paid in.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to amend the amendment which has been adopted in committee on page 144 by striking out "thirty-five" and inserting "forty-five;" so that it will read:

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco not herein provided for, from which the stem has been taken in whole or in part, or which is sweetened, forty-five cents per pound.

That will make it correspond with the tax already imposed on fine-cut.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. The Senator from Michigan seems to place its adoption upon the ground that forty-five cents has been levied upon fine-cut chewing tobacco. I do not know what is the state of case in Michigan; but in my State the very finest qualities of tobacco are put in fine-cut; there is no common or ordinary tobacco ever put up in that shape. So far as I am concerned, I should like to see tobacco graded so that the quality of tobacco that sells for less than twenty cents should be taxed so much, that over twenty cents so much, and that over thirty cents so much; but the Committee on Finance, as I understand, prefer not to grade tobacco, not to fix the price of the article, because in that way frauds have been committed. They have therefore undertaken to distinguish it by different kinds of manufacture. They place this tax of thirty-five cents on "cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco not herein provided for." That includes tobacco which does not cost in my State over three, four, or five cents per pound in the leaf. Vast quantities of tobacco are manufactured in that shape; and to pay a tax of forty-five cents a pound on the manufacture of it seems to me to be a most exorbitant rate.

I will state that there is one article of manufactured tobacco named here, the article of twist, which in my State always includes in the manufacture a very fine article of tobacco; and the Senator might include "twist" in the forty-five-cent schedule; but I do not think we should include cavendish tobacco, which simply means plug tobacco. The word "plug" need not have been used after it in this clause. Cavendish, as I understand, was formerly a plug weighing so much, say eight or sixteen ounces, a half pound or a pound plug; but they now use the words "plug" and "cavendish" to mean the same thing. Either one would have been sufficient.

To charge forty-five cents a pound upon ordinary tobacco, a great deal of it lug tobacco that is put in the plug, will be doing injustice to the parties who manufacture that tobacco. It is now proposed to put it on an equality with fine-cut tobacco. I understand that in my State the very finest quality of leaf tobacco is manufactured into fine-cut. The manufacturer can very well afford to transport it, bulky as it is, because of its fine quality. It would be very hard upon the manufacturer of plug tobacco in the extreme West to compel him to pay a tax equal to the tax that is levied upon the very finest quality of tobacco. I know the Senator can answer me that very fine tobacco is put up in the plug. I am aware of that. The very finest qualities of tobacco are sometimes put up in that shape, and if it could be graded by the value of the article I should be perfectly willing to see it done; but inasmuch as the committee leave all these descriptions of tobacco together in this clause, of course it includes a very inferior quality of tobacco. I think it would be exceedingly unjust to put upon an equality with the fine-cut tobacco, which is generally put up in small parcels, and which can afford to be put in tin-foil. I think the amendment ought not to be adopted.

Mr. CHANDLER. The same qualities of tobacco precisely are cut and packed. In fact, some of the very highest grades, the highest-priced tobaccos are put up in the shape of a Virginia plug. What is called Virginia plug is a tobacco that sold for about a dollar a pound when this fine-cut sold for sixty or seventy cents. I repeat, the same grades precisely are used in the fine-cut and in the plug and twist. This is an unjust discrimination, to charge upon one article of the same value forty-five cents, and upon the other thirty-five cents. I would not object to the Senator's proposition to tax them by grades; but I am told by the Committee on Finance that it is found utterly impossible to prevent frauds if they make these grades, and therefore they have adopted the policy of charging the same upon all of a particular kind of manufacture. I care not whether this tax be raised to forty-five cents or the other reduced to thirty-five cents; all I ask is that no unfair, unjust discrimination shall be made against the fine-cut. That is a business which is growing very rapidly, and is becoming a business of enormous magnitude. I should think the city of Detroit must have paid over a million dollars into the Treasury on the fine-cut upon the small tax we assessed last year, and will this year undoubtedly pay two or three millions; but the largest manufacturers there tell me that this discrimination of ten cents a pound will utterly destroy the business. I simply ask that they be equalized.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON. I really do not know what may be the case in his State, and I desire now to get some information on that subject, because it will control my vote in reference to the other point. I desire to ask him if the common grades of tobacco are ever cut in his State.

Mr. CHANDLER. They are sometimes; but there has been a competition among our tobacco-nists to produce the best article that can be found in the United States, and I think perhaps in Detroit they cut a better quality of tobacco than they do in any other State. There has been a sort of emulation, a competition between our manufacturers to see who should make the best article, and I think they cut, perhaps, a better tobacco than they do anywhere else; but still they do cut all grades. They cut every grade that they pack.

Mr. HENDERSON. But for fine-cut chewing tobacco do they cut any except the best grades?

Mr. CHANDLER. I say ordinary tobacco is cut.

Mr. HENDERSON. Commercially the word is understood, "fine-cut chewing tobacco." That is always a fine grade.

Mr. CHANDLER. They cut as many different grades as they pack. It is a mere matter of choice with them whether they will cut the finest or that which is not so good. Any chewer of tobacco will understand that he purchases very different qualities at different places, and that is owing to the quality of the leaf which is cut.

I hope this amendment will be adopted. I believe it will increase the revenue. If it should not be adopted I shall ask that the fine-cut be restored back to the tax of thirty-five cents a pound, where it stood before the committee took it out of that list. I think the amendment ought to be adopted. I think this is an unjust discrimination, and I think the Senate will not be disposed to make such an unjust discrimination against the cutters of our tobacco. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I must confess I am somewhat in doubt whether this amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan ought not to be made. I do not feel entirely certain that we should discriminate between those different kinds of tobacco. When I offered the amendment in regard to fine-cut, I acted upon such information as I thought assured me in making that amendment. I am not entirely certain upon information that I have since received and a more thorough examination whether there should be any discrimination.

But there is another point to which I want to call the Senator's attention, and that is, the price of chewing tobacco. I have all the time been rather in doubt whether the tax of thirty-five cents upon chewing tobacco was high enough, and whether it would not be better to put on a higher tax. I submit to the Senate whether it may not be better to adopt this amendment, make the tax forty-five cents upon the grades of chewing tobacco, and then it will go to the committee of conference, and if there is a necessity of altering anything it can be done. The difficulty that arises here is this: one man manufactures this kind of tobacco, another man manufactures that, and a third another kind; there is a rivalry between them; they are trying to crowd their own interest a little by the other, and I query whether we have not put a discrimination on fine-cut that ought not to be put upon it by the amendment that we have heretofore adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. When the Senator from New Hampshire suggested the increase upon fine-cut chewing tobacco my idea was that the fine-cut chewing tobacco perhaps could stand an increase over and above the cavendish or plug tobacco, for the simple reason that in the plug tobacco there is a very ordinary quality of tobacco very frequently manufactured. Large quantities of it are manufactured in my State that will not cost over five cents a pound. I never heard of a cutter of tobacco there putting up tobacco unless it was a very valuable article, that is, very fine chewing tobacco; but it is a well-known fact that large quantities of very inferior ordinary tobacco are manufactured into plug. As fine-cut tobacco, therefore, was made of a higher grade I thought it could stand a superior tax. The Senator from Michigan says that inferior tobacco is sometimes put up as fine chewing tobacco. I was not aware of that. If such be the fact I am perfectly willing to put them on an equality.

My opinion is that thirty-five cents on all qualities of plug tobacco would be a very high price. I know there is a large quantity of plug tobacco that can stand forty-five cents, and I am perfectly willing to see it imposed; but if the committee will not make a discrimination as to price or grade I am unwilling to drive out of the business a large number of manufacturers in my State.

I have no interest in this. I am not in the interest of the tobacco manufacturers or anybody else. I do not own a pound of this article; I never did, and never expect to do so. I have been urged by some manufacturers in my State to see that a tax of fifty cents a pound be put upon tobacco; but I find that they are the owners of large stocks on hand, and they can afford to have a high tax. I find that the planters are unanimous against it. I find no farmer in the State in favor of an increase over and above thirty-five cents.

If, therefore, the Senator from Michigan insists on putting this tobacco on equality with fine-cut, if he thinks that otherwise it will discriminate against his State—I am sure I do not wish to discriminate against anybody—and if it be but just in the estimation of the Senate to put all qualities at the same rate, I am perfectly willing to vote so; but I do not think it would be just to impose this very extraordinary tax upon the large quantity of common tobacco that is put up in the western States. I could go on to state how it would operate very harshly against our manufacturers and farmers in the West; but I do not wish to occupy the time of the Senate or delay its action.

I have stated these facts, and I think I know of what I speak, without being influenced by the say-so of anybody. I have been urged by various parties to reduce or increase; but I have looked at it from a disinterested point of view. I am in hopes that no increase of this tax will be made. I would rather decrease the amount of the tax on fine-cut if it is calculated to be unjust, or I should be perfectly willing to put twist tobacco, which is always a superior quality of tobacco, with the fine-cut, and impose the same tax upon it. I never heard of twist tobacco that was not made of the very finest quality. Twist and fine-cut are always put up of the very best quality of tobacco, according to my notion of the manufacture, and I have seen an immense deal of it; but the plug tobacco is put up with an immense quantity of licorice put over it. It is common lug tobacco, as it is called by the planters. It is sent up the Mississippi river into Wisconsin among the choppers in the pineries, and is sent to the Indians in the Northwest. They buy large quantities of it, and it is put up expressly for that trade. Thirty-five cents would be a most exorbitant tax upon it. We know very well that the article that is chewed by individuals who can afford to pay these heavy prices is the fine-cut tobacco and the twist tobacco. I should be perfectly willing to put twist tobacco in that first grade; I would have no objection to that; but I do object to taxing all plug tobacco forty-five cents.

I think it would be exorbitant, and I do not think it would be well to do it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Fessenden, Foster, Harlan, Harris, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Carlisle, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Hicks, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, and Sherman—14.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, and Wright—16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move further to amend the bill on page 121, section eighty-nine, line thirty-six, by striking out the words "stemmed tobacco," to conform with the other amendments that have been made. We impose no tax on stemmed tobacco, and it is not necessary to retain those words. I move, also, in line thirty-eight, to strike out the words that were inserted by the committee, "or place of stemming," and the same words in line forty-four, "or place of stemming." They are not now necessary. I move, also, to strike out the words "stemmed tobacco" in line fifty-one and also in line fifty-three. On page 124, section ninety, line two, I move the same amendment, to strike out the words "stemmed tobacco." On page 125, section ninety-one, I move the same amendment, to strike out the words "stemmed tobacco" where they occur in lines four, eight, and twelve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) Those amendments will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLARK. On page 125, section ninety-one, line eight, after the word "cigars," I move to strike out the words "upon which the duty imposed by law has not been paid," and to insert "which have not been inspected, branded, or stamped as required by this act, or upon which the tax has not been paid if it has accrued or become payable;" so that it will read:

That if any person other than the manufacturer shall sell, or consign, or remove for sale, or part with the possession of any manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, upon which the duties imposed by law have not been paid, with the knowledge thereof, such person shall be liable to a penalty of $100 for each and every offense. And any person who shall purchase or receive for sale any such tobacco, snuff, or cigars, which have not been inspected, branded, or stamped as required by this act, or upon which the tax has not been paid if it has accrued or become payable, with knowledge thereof, shall be liable to a penalty of fifty dollars for each and every offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 123, section eighty-nine, line forty-seven, after the word "manufacturer" I move to strike out the words "whether manufacturing for himself or others," and to insert "or the person for whom the goods are manufactured, as the assessor may deem best for the collection of the revenue."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. On page 145, section ninety-three, I move to strike out from line four hundred and sixty-three to line four hundred and seventy-five, inclusive, in the following words:

On cigars known as cheroots or short sizes, made of ref. use tobacco, and valued at not over $7 per thousand, $3 per thousand.

On cigars, not otherwise provided for, valued at not over $10 per thousand, $5 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $10 and not over $20 per thousand, $5 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $20 and not over $40 per thousand, $15 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $40 and not over $75 per thousand, $25 per thousand; valued at over $75 per thousand, $40 per thousand.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

On cigarettes made of tobacco inclosed in a paper wrapper, valued at not over $7 per hundred packages, each containing not more than twenty-five cigarettes, $1 per hundred packages.

On cigarettes made wholly of tobacco, and also on those known as cheroots or short sizes, valued in each case at not over $6 per thousand, $3 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $6 and not over $15 per thousand, $8 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $15 and not over $30 per thousand, $15 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $30 and not over $45 per thousand, $25 per thousand.

On cigars, valued at over $45 per thousand, $40 per thousand.

And the valuation of cigars herein mentioned shall in all cases be the value of the cigars exclusive of the tax.

This amendment is necessary not only to provide for the cigarettes, but also to prevent certain of these valuations from escaping the tax. For instance, take the cigars valued from $10 to $20 per thousand. If they cost $11 without the tax and you impose a tax of $8, they will not come up to the value of $20; but if you impose the $15 they do come up to that and will pay the tax; so that one assessor might impose the tax of $8 and another of $15. It is the practice of the assessors to value them with the tax on. I propose to change that and make it the rule for them to value them with the tax off. I leave the valuation or prices very much as they were in the old bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the leave of the Senator I move that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I have one further amendment to offer. It is to insert at the end of section ninety-three, on page 146, the following:

And every cigar maker or apprentice cigar maker, or other person, before making any cigars, after the passage of this act, shall apply for and procure from the assistant assessor of the district in which he or she resides, a permit authorizing such person to carry on the trade of cigar making, for which permit he or she shall pay said assistant assessor the sum of fifty cents.

And every cigar maker or apprentice cigar maker, or any other person employed or working at the business of cigar making in any other district than that in which he or she is a resident, shall, before making any cigars in such other district, present said permit to the assistant assessor of the district where so employed or working, and procure the indorsement of said assistant assessor thereon, authorizing said business in said district, for which indorsement the assistant assessor shall be entitled to receive from the applicant the sum of ten cents.

And it shall be the duty of every assistant assessor, upon application of any cigar maker or apprentice cigar maker, or other person residing in his district, to furnish a permit, or to indorse upon the permit of the applicant, if resident in another district, authority to pursue the trade of cigar making within the proper district of such assistant assessor. Said assistant assessor shall keep a record of all permits granted or indorsed by him showing the date of each permit, the name, residence, and place of employment of the party named therein, the name and district of the officer who originally granted the same, or who may have made any subsequent indorsement thereon, and the name or names of the party or parties by whom the cigar maker or apprentice named in such permit is employed, or, if working for himself or herself, stating such fact.

And every person making cigars shall keep an accurate account of all the cigars made by him, for whom, and their kind or quality; and if made for any other person than himself, shall state in said account the name of the person for whom the same were made and his place of business; and such person shall, on the first Monday of every month, deliver to the assistant assessor of the district a copy of such account, verified by oath or affirmation that the same is true and correct.

And if any person shall make any cigars without procuring such permit, or the proper indorsement thereon, he shall be punished by a fine of five dollars for each day he shall so offend, or by imprisonment for such time as the court may order for each day's offense, not exceeding thirty days in the whole upon any one conviction. And if any person making cigars shall fail to make the return herein required, or shall make a false return, he shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days.

And if any person, firm, company, or corporation shall employ or procure any person to make cigars who has not the permit or the indorsement thereon required by this act, he or they shall be punished by a fine of ten dollars for each day he or they shall so employ such person, or by imprisonment not exceeding ten days. And if any person shall be found making cigars without such permit or the indorsement thereon the collector of the district may seize any cigars or tobacco for making cigars which may be found in possession of such person, and the same shall be forfeited to the United States and sold, and one half of the proceeds paid to the United States and the other half to the collector making the seizure.

This amendment is necessary to prevent a great many frauds that are committed in the large cities by persons who manufacture cigars in out-of-the-way places, in cellars or garrets, and move about almost from day to day so that you can get no trace of them. They make cigars and go into the market and sell them and pay no tax on them at all. This amendment requires every cigar maker to procure a permit at a small price; the assistant assessor is to grant a permit to anybody who applies; and then they are to keep a record of the number of cigars they make and make returns to the assistant assessor, so that he can trace the matter. If he goes into a place and finds a man making cigars in this way without a permit, he can take what he has got there and appropriate it; but as the law now stands he may go into a place where he finds a man making cigars in this way, but he cannot seize them; and when he comes back the next day he is gone. In that way, the business becomes, you may say, transitory and fraudulent.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is a very good provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I move a reconsideration of the vote taken a little while ago increasing the duty on plug tobacco from thirty-five to forty-five cents a pound.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to inquire of the Senator if he desires to keep up the distinction or wants to reduce the tax on the low-priced.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no anxiety about it myself; but at the request of a Senator who desires to make a statement, I have moved the reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves to reconsider the vote increasing the rate of duty on "cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco not herein provided for, from which the stem has been taken out in whole or in part, or which is sweetened," from thirty-five to forty-five cents per pound.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senate will reconsider that vote. The Senator from New Hampshire wished to know what was to be done after the reconsideration. I will state that I am willing to vote to reduce the fine-cut to thirty-five cents. That is the object I have in view. I am clearly of opinion that this manufacture will not bear a tax of forty-five cents a pound. I think it will ruin the business.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the vote will be allowed to remain as it is now. The tax is simply on the chewing tobacco, and each Senator can form his own judgment on the question whether chewing tobacco will stand the proposed tax. I suppose every Senator desires to have as large a tax imposed upon it as it will bear.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to correct the Senator. The first clause does not confine it to chewing tobacco; it does not say "all plug tobacco which is chewing tobacco." It does not define ~~it~~ to be chewing tobacco. Tobacco is very frequently put up in that shape and smoked.

Mr. CLARK. No person is compelled to smoke it; he need not do so unless he chooses; he can get the ordinary smoking tobacco, which pays twenty-five cents duty. If he chooses to take the plug, twist, or fine-cut that pays forty-five cents, and chew it, nobody will object, I think, and the Government will get the tax.

Mr. HENDERSON. You define the other as smoking tobacco.

Mr. CLARK. It is not necessary to define this as chewing tobacco, because everybody knows it is; but if a man chooses to smoke it there is no objection if he pays the tax.

Mr. HENDERSON. A cheap article of smoking tobacco is very frequently put up in plugs.

Mr. CLARK. It need not be put up in that shape.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. CLARK. If a man desires to avoid the high tax he will not put it up in that shape; but if he does put it up in that shape as chewing tobacco, why not let him pay the tax? It is entirely at his option. This will not tend, as I understand it, to diminish the production of tobacco, because people will chew; and I apprehend they will chew just about as much if the tax be forty-five as if it be thirty-five cents. If you now put it back to thirty-five cents it will be precisely the grade fixed by the House of Representatives, and the question will not be before the committee of conference for consideration. I suggest that it had better be left as it is now, though I have no wish about it except to arrive at a correct conclusion, and give the country as large a tax on the article as it will fairly bear, and not by and by carry it up again.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was perfectly willing to make a distinction between the different qualities of tobacco, to take the more valuable and impose a tax of forty-five cents a pound on it, and then take that which is less valuable and impose a tax of thirty-five cents a pound; but some of our western friends insist that it will not do to make any discrimination; and as our eastern friends too say it will not do to make a discrimination, and they get up first one quality and then hitch up another quality by dividing us, I insist that we reconsider this vote and then that we put them upon an equality if gentlemen will not make any distinction between the finer qualities of tobacco. My understanding is that fine-cut chewing tobacco is the very finest quality, and that it will not do to put up an ordinary article of tobacco in that shape. I thought, therefore, that that would stand a tax of forty-five cents; but if you impose a tax of forty-five cents a pound on the plug tobacco, one half of which is of the most ordinary quality, I say you almost ruin the business in Iowa and Missouri, and several other western States. The Senator from Michigan has stated a fact of which I was not before aware, that an ordinary quality of tobacco is put up and called fine-cut. I had thought differently. I know that the manufacturers who manufacture fine-cut very largely in my State always use a superior quality of tobacco. But if we are to be hitched up in this way, first on one side and then on the other, I insist that Senators representing States that are interested in this production do not suffer this interest to be entirely overcome and destroyed. For my part, rather than see a tax levied upon plug tobacco which it cannot stand, I will vote with the Senator from Michigan to reduce fine-cut to thirty-five cents. I wish to be perfectly frank on this subject and let gentlemen understand my position, not that I do not think the superior qualities can stand a tax of forty-five cents, but if Senators will make no discrimination I will accept the proposition and make none myself.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that there is something radically wrong in the system that we have attempted to adopt here in regard to the tax on tobacco. Why there should be the same tax imposed on the meanest and most miserable quality of tobacco that there is on the highest quality of tobacco, I am utterly unable to perceive. We all know that the finest tobacco which is raised in this country is raised in the Connecticut valley. Such tobacco as finds a market at Springfield and Greenfield, Massachusetts, and Hartford, Connecticut, is worth four times as much as the best quality of tobacco that is raised in the West. Under this bill, although a million pounds of tobacco in the Connecticut valley may be worth $4,000,000, and a million pounds of the best tobacco in Missouri or Iowa is only worth $1,000,000, you tax that million pounds in Iowa or Missouri precisely as the $4,000,000 worth of tobacco in the Connecticut valley. That seems very hard to my sense of justice and right.

Then, in order to make the thing still worse, we have to-day adopted an amendment by which we have declared that the meanest kind of lug tobacco, which is made out of the outside leaves of tobacco, such as the farmers in New Hampshire and Maine and Vermont use to destroy the hoof-rot in sheep and kill "ticks" in lambs, and which is hardly fit for any other purpose in the world, shall pay the same tax as the finest quality of cavendish tobacco that was worth a dollar a pound before this rebellion began. Does that look reasonable? Is it right that we should tax that miserable tobacco, which is hardly ever used except for the purpose I have stated, thirty-five or forty-five cents a pound, as much as we tax cavendish tobacco that gentlemen were willing to pay a dollar a pound for before the rebellion began? It seems to me not.

I trust that this amendment will be reconsidered, and that some scheme will be devised so that we shall have an equitable rule established by which tobacco is to be assessed and pay according to what it is legitimately worth, and not to absolutely fix the same tax upon every quality of tobacco, whether it be good, bad, or indifferent.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Missouri speaks about hitching up one side and then hitching up the other. Will the Senator from Missouri bear in mind at whose suggestion one side was first hitched up?

Mr. HENDERSON. I can state that the Senator asked me about the grades of tobacco, and I told him that the finer articles of tobacco, the twist and fine-cut, could stand a higher tax. I stated so in my remarks; I state so now. I have stated every time I have been on the floor that there ought to be a discrimination between the superior quality of tobacco and the ordinary quality. I have stated that fine-cut and twist tobacco can better stand forty-five cents than ordinary plug tobacco can stand twenty cents; but I cannot get that discrimination; Senators will not let me have it. The Finance Committee insist that there can be no discrimination; that to allow it will lead to fraud. I do not desire to have the manufacturers in my State of the ordinary quality of tobacco broken up in order to get what I think is right. I think it is right to impose a superior tax on superior tobacco.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to inquire whether the Senator is willing that the tax on fine-cut, which is now fixed at forty-five cents, shall go back to thirty-five with the rest.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not think that is right; but rather than vote to break up the manufacturers of my State, I will vote to put these grades back on an equality.

Mr. CLARK. I desire mainly to avoid the discrimination; I do not care so much myself whether the tax is thirty-five cents or forty-five cents; I am willing to leave that to the judgment of Senators.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will not divide the western Senators on a subject of this sort. I desire to carry the measure, and I do not wish our people to be oppressively taxed.

Mr. CLARK. Everybody will see that you cannot have such a tax as the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Iowa proposes. You cannot say that tobacco used to kill "ticks" shall be taxed but five cents a pound; that tobacco of the finest quality shall be taxed so and so, and the next quality so and so.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask whether tobacco cannot be examined and graded by the inspectors just as well as whisky. You establish a grade for whisky; you say that a gallon of first proof shall pay so much, and that if it is double proof it shall pay double as much. Individuals acquainted with this business, inspectors appointed for the purpose, can tell the quality of tobacco just as well as a man can tell whether whisky is first or second proof. There is no difficulty about it. But the Finance Committee insist that it shall not be done; I say it ought to be done. I noticed the other day a sale of tobacco in Louisville, Kentucky, at four dollars a pound in the leaf. Suppose that tobacco is put up into chewing tobacco, is it right that it should pay no more tax than the lug tobacco spoken of by the Senator from Iowa which is put up into plug tobacco? I say not. That tobacco is not worth over three, four, or five cents a pound at the outside, even at the present high prices, and ordinarily it was worth from a cent and a half to two cents before the rebellion.

Mr. CLARK. Commercially, I suppose first proof and second proof are well known and established in reference to spirits. There is no first proof of tobacco.

Mr. HENDERSON. But there is first quality, second quality, third quality.

Mr. CLARK. But they run into each other; there is no distinct line of division. You may have plug tobacco good or bad, you may have twist good or bad, you may have cavendish good or bad, you may have fine-cut good or bad. You have to tax by the kind.

Mr. HENDERSON. You can have inspectors.

Mr. CLARK. Different inspectors would have different lines. Neither can you value it by the price; for if you say that tobacco valued at such a number of cents per pound shall pay so much tax, and so on, you would have the line fluctuating continually, and the man who was sharp would get his tobacco of good quality under the line, and you would have continued frauds all the time. You must take some well-defined line, as between smoking and chewing, or the grades of chewing and smoking.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will suggest to the Senator, with his permission, that whatever efforts may be made by the manufacturers in my State with the view which he suggests, the very moment the tobacco is sent to New York and looked at by a purchaser there, he can tell the exact quality of the tobacco, and precisely what to pay for it. The difference in quality and price will be known to the inspectors and purchasers. When a box of tobacco is opened, I care not how it is branded, a man who knows anything of the business can tell within half a cent what it is worth.

Mr. CLARK. Let us see how that would work. A hoghead of tobacco is sent to the New York market. It is opened or sampled. The man who goes to buy it knows what he is willing to give for it. "I will give you so many cents," but can you leave that to an assessor about a tax? Can you permit the assessor to go and look into a hoghead and say what kind of tobacco that is, and how much tax he will put upon it? The law has got to fix the tax before he sees the tobacco.

Mr. HENDERSON. The very thing to which the Senator objects was done in the law of 1862.

Mr. CLARK. I beg the Senator's pardon. In the present law it is just as it is here: cavendish, plug, &c., fifteen cents; it is not graded by quality.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is in the law of 1862. I have it before me, and I will read from it:

"On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, fine-cut, and manufactured of all descriptions, (not including snuff, cigars, and smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in, or made exclusively of stems,) valued at more than thirty cents per pound, fifteen cents per pound; valued at any sum not exceeding thirty cents per pound, ten cents per pound."

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will go on he will find:

"On smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in, five cents per pound."

And if he will go further he will find it more distinctly defined still.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will admit that by that law the value of tobacco at thirty cents a pound was the dividing line; all over that was taxed fifteen cents; all under ten cents.

Mr. CLARK. As to that particular kind; and the frauds under that particular kind have been such that it is found absolutely necessary to ignore that line of division, or you will get the lowest tax on all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am so informed by members of the Finance Committee; but I heard nothing before of frauds of this sort.

Mr. CLARK. I have occasion to know from information I have from the largest districts of the country where most of the tobacco is manufactured and sold, that such is the state of the case, and that the tax cannot be well enforced if that line of distinction be continued, and hence the House Committee of Ways and Means left it out entirely, and I believe the Finance Committee of the Senate are unanimous that you cannot tax it in that way and secure a revenue. We think the dividing line between smoking and chewing tobacco is distinct, and we have made but one grade of smoking tobacco for the purpose of securing the duty. I have no particular wish about this matter except that the tax should be made equal on the same kind. I was induced to recommend a tax of forty-five cents on fine-cut upon limited information. I do not think that distinction should be made.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire of the Senator why a distinction cannot be made as to the value of tobacco for the purpose of assessing it, as well as a distinction in the value of cigars?

Mr. CLARK. Because the value of cigars, as I am told, is determined very much by the way they are made; and we have provided that every box of cigars before it is put into the market shall be inspected by an inspector. We have several grades. He goes through and determines which of those grades the particular cigars fall within, and puts a stamp upon them. There is no such provision in regard to tobacco; there cannot be.

Mr. GRIMES. There is no such provision in the bill, I know; but perhaps the Senator is aware that in tobacco-growing States there always have been inspectors of tobacco under State authority who have done that.

Mr. CLARK. Not in that way.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator would inquire of gentlemen representing tobacco States, of the Senators from Missouri and Kentucky, he would find that it is so.

Mr. CLARK. There are inspectors of chewing tobacco, but not in the way we have provided for cigars. The Senator asked me to give a reason why it should not be done in reference to tobacco as well as in reference to cigars.

Mr. GRIMES. I know there is no such provision here in reference to tobacco; but the Senator has failed to show me why such a division cannot be made in regard to tobacco as it is in regard to cigars. He says the cigars are made in different ways. So is tobacco. Nearly all cigars—we know how they are made—are made of Connecticut-grown wrappers, and the best qualities filled with Cuba filling. What is there peculiar about that? They are going to continue to make them precisely as they have been making them. I cannot see any reason why an inspector of tobacco cannot just as readily determine the value of the article as the inspector of cigars can determine the value of the cigars.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to be perfectly frank in relation to this matter. I think that the proposition as it has been adopted, as I told the Senator from New Hampshire at the time that he charged me with having told him that I—

Mr. CLARK. I charged the Senator with nothing.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator said that I suggested that the finer qualities of chewing tobacco could stand forty-five cents.

Mr. CLARK. No. I inquired who first made the suggestion.

Mr. HENDERSON. I admit that I so suggested, and I did it for the purpose of making a revenue; but I had no idea at that time that the Senator would take the most common qualities of tobacco and put them on an equality with the finest chewing tobacco. I stated to the Senator that a discrimination ought to be made between fine tobacco and the common kind, that they ought not to be put upon the same footing. Now, while I am up and am talking on this subject, I desire to call attention to an outrageous discrimination which has just been alluded to by the Senator from Iowa; and I have suggested it to the Senator from New Hampshire, but have never said a word about it in the Senate. A tax of 45 cents a pound upon common chewing tobacco which costs say five, six, or seven cents a pound after it is manufactured is a very high tax. If the tobacco costs 7 cents, a tax of 45 cents would be over 600 per cent. When you come to cigars, what is the tax? The article of which cigars are made is grown largely in the New England States, very largely in the State of Connecticut. What sort of discrimination is made here? While you impose a tax of three, four, or five hundred per cent. on manufactured tobacco which is grown in the western States, when you come to the article of cigars made of tobacco grown in New England, what sort of discrimination do you make?

On cigars valued at over $10 and not over $20 per thousand, $5 per thousand.

Cigars worth $20 per thousand pay $8 a thousand as tax, 40 per cent., while you tax us five or six hundred per cent. I said at the same time to the Senator from New Hampshire, as he will bear me witness, that these cigars ought to be taxed higher.

Again:

On cigars valued at over $20 and not over $40 per thousand, $15 per thousand.

Cigars worth $40 a thousand are taxed $15, or only 37½ per cent. Is there any equality about a thing of this sort? I say there is not, and I mentioned the matter in conversation to the Senator at the same time.

On cigars valued at over $40, and not over $75 per thousand, $25 per thousand; valued at over $75 per thousand, $40 per thousand.

Cigars valued at $75 or $100 a thousand are taxed only $40 a thousand by this bill, while you are taxing us three or four hundred per cent. on various articles of manufactured tobacco. If there is any justice in this I have failed to see it. I have never opened my mouth in the Senate in regard to this discrimination, but I feel it my duty now to do it, and I call attention to it.

I called the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to it, and I asked that it should be made equal. I said to him that I thought a tax of 35 cents a pound upon the various articles of plug tobacco was exorbitant. At the same time I stated to him that a tax of 45 cents a pound may be very well laid upon the finest article of fine-cut tobacco and upon twist tobacco, but it will be injurious to the other articles. If no other discrimination can be made, if the committee will consent to none other, then I will vote with the Senator from Michigan to reduce the tax entirely to 35 cents. I do not wish to be sectional; but if the manufacturers in our country are to be broken up, if Senators from New England will vote in a body and will make no discrimination, if after raising the finer quality with a view to get revenue they then bring up the coarser qualities of tobacco, I, for one, am ready, and I am frank in saying so, to go back and put it all at 35 cents apound.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It being now half past four, the Senate will take a recess until seven o'clock this evening.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 29th of April, a copy of the report made by the military commission appointed to examine into military operations in the Western department, of which commission Major General McDowell was president, together with all letters in the War Department touching the subjects embraced in that report; which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 90) to refer the claim of Nahum Ward back to the Court of Claims was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

D. FITZGERALD AND J. BALL.

MR. CHANDLER. I ask leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate passed the bill (S. No. 244) for the relief of Daniel Fitzgerald and Jonathan Ball.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent.

MR. HALE objected to its withdrawal, but subsequently said: Some explanation has been made to me which induces me to withdraw my objection to the withdrawal of the motion to reconsider by the Senator from Michigan.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn; and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn if there be no further objection.

PUNISHMENT OF COUNTERFEITING.

MR. VAN WINKLE. I move to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 455) to punish and prevent the counterfeiting of coin of the United States.

The motion was agreed to by unanimous consent; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that if any person, except as now authorized by law, shall hereafter make or cause to be made, or shall utter or pass, or attempt to utter or pass, any coins of gold or silver, or other metals or alloys of metals, intended for the use and purpose of current money, whether in the resemblance of coins of the United States or of foreign countries, or of original design, he shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding $3,000, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years, or both, at the discretion of the court, according to the aggravation of the offense.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CENSUS IN 1865.

MR. HARRIS. I move to take up for consideration Senate joint resolution No. 45.

MR. HALE. What is it?

MR. FOOT. Before the question is put upon giving unanimous consent, I think the mover or the Chair ought to direct that the title of the bill or joint resolution should be given so that Senators may know what it is, in order to decide whether they are to give unanimous consent or not.

MR. HARRIS. It is simply in relation to the taking of a census.

THE PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent to take up Senate joint resolution No. 45 in relation to the taking of a census in the year 1865. Is there any objection to its present consideration?

MR. COLLAMER. I object on account of the present condition of the Senate. I wish to have such matters taken up in the Senate only when it is reasonably full.

COAL LANDS AND TOWN PROPERTY.

MR. HARLAN. I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 264, for the disposal of coal lands and of town property on the public domain. I think it will not originate any discussion.

By unanimous consent the bill was read the second time.

MR. FESSENDEN. I think that is too much of a bill to be taken up in the present state of the Senate. We had better not proceed any further with it to-night.

MR. HARLAN. I will state to the Senator that it has been carefully examined by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by the Committee on Public Lands. The object is to enable persons to obtain titles to town lots in advance of public surveys. Frequently towns spring up and have thousands of inhabitants many years before the public surveys are extended to them.

MR. FESSENDEN. I do not know but that it is all right; but in the present thin state of the Senate, with no one's attention called to it, it is hardly wise to take up a bill of that character.

MR. HARLAN. I will state to the Senator that this is a bill which will bring some money into the Treasury from the proceeds of coal lands and town lots.

MR. FESSENDEN. I do not know that I have any objection to it.

MR. HARLAN. We usually report bills appropriating money.

MR. FESSENDEN. We give something for the money we get, then; do we not?

MR. HARLAN. We are realizing nothing whatever from them now. The coal lands are lying idle.

MR. FESSENDEN. I have very great confidence in the Senator from Iowa, and in what he says; but I think the bill is too important to be considered in this thin Senate. I think we had better proceed with business regularly.

MR. HARLAN. I will consent to let it go over.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER (MR. ANTHONY in the chair). The business before the Senate is bill H. R. No. 405, to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. HARRIS] to reconsider the vote agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] raising the duty on certain descriptions of tobacco from thirty-five to forty-five cents.

MR. CLARK. I would not detain the Senate further if it had not been for a remark or two made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] in regard to this matter. He called the attention of the Senate to what he said was an outrageous discrimination in this bill, a discrimination between the tax on tobacco manufactured and on cigars, and then he called the attention of the Senate to the difference between the tobacco of the West and the tobacco of the East, and mentioned Connecticut.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say, and I think the Senator from Missouri will believe me when I say, that in all this consideration of the taxation of tobacco or cigars, whether it was on chewing or smoking, it did not once enter my head at any time where the tobacco was manufactured, or where the tax would be levied. I had not thought over that until it was mentioned by the Senator; and I desire now entirely to put from me and that the Senator should put from him all considerations of that kind; and if it shall turn out that tobacco of one kind is taxed unjustly when compared with another, I hope the Senate will rectify any mistake of that kind.

The Senator says that cigars are made in Connecticut, or rather the tobacco made for the covering of cigars is grown there, wrappers as they are called I think. I never use tobacco in any way, and perhaps if I mistake the terms I may be pardoned; I certainly should be at a loss to judge as to the quality, for I do not know anything about it from its use, though I have some information as to the manufacture. If it should turn out that there has been any injustice done to any portion of the country in that particular, I desire that it should be corrected; but I will ask Senators to turn their attention to the present law on the subject; and here I will state that I was entirely right before the recess as to what was the rate of taxation on tobacco now. I said there was no line of valuation in the tax. The Senator said there was in the act of 1862, and he read the act of 1862; but that is not the act under which tobacco is now taxed. There is no valuation of manufactured tobacco as now taxed. Tobacco is taxed under the act of March 3, 1863, and the provisions of that act are these:

"On tobacco, cavendish, plug, twist, fine-cut, and manufactured of all descriptions, (not including snuff, cigars, and smoking tobacco prepared with all the stems in or made exclusively of stems,) fifteen cents per pound."

Just in the same way that we propose to tax it, only not described in the same way. The act under which tobacco is now taxed lays a tax on all kinds of manufactured tobacco alike, a tax of fifteen cents a pound, with no valuation, no grade. We propose to follow the policy of the Government. The Government never did value manufactured tobacco except for a part of one year, and after a short experience they altered the law, and laid that valuation entirely aside, because it was so productive of frauds. We only propose now to follow the policy adopted more than a year ago, taxing the tobacco in the same way, but increasing the tax; and now, if the Senator from Missouri will give me a moment's attention, I think I shall show to him from the present state of the law and what we propose to do that we have not been unjust to the West nor partial to New England, taking it for granted that the tobacco from which chewing tobacco is made comes from the West, and taking it for granted, as he seems to suppose, that tobacco from which the best cigars are made comes from Connecticut. The present rate of taxation on manufactured tobacco is fifteen cents a pound. That is the tax we propose to make forty-five. That is just trebling the tax, making it three times as much as it was a year ago. Now, what is the present rate in regard to cigars? That will determine whether we have made an unjust discrimination or not. The present law is:

"On cigars valued at not over $5 per thousand, $1 50 per thousand."

We bring the tax on those cigars up to three dollars a thousand in this bill. Again:

"On cigars valued at over $5 and not over $10 per thousand, $2 per thousand."

We say in this bill that the tax on cigars valued at over $6 and not over $20 a thousand shall be $8 a thousand, four times as much. Then on cigars between $20 and $35 a thousand in value, we here put a tax of $15 a thousand. By the present law cigars between $10 and $20 a thousand pay $2 50 per thousand, and over $20, $3 50. We make a tax of $40 a thousand, eleven times as much as it was before, and that is discriminating in favor of Connecticut. We only put three times the present tax on chewing tobacco, and we put eleven times on the higher-priced cigars, and that is an outrageous discrimination in favor of Connecticut. I hope the Senator will agree with me that I did not think anything about Connecticut when that tax was proposed; I had it not in my mind. My desire was to get the most revenue for the Government out of these things and not drive them out of consumption.

Now, let me make a suggestion to gentlemen of the West. They disagree among themselves as to the amount of the tax. If they will settle among themselves how their different grades of tobacco shall be taxed, giving the most revenue to the Government, I shall be entirely content, provided the scheme is not full of frauds. I know the Senator from Michigan wants to raise revenue.

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly I do.

Mr. CLARK. One Senator wants a discrimination between fine-cut and cavendish; another does not want it. If these gentlemen will settle among themselves what it ought to be—it is a matter of their own "superstition," as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] once said—and give the Government the revenue, I shall be entirely content. If there is any discrimination in favor of Connecticut, let the Senator from Missouri propose a higher tax on cigars, and if he can satisfy me that it will not drive them out of the market (and I shall be readily satisfied) I will go with him. All I desire is that the Senate shall fix the rate for itself; Senators can judge pretty much what the article will bear. They will bear in mind that this manufactured tobacco is the very best kind of tobacco used. Out of one hundred hogheads, perhaps thirty or forty can be used for manufactured tobacco; the very best production is assorted for that purpose. If this vote is reconsidered and the rate put down, if that is thought to be best, I am satisfied, or if it is retained I am satisfied; or if it is just that there shall be a discrimination, I am satisfied with that. I think a discrimination is not just; but if the Senate shall decide otherwise, I shall be content. I am not for a discrimination in favor of any article or any section.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire simply to state that in 1863, when the original bill was passed, I made a lengthy argument in relation to the very distinction which was made between manufactured tobacco and manufactured cigars. I am upon the record on that subject.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator did not understand me as referring to his course?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator's remarks, however, would leave the impression that heretofore, two years since, when the discrimination was made, it passed and I made no complaint about it. I did make complaint when the original act was passed, and pointed out these very difficulties. I remember it distinctly. I have not referred to it since, but I did make an argument against the distinction made at that time. I said nothing then about the East or the West, the North or the South; but I did this morning refer to locality, and in speaking of it I did not intend to charge the Senator with designing to give any preference to the East or to any part of the country, but I did intend to let him know that I thought he did not understand the subject perfectly well. There are parties here who are eternally missing upon this thing and that thing being done for their own private interest; and the Senator, I think, does not know enough about this tobacco question (and he confesses that he does not) to discriminate clearly between the right and the wrong as may be suggested to him. That is my honest opinion about him, and I intended to say nothing more. I do not think the Senator intends to benefit any section of the country; I do not desire to be so understood; but I do think he has been imposed upon in regard to this thing.

Mr. CLARK. I have only this explanation to make: I did not refer to the Senator's course, nor did I intimate to the Senate how he had ever voted or what he had ever said on this subject, except what he said just before the recess in regard to a discrimination in favor of Connecticut. I endeavored to show that we had carried up the tax on cigars as much as we had on tobacco. That was the drift of my argument.

Mr. HENDERSON. You did not carry it high enough in the beginning; you did not make the proper discrimination at first.

Mr. CLARK. That is a prior matter. The Senator referred to me as making the discrimination. I only desired to show that on the basis of taxation which the Senate and House of Representatives had previously fixed, I had carried up cigars even higher than tobacco. I did not refer to the Senator. Now, it may be that I am deceived about this; I do not deny that I may be deceived; I have not so much information about it as I wish I had; but if I have been deceived, I am trying to correct one of the mistakes I have made in my judgment, because I think there should be no discrimination; but if the Senators will agree among themselves—

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator insists that there shall be no discrimination. He has constantly used that phrase. Does he mean to say that an article of tobacco which costs two dollars a pound manufactured ought to pay no more revenue than the article the poor man buys at twenty cents a pound? Does he mean that there shall be no discrimination in that way?

Mr. CLARK. I do not mean any such thing, and I cannot well understand how the Senator can suppose that I mean any such thing. He knows very well that cavendish, plug, twist, and fine-cut were all proposed by the committee to be taxed thirty-five cents a pound. Upon the recommendation of some one, the tax on fine-cut was put up to forty-five cents a pound. What I mean by "no discrimination" is that fine-cut, plug, cavendish, and twist should stand alike.

Mr. POWELL. You mean that all chewing tobacco should stand alike?

Mr. CLARK. I mean now what I am saying to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand the Senator to say that he thinks they ought all to be taxed exactly alike?

Mr. CLARK. Cavendish, twist, plug, and fine-cut. I think as they are manufactured and sold they are not always of the same grade. Sometimes just as fine tobacco is used in cavendish as in fine-cut, and so in plug, and so in twist.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator if he himself did not propose to amend this bill originally so as to leave the tax of thirty-five cents on cavendish, plug, and twist, and to put the fine-cut chewing tobacco at forty-five cents?

Mr. CLARK. I did on the recommendation of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. When the Senator asked me if there was no article of fine chewing tobacco that could stand a higher tax than this I did state to him, and I now again state to him, that if he will make the discrimination there are qualities of fine chewing tobacco which can better stand forty-five cents than the lower grade of plug tobacco can stand twenty cents. I told the Senator distinctly that I thought thirty-five cents was enough. But he had this matter in charge, and when he asked me the question I answered it as honestly as I could. He acted on the suggestion; he proposed it to the Senate and got the Senate to act on it, and put thirty-five cents on one quality and forty-five on another. I supposed that then it was settled; but since that the Senator himself votes for the proposition to increase the thirty-five cents tax, to put them all on the same footing. If they are all to go on the same footing, I say let it be thirty-five cents; and I hope the Senators from tobacco-growing States will stand by me.

Mr. CLARK. I think it will be sufficiently understood without my pursuing the matter further. I will only say that unless we adhere to some rule we shall leave the door open for frauds. I have been shown a specimen of one fraud that is practiced which I intended to present to the Senate; but I have not the sample here now; perhaps I may have it before the debate closes.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose to occupy the Senate's time at any length. My impression is that the duty placed on manufactured tobacco in this bill is entirely too high, and the Senator from New Hampshire indicates that gentlemen from the West can fix the duty. I believe that if the Senate would allow us to fix it, we could come to a conclusion very readily, and make it very equitable and very just. I am clearly of the opinion that all these manufactured tobaccos should not bear the same taxation, there should be a discrimination between them. In the matter of cigars, I think there are proper discriminations. I believe there are five or six values of cigars, and they are taxed in proportion to their values. That, I think, is just and proper. Certainly you should not tax a cigar that is worth seven dollars a thousand as much as you do one that is worth seventy-five dollars a thousand. This bill properly discriminates between cigars, dividing them into something like five or six classes.

Now, sir, allow me to state to the Senate that there is just as much difference in the price and quality of manufactured tobaccos as there is in cigars, and why not make the discrimination in the manufactured tobacco? Before this war, in old times, there was a great deal of manufactured tobacco sold in the box at eight cents a pound. There were other and finer qualities that sold for perhaps eighty cents, and some very fine perhaps for one dollar a pound. These were the prices before the war; there was every variety of price, from eight cents to eighty or ninety cents or one dollar before the war which caused tobacco to rise. Is there any reason why you should tax a pound of tobacco that is worth ten cents as much as you tax a pound of tobacco worth two dollars? There is certainly no reason why you should do it, yet it is done in this bill. There is no discrimination in this bill as it now stands between the manufactured tobaccos, I mean those manufactured for chewing purposes; they are all taxed the same amount, forty-five cents a pound; while on your cigars the tax is from three dollars a thousand to forty dollars, and when the difference in the qualities of the cigars is no greater than the difference in the qualities of tobacco. Why, then, do you make such a discrimination in cigars and not make it in regard to chewing tobacco? There is no reason for it.

I understand the Senator from New Hampshire says you cannot get along without having the chewing tobaccos all at the same rate without fraud. The Senator is very much mistaken in that. The only reason why he does not discriminate between the various prices of manufactured tobacco is that it will open the door for fraud. That is the Senator's reason, as I understand. Now, I say that there is just as much and as wide a door open for fraud in the cigars on the scale you have it here, as there would be in manufactured tobacco. How is it that you fix the amount of tax you lay on the cigars? It is on inspection and valuation by the agent of the Government, the assessor or inspector appointed by the Government. He inspects the cigars, he values them, and on those which do not cost over seven dollars a thousand the tax is fixed at three dollars a thousand, and he stamps them with the Government stamps prepared. Then those cigars that are not valued at over ten dollars a thousand are taxed five dollars; it runs on to six grades, I believe; and on cigars worth seventy-five dollars a thousand the tax is forty dollars. How do you ascertain these various grades of cigars and their value? By inspection and valuation, and when that is done they are stamped. Is there any more difficulty in ascertaining in the same way the prices and qualities of chewing tobacco? Not a bit. I know that some manufacturers have given the Senator information on which he relies, that you cannot ascertain the values and the prices of the manufactured tobacco, but I speak of what I know when I speak of this matter. I have had an experience in regard to the tobacco plant from my earliest recollection. I have seen it in every grade and in every form; and I do not care who it is that tells the Senator it is impossible to prevent frauds under a discriminating duty if you have honest appraisers who are judges of the article; that party who tells the Senator so is either mistaken or his purpose is to misrepresent and mislead the Senator.

Why cannot you examine and value and appraise the manufactured tobacco as readily as you can the cigars? What is the process by which you do it? If the manufactured tobacco is in a cask made of staves or in the form of a box, all you have to do is to open it and take out the tobacco and examine it. If your cigars are in boxes or bales, or in any other way in which you put them up, all you have to do is to open the box containing them and examine the cigars. A manufacturer, a man skilled in the article of tobacco, can tell the indifferent from the fine manufactured tobacco; and tell you all the grades, just as readily as any cigar manufacturer can tell you, on examination and inspection, the grades of all the cigars; and I will say to the honorable Senator that any man at all acquainted with tobacco and with this trade will tell the difference in the prices and qualities by inspection just as quickly and as promptly as the most skillful manufacturer in cotton goods in New England will tell him the difference between the coarser osenburgs and the finest goods which are worked up into shirts. They can value and fix the price and grades of the manufactured tobaccos just as easily as cigars. All that you have to do is to open the cask, the box, or whatever it is that contains the two, and inspect them.

Let the inspector, whoever he is, be a judge of tobacco and the price, and he will reach the result as unerringly and justly for the Government and all concerned in one case as the other.

My impression is that in order to tax tobacco justly, it is necessary to grade it. On that tobacco which is worth say thirty cents a pound, fix one tax, that which is worth forty cents fix a higher tax, that which is worth fifty cents fix a higher tax, that which is worth sixty or seventy cents or one dollar fix a still higher tax. I think the cigars are taxed in a proper and equitable mode in this bill. I think the grades are proper, and I tell the Senator what I know of my own personal knowledge, that there is no more difficulty in inspecting the manufactured tobaccos than there is in inspecting the cigars and fixing the proper value.

I have been beset by a great many persons about the tax bill. If a man comes about who has a large quantity of whisky on hand, in nine cases to one he will tell you that it will bear a very heavy tax; and if a man comes about that has a very large quantity of the lower grades of manufactured tobacco on hand, he will tell you to tax it all very high. We are surrounded, these lobbies are filled with men who have their personal interests to subserve, and they seek every Senator here and strive to impress him with that kind of knowledge which will cause him they think to subserve their interests. I dare say there are persons in my hearing now who are engaged in doing that. I am not going to censure them very harshly, for I know that in these times almost everybody is looking out for himself; but I want to look out for all, or at any rate for the greatest number.

The tobacco trade is a very important interest in the West; indeed, it is an important interest throughout the whole country. I know it is an article that will be taxed heavily, and it ought to be taxed heavily; but we ought to tax it justly. I hope this vote will be reconsidered, and that some gradation will be made in these taxes. Arrange the manufactured tobacco as you have the cigars; that which is low-priced fix a low tax upon; that which is high put a high tax on. If you impose a tax of forty-five cents a pound on tobacco which was worth only eight cents before the war, tobacco used by poor people, it will fall heavily and onerously on them; it is not right. On cigars that poor people use, the price of which is $7 per thousand, you put a tax of $3 a thousand, and it is plenty. Those that are worth $75 a thousand you say shall pay $40 tax; the rich men who use these fine cigars should pay for the luxury. So it ought to be in regard to tobacco. The Senator from New Hampshire is impressed with the idea that you cannot do it without fraud. I can assure him that he may dismiss that fear. Any Senator here who is personally acquainted with this business will bear me out in the assertion that you can readily arrive at the truth about the value and quality of tobacco. It is just as easy, and indeed many of the manufacturers tell me it is more easy, than it is to find out the quality of cigars.

But, Mr. President, if we have to stand a uniform tax, I greatly prefer that it should be thirty-five rather than forty-five cents; and if this vote shall be reconsidered, and the Senate will not make any grades, I shall then vote to reduce the fine-cut down to thirty-five cents. I would prefer to have this portion of the bill as it came from the Committee on Finance than to have it in its amended form.

Mr. CLARK. I hope I shall be pardoned a moment by the Senate, and not become tedious. The pending motion is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate brought up cavendish, plug, and twist to forty-five cents, and put it on an equality with fine-cut. The motion is to reconsider that vote so as to let the tax stand forty-five cents upon fine-cut, and thirty-five upon cavendish, plug, and twist; but it does not involve all the discrimination of which the Senator from Kentucky has been speaking. There is no proposition before the Senate now to tax tobacco in that way, and therefore I shall not follow him in his line of remark. But I have had put into my hand, as I supposed I might before the session was through, an article of tobacco, a fraudulent article, put up to evade the tax, [exhibiting it.] Here is a leaf of tobacco put up in this way; there is no manufacture to it; the stem has been taken out; it has been dipped in licorice and sweetened; it is of the very best quality; retails for $1 50 a pound, and yet has paid no tax. It retails for that in this city, and has been bought since the Senate took the recess.

Mr. JOHNSON. What does that prove?

Mr. CLARK. It proves that somebody defrauds the Government. It proves, on the general principle of the proposition we have now before the Senate, that one method of taxation would have avoided this very fraud.

Mr. JOHNSON. The uniform measure for manufactured?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir. This tobacco is not manufactured, but it is sweetened. We have a provision in this bill that if the stem has been taken out, in whole or in part, and sweetened—

Mr. GRIMES. Let me ask the Senator what is the process of manufacturing tobacco?

Mr. CLARK. Not this.

Mr. GRIMES. I want to know what it is?

Mr. CLARK. Simply sweetening does not constitute it.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from New Hampshire has produced an article of tobacco here that I suppose is worth one dollar a pound. It is a very superior article of tobacco, I can assure him. It is an article that the fine-cut tobacco is generally made of.

Mr. CLARK. The case is worse than I supposed. I find that this has not even been stemmed. I infer from this that fine tobacco will bear this tax.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to give notice that if Senators do not come to a vote on this question pretty soon, I shall have to try to leave off chewing tobacco, and that will diminish the revenue largely. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the vote will be reconsidered, and perhaps we can agree upon something in the course of a few minutes. I think it is but just that the vote be reconsidered, and then we can determine whether we shall put the rate back to thirty-five cents or else have a gradation.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator is aware that however we may fix it in the Senate it has got to go to a committee of conference of the two Houses. Our action will not be conclusive. I think he will stand just as well by letting it go to a conference as it is now.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the period is so late, we are so near the close of the session that I fear the committee of conference may agree to the proposition as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose it is probable the bill will take the same course it did two years ago; the House of Representatives will refuse to concur in all our amendments and send it to a committee of conference at once, because if they attempt to go through with the bill in the House and act on each amendment, we may as well give up the idea of getting through this year.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I asked a member of the House of Representatives about that very question yesterday, and he said that there was no probability of that course being taken, but that the House would consider the amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they desire to stay here two or three months longer, they will; but my impression is that they will follow the usual course.

Mr. HENDERSON. The House of Representatives fixed the tax at thirty-five cents. If we reconsider this vote, and put it all again at that rate, there will be no difference between the two Houses for a committee of conference to consider; this point will be settled.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is a good deal of the inferior kind of tobacco if there be any difference in the kind (in my opinion it is all bad enough) made in Maryland, and from what I understand it is of that kind that will not bear a tax of forty-five cents. It is supposed—and in that opinion the Senator from Missouri concurs—that the finer kind of tobacco, fine-cut tobacco, will bear forty-five cents, and he and those who agree with him have no objection to levying a tax of thirty-five cents upon the other three kinds which are not able to bear the forty-five cents, and levying a tax of forty-five cents on the better kind which is able to bear it. But the honorable member from New Hampshire—and in that no doubt to a great extent he is correct—supposes that unless there is a uniform rate of taxation, fraud upon the revenue will be perpetrated, because it will be difficult, if not impossible, to prevent their bringing the finer cut to look in appearance like the lower kind, so as to reduce all practically to the one tax of thirty-five cents. Now, if that be true, if that cannot be avoided, it would be most unjust to bring up the other three kinds which are not able to bear the tax of thirty-five cents to the tax which the better kind is able to bear. It would be much better, if uniformity is desirable for the reason stated by the Senator from New Hampshire, that we should put them all at a uniform rate of taxation. Then there can be no fraud perpetrated at all. It will be a specific tax upon chewing tobacco of every description. I hope, therefore, that the vote will be reconsidered, and that either the discrimination will be permitted to remain as against the fine-cut, or that all will be brought to a tax which the inferior kinds will be able to support.

Mr. CHANDLER. What I have been contending for is uniformity. If it is the judgment of the Senate that thirty-five cents is enough upon all classes of tobacco, fine-cut as well as plug, I am content; but it is this discrimination to which I object. A discrimination of twenty-five per cent. would utterly ruin every tobacco cutter in the United States, and yet the discrimination is greater than twenty-five per cent.; it is ten cents on thirty-five cents. As I stated before, if it is the judgment of the Senate and if the Committee on Finance will consent to fix the rate at thirty-five cents on the whole, I am satisfied, perfectly content. But I object to reconsidering this vote unless they intend to reconsider the vote by which forty-five was placed upon fine-cut, and I would ask the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Missouri if it is his intention, should this be reconsidered, then to move to reconsider the vote by which forty-five cents was placed on fine-cut.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly shall do so if it be the desire of the Senator from Michigan. I have not changed my mind in regard to it. I think that tobacco can stand the tax, as I have stated repeatedly, a great deal better than the lower qualities; but if the Senator insists that they cut any considerable quantity of tobacco in his State of an inferior quality, I do not wish to oppress the manufacturers of that. I am sure the manufacturers of plug tobacco in my State cannot stand over thirty-five cents, but I do not desire to separate the interest of the tobacco-growing regions of the country, so that we in our own divisions will inflict a heavy and burdensome tax upon ourselves.

Mr. CHANDLER. Are the Committee on Finance satisfied that thirty-five cents is enough? I ask the Senator from New Hampshire. I object in toto to a reconsideration of this vote unless the vote placing forty-five cents on fine-cut is to be reconsidered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that by voting we shall ascertain what the Senate intends. Do let us vote. It has been discussed for hours.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I am well satisfied it can bear a tax of forty-five cents; and I want to keep it there.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I hope the vote will not be reconsidered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move a reconsideration of the vote by which fine-cut was taxed forty-five cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY.) The question now is on the amendment which has just been reconsidered—the amendment of the Senator from Michigan to strike out “thirty-five” and insert “forty-five.”

Mr. JOHNSON. Upon the whole?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Upon cavendish, plug, twist, &c. All we have done is to reconsider the vote agreeing to that amendment. Now we must put the question on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHANDLER. I now move to reconsider the vote by which forty-five cents was levied upon fine-cut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to reconsider the vote on the amendment on page 145:

On fine-cut tobacco, whether manufactured with the stem in or not, or however sold, whether loose, in bulk, or in packages, papers, wrappers, or boxes, forty-five cents.

Mr. POWELL. That was adopted in committee. The motion should be to strike out "forty-five" and insert "thirty-five."

Mr. CHANDLER. I move, then, to strike out "forty-five" and insert "thirty-five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proper motion would be to concur with the Committee of the Whole in this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. A motion to amend can be made before concurring.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan moves to amend this amendment by striking out "forty-five" and inserting "thirty-five."

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this is a proposition to break down every single cutter of tobacco in the United States. There is not one of them who can live a week under that unjust and wrong discrimination. If you make your tax forty-five cents or fifty-five or seventy-five, I do not care where you put it, let cutters stand on an equality with packers; do not make this unjust, wrong discrimination that will utterly destroy their business. The city of Detroit alone paid about a million dollars of your revenue last year, and under this new law she will pay from two to three million dollars the coming year; and yet you will shut up every single tobacco cutter in that city with this discrimination. No business can stand it for a month. There is not a tobacco cutter throughout the country that will not tell you the same thing. You will find a few men who have large stocks on hand who think they can make more by the rise on tobacco than they can by their legitimate business, who have been here lobbying to have a heavy tax put upon this tobacco. But every legitimate tobacco cutter in the country will tell you that a discrimination of twenty-five per cent.—and it is more than that—will break down every one of them. I supposed when the other motion to reconsider was made that the Senate had decided to make the tax thirty-five cents all around instead of forty-five, and that satisfied me. I had no complaint to make of that; if that was to be the judgment of the Senate I would not contest it; but I supposed it was distinctly understood that you intended to reduce the tax on all to thirty-five cents, as it originally stood. I hope that Senators will do justice, and not shut up and utterly destroy the business of all the tobacco cutters in the country. It is unjust.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Michigan will prevail. I am confident that thirty-five cents is as much tax as they can bear, and I think it ought to be reduced to that. When you bring it to thirty-five cents, that will be what it was left by both the House bill and the report of our committee. When we undertook to reconsider, it was my understanding that we would vote to bring it all down to thirty-five cents where it stood. I hope gentlemen in the tobacco interest will so vote. That will leave it precisely where it was when the bill came from the other House, and the way it was when our committee made their report. I hope the motion of the Senator from Michigan will prevail.

Mr. CLARK. I will say again what I have said so many times, that I think there ought to be no discrimination. If the Senate do not assent to forty-five, bring it down.

Mr. HENDERSON. As I have said repeatedly, so far as my own State is concerned, only the finer qualities of tobacco are there made into fine-cut, and it could stand a tax of forty-five cents very well, and so could twist; those are the finest qualities of tobacco. But the Senator from Michigan says that in his State they cut an inferior quality of tobacco and call it fine-cut. I am perfectly willing to see it reduced to thirty-five cents in consideration of the fact that they cut inferior qualities of tobacco; but so far as my State is concerned, the manufacturers could stand forty-five cents on this much better than thirty-five on the other qualities.

Mr. DAVIS. I never had but one chew of tobacco in my life, and I never had in my mouth but one cigar, and that only for a very short time, for it made me very sick. Still, I know something about tobacco. There are some counties in my neighborhood that are very heavy tobacco-producing counties. Any man that ever worked in tobacco, the most ignorant negro that ever worked in tobacco, knows that there is a very great difference in the qualities of tobacco naturally as they are produced, and he knows that an inferior article of natural tobacco can never be manufactured into a superior article of manufactured tobacco. The grades in tobacco exist as distinctly, and are just as easily detected, as they exist in cloths of woolen or cotton or any other products of manufacture. You cannot manufacture an inferior article of tobacco in any form that will enable it to pass with a judge or connoisseur of tobacco as superior tobacco. The Senator from New Hampshire brought a specimen of tobacco into the Senate this evening. It is perfectly preposterous to say that such an article of natural tobacco as that would ever be attempted to be manufactured and sold as an inferior tobacco. It is like making a Christian and a good Christian; you must first have a good man to begin with or you will never make a good Christian. To make a good article of manufactured tobacco, you must have a good original article of tobacco, you must have a good leaf. It is just as easy for any man that has been engaged in the rearing or manufacture or sale of tobacco to detect the difference of quality, of price, and of value, as it is for any one to detect them in any other article. It is easier, as my colleague has said, to discriminate in the qualities of tobacco than in the qualities of cigars; and any tax bill upon either of those subjects ought to make classes and discriminations. I think the Committee on Finance ought to make four or five different classes of tobacco, and in that way the tax would operate much more justly on tobacco producers, tobacco manufacturers, and tobacco sellers, and would yield a much larger amount of revenue.

Mr. HALE. I do not pretend to know anything about tobacco, but I think there is one principle for which the honorable Senator from Michigan contends in regard to which he is entirely wrong, and that is that there should be no discrimination between high and low-priced tobacco.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator has misunderstood me altogether. I never took that position. I simply say that the tobacco manufactured into plug is the same kind and material that is made into fine-cut. Discriminate in price, if you will, but do not discriminate against this particular kind of manufacture when the same identical grade is used in this as in the other.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand it to be so.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is so.

Mr. HALE. The Senator says it is so in Detroit. I do not understand it to be so generally. The denunciation of discrimination strikes me as entirely wrong, for the whole bill is founded on discriminations; it is discriminating constantly between a good article and an inferior article. I understand that the fine-cut tobacco proposed to be taxed 45 cents a pound is the highest-priced tobacco we have of that character, and the honorable Senator from Missouri, who is conversant with it, says he thinks it will stand it. If so, I think there might be a little discrimination there as well as anywhere else. I do not know anything about tobacco, but I do know something about common sense, and I think common sense is that you should discriminate and tax a high-priced article more than you do a low-priced one.

Mr. BROWN. Permit me to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that the objection which is taken is not to a discrimination as to the price or quality of different kinds of tobacco, but an objection which is predicated simply on the difference between fine-cut and plug, the method of manufacture. He contends that the same tobacco takes both shapes.

Mr. CHANDLER. And he discriminates between the man who manufactures his tobacco into plug and the man who cuts his tobacco in strips. That kind of discrimination, I say, is unjust.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand the fact to be so.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will inform the Senator that the same grade of tobacco is used in fine-cut and plug, and if there is any difference, it is actually a higher grade that goes into plug. What you propose to do is to make an unjust discrimination between the manufacturers of the article, and say that because this man packs and that man cuts, therefore the man who cuts shall pay you forty-five cents a pound, or thirty per cent. more than the man who packs. I say that is an unjust discrimination.

Mr. HALE. As Senators undertake to post me up on tobacco, I want to inquire whether this fine-cut when it is—

Mr. CHANDLER. Learn to chew, and then you will know. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I am afraid that if I take that cure, I shall take something I do not want. [Laughter.] My question is whether, when it is manufactured into fine-cut, it does not then become a finer tobacco than plug?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; it does not.

Mr. HALE. I give up. I see I do not know anything about tobacco.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, to strike out "forty-five" and insert "thirty-five."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Grimes, Morgan, and Sumner—3.

ABSENT—Messrs. Conness, Dixon, Foster, Harding, Hicks, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, and Wright—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I offer an amendment to the fifty-fourth section. I move to strike out from the word "of," in the fifth line, to the word "which," in the fourteenth line, and to insert:

On and after the 1st day of July, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of October, 1864, a duty of $1 25 on each and every gallon; on and after the 1st day of October, 1864, $1 50 on each and every gallon; and on and after the 1st day of July, 1865, a duty of $3 on each and every gallon.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I had designed to offer an amendment to this section as representing, to some extent, the interest that is affected by this legislation. If the Senator from Massachusetts, however, assumes to know what are the true interests of the production which he proposes now to tax, perhaps I cannot well appeal to him to withdraw his amendment that I may present the one which I have considered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us vote on this. It will be easier in that way to reach yours.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My amendment is to tax whisky $1 for one year, and $1 50 after that. It is substantially the House proposition, which I think is fair to the interest and fair to other sections of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state to the Senator that from the opinions expressed by Senators I should not suppose there was the slightest chance of his amendment being adopted; but we can take the vote and see.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to discuss it, but to vote upon it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that there is any chance to secure the adoption of this amendment, and I do not know that there is any chance to make a bill to obtain the revenue the country requires at this time. I do not suppose that any man in the Senate believes we shall raise by this bill within one hundred and twenty-five or one hundred and fifty millions of the sum the country ought now to have. I believe we ought to increase the duty on whisky; I have made this motion because I believe it, and I am also ready to increase the duty on manufactures. I would most cheerfully put manufactures at seven per cent., and I would rather vote to put the tax ten per cent. than allow it to stand at five per cent. Better overtax than undertax now. In voting to increase taxation I vote for the best interests of the whole people of the country. This bill is not I am now sure to accomplish what we have been talking about all winter. We all said that we intended to raise the amount of $350,000,000 to support the Government; and we have this measure which we all admit will not do it. We may raise by the 1st of January two dollars per gallon on whisky. We ought to have the duty on tobacco higher than it is in this bill. I make this motion, and I am ready to move to increase the duty on manufactures in the ninety-third section of the bill. The tax is now five per cent., and I am ready to put it up to seven, and where it is three per cent. to put it up to five, and by that means we may raise nearly the amount of revenue we ought to raise now to support the sinking credit of the country.

Here we are to-day, sir, with General Grant in front of Richmond, with General Sherman in Georgia, with the country full of hope and confidence in the success of our armies, and yet during this week gold is going up in the city of New York. The Government wants millions to meet the immediate demands upon the Treasury to pay the Army. Here we stand on this the 3d day of June higgling about the rates of taxation!

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not know whether the honorable member means to impeach at all the wisdom of the Senate. [Mr. Wilson. Not at all.] I suppose he does not mean to impute the delays and the results which have been the consequences of the delays to any procrastination on the part of the Senate or on the part of the committee of the Senate to whom the subject has been referred. Whatever unnecessary delays may have existed, if there have been any, which I do not propose to assert, are to be referred to another branch of Congress. When the honorable member tells us that gold is going up and our armies are apparently about triumphing over the foe, and he intimates perhaps, or will be understood as intimating, that Congress is not willing to lay such an amount of taxes as will be adequate to meet all the wants of the country, I am sure, from the manifestation of the opinion of the Senate, that he does great injustice to the Senate. I suppose there is not a member of the Senate who is not willing to tax to the whole extent that may be necessary to meet the demands which the exigency requires. He supposes that this bill will not raise as much as those exigencies do require. The estimate as I understood—whether I have been informed correctly or not I do not know; I did not get it from the Department itself—of the probable proceeds of this bill was some $250,000,000. Whether the taxes proposed in the bill as it was originally drafted have been in the aggregate reduced or increased, I do not certainly know; I rather think they have been increased. The honorable member is better acquainted than I am with what the support of the armies may require; but if we can get $250,000,000 or $260,000,000 from this bill, and get an increased amount of revenue from the tariff bill so as to reach a total of $100,000,000, making $350,000,000 or $400,000,000, I should suppose it would really meet all the demands that the occasion may require; but of one thing I think the country must be satisfied, I am sure they should be satisfied, from the exhibition which the Senate has made of its own opinion as a body and the opinion of each one of its members, that as far as depends on this branch of the Legislature there will be no want of patriotism and no want of wisdom in exerting the whole power with which it is clothed to meet to the utmost every possible demand which there may be upon the Treasury.

As to gold going up at this time, it is not at all to be wondered at. The currency of the country has been very much inflated; whether unnecessarily inflated to any extent I am not prepared to say, but to a certain extent it was necessary to inflate it. The demands of the Treasury required, in order to be met at all, that they should be met by an issue of paper; and while those demands were being met in that way, the demands in the country, the business demands of the country, which are supplied more or less by bank accommodations, also required that the circulation of the banks should be increased partially, and the effect of the increase from both sources has been to cause an inflation of the currency which must inevitably lead to the appreciation of gold; gold now being an article of commerce, of trade, and not a measure of value, not money in the ordinary acceptation of the term, not used as money but used as an article of traffic, will go up from time to time in spite of us. My friend who is near me [Mr. SHERMAN] supposed that by each of the two measures which he so zealously advocated, (and in that opinion I believe he had the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury,) the appreciation of gold might be arrested to a certain extent if those measures were adopted. They were adopted, but they have had no practical effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend will allow me to say that the measure we discussed here has never been adopted by the House of Representatives. It has not been acted upon.

Mr. JOHNSON. One was adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN. One is pending.

Mr. JOHNSON. One was adopted and gold still goes up. I do not think we can avoid it by legislation of that description. I think we can only avoid it ultimately—I do not mean to-morrow or next week or next month, but soon; I do not mean any indefinite period, but soon we shall be able to bring about a better state of things, and that will be later or sooner just as may be the success of our arms and just as may be the determination of Congress to meet by legislation in the form of taxation every demand which there may be upon the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to delay the Senate by repeating my conclusions about the whisky matter. The subject was discussed the other day at full length. I was then asked by Senators what I supposed was the amount of stock on hand and what was the amount of manufacture since the proposed increase of tax. I have taken the pains to get a statement from the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and I find that even my anticipations were largely too low. The amount of whisky on which a tax has been paid since the 1st of December last is 41,400,619 gallons, an amount more than ever was manufactured in the same length of time before in this country; and this does not include the large amount of whisky now held by distillers in bond or removed for consumption and held in bond in bonded warehouses. The only effect of a graduated tax is to encourage the manufacture of it from this until the 1st of January next, adding to the enormous stock there must now be on hand.

The Commissioner estimates the stock on hand as equivalent to one half year's supply, but it is obvious that the stock on hand, I think, is fully equivalent to one year's supply, because if a tax has been paid on 41,000,000 gallons in five months, (and this does not include the month of May; it is only to the last day of April,) and you add the amount that was made in May, which was probably equivalent to 8,000,000 gallons, that having been the average of the five preceding months, and add to that the amount already in bonded warehouse upon which the tax is not paid, and it would show an enormous aggregate of whisky manufactured in this country since the 1st of December. I take it that until that stock is pretty well exhausted you cannot get much revenue from the largely increased tax. Therefore I think it is better to fix the standard of taxation you intend to put on this article, and allow these people to rest on that standard. I do not think with any rate of taxation, even a dollar a gallon, you will have much revenue from this article, because the market is now glutted. Everybody who can hold it is now holding it. The idea of encouraging the manufacture for the next six months by a graduation scale, it seems to me, is unwise. It is better for us to put a tax upon the stock on hand, according to my proposition; but as the Senate is evidently opposed to that, then make the standard which you will adopt as the tax on whisky, and let it rest at that without any attempt to compel or induce the manufacture of whisky from now until the 1st of January next. I think the best way would be to adopt a dollar standard, commence with that, and let it go for a year. If that is too low, make it higher; but at any rate fix the standard and let it stand so that people can buy their corn and carry on business with a view to the manufacture in the future.

I will send a table, with the letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to the Secretary's desk. It contains some information which may have a bearing on this subject, and I ask that it be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
WASHINGTON, May 23, 1864.

SIR: I transmit herewith a monthly statement of the distilled spirits upon which taxes have been reported to this office from September, 1862, to April, 1864, amounting in all to 81,552,107 gallons. From the 1st of September, 1862, to March 1, 1864, there had been exported without payment of duties 8,975,000 gallons, and this had probably reached 10,000,000 gallons by the close of the month of April. This would make the number of gallons accounted for to this office since the passage of the excise law to the 1st of the current month 91,552,107 gallons.

From the information from time to time received, I am led to believe that through defective or fraudulent inspection, and other methods of evasion practiced by distillers, at least ten per cent. of the quantity distilled, or a total of over 10,000,000 gallons, has escaped taxation.

I have no means of forming any satisfactory estimate of the quantity of distilled spirits on hand at the time the law took effect. It was probably a full half year's supply.

Very respectfully,

JOSEPH J. LEWIS,

Commissioner.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, United States Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. It is possible, Mr. President, that the Senator from Indiana may not recognize my right to entertain or express an opinion on the subject of taxing whisky, as he seemed to intimate that the Senator from Massachusetts had not the right to offer an amendment on this subject. Yet I regret to say that the State of which I am a citizen produces a good deal of corn which is manufactured into whisky, and if it did not I should still claim the right to entertain and to express my own opinions on this subject as on all others. I know no reason why the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator shall not offer an amendment to the Senate in relation to this subject as well as to any other. I am in favor of the amendment that has been proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, and I think that no stronger argument could be furnished to the Senate and the country in favor of that proposition than has been afforded by the Senator from Ohio. He tells us what is true, that there is already enough whisky manufactured in the country for one year's supply, and what does he propose to do? He tells us that there is no probability of there being any manufactured during the next several months: What are we passing this bill for? To raise revenue. It is our purpose, then; if we want to raise revenue to stimulate the production of whisky. How are we going to do it? By the very scheme I think that the Committee on Finance have embodied in their proposition, and which is carried out to a still greater extent by the Senator from Massachusetts.

It is proposed to place a tax of $1 25 on every gallon of whisky that shall be manufactured from the passage of the bill until the 1st of October. That will stimulate the distillers to use up all the corn of last year's crop that is within their reach which can be easily converted into whisky. Then it is proposed to increase the tax on whisky that shall be manufactured between the 1st of October and the 1st of January next to $1 50 and after the 1st of January to $2. The result will be that there will be more whisky manufactured between the 1st of October and the 1st of January next, during those three months, than was ever made in the same length of time in the whole civilized world; and why? Because the distillers will think, and I think they will justly come to that conclusion from the several decisions that have been made by the Senate, and by both Houses of Congress, indeed, that it is the settled policy of the Government not to tax whisky on hand or any other kind of property that has once been taxed. That decision has been reached against my judgment, but it has been reached, and I think it may be considered as settled. Knowing that whisky on hand is not to be taxed, it will be their policy to manufacture just as much as they possibly can between the passage of the bill and the 1st of October, so as to avoid the imposition of the additional twenty-five cents of taxation then, and between the 1st of October and the 1st of January they will again be stimulated to produce just as much as possible in those three months in order to avoid the additional taxation of fifty cents.

The result will be that we shall derive, in my conviction, more revenue during these three months from the production of whisky alone than you will probably derive—I was going to say—from all other sources of revenue combined.

Do we want the money, and shall we not receive the money at just the time we do want it, during the outgoing of the present year and the first four months of the succeeding year? A large amount of the whisky which will be manufactured between the 1st of October and the 1st of January will go into bond. The duty will not be paid on the 1st of January, but it will be paid some time during the first four months of the coming year, and the time when I apprehend we shall most need money will be during the last three months of the present year and the first four months of the next year.

Now, what is the antagonistic proposition? To tax all whisky that shall be manufactured during the coming year one dollar, with the admission on the part of at least one of the Senators who professes himself to be in favor of that proposition, the Senator from Ohio, that none, or comparatively none, will be manufactured. If we are to look at this measure as a revenue measure, and not as one affecting the question of temperance or the morals of the community, it seems to me that the Committee on Finance have advised precisely the scheme that will best promote the interests of the Treasury, and that the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts is an improvement upon the Finance Committee's scheme, and hence it will receive my most cordial support.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I regret that the Senator from Iowa supposed that I questioned the right of any Senator to offer an amendment. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he should withdraw his amendment and allow an amendment more favorable to the interest to be taxed, first to be considered by the Senate; but when I commenced the sentence I concluded that I had no right to do so, and therefore I modified what I had intended to say.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I certainly misunderstood him.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not question that. I do not intend to discuss the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts just now, but to refer more particularly to what has been said by the Senator from Ohio. I suppose his argument is intended again to bring to the attention of the Senate the proposition to tax liquor on hand, and I am very glad the Senator from Ohio has brought to the attention of the Senate the information derived from the Treasury Department, for it shows—

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will allow me to say that I make no such proposition. The Senate having once decided against me by a majority of two to one, I do not intend to press that question again, though I should be glad to realize such a tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am glad to hear the Senator say that he does not propose to raise that question again. But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the production of whisky in the northern part of the United States has very much decreased under the taxation imposed. The table from the Treasury Department, presented by the Senator from Ohio, shows that for the nineteen months closing with April, 1864, the production of whisky was 81,552,107 gallons. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue supposes, though he does not profess to have much information on that subject, that 8,000,000 gallons have been exported; but that does not appear in the 81,000,000. That would be about 90,000,000, according to his own showing, produced in the United States for the nineteen months closing in April last. The census of 1860 shows that the production of whisky in the United States for the year ending the 1st day of June, 1860, was 80,453,089 gallons. There was almost as much produced in the year from June 1, 1859, to June 1, 1860, as was produced in the nineteen months closing in April last; and yet Senators have been under the impression all the while that the production has been stimulated and greatly increased.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to mention to the Senator the fact that after the revenue law of 1862 took effect in September, for five or six months there was scarcely any manufactured. The immediate effect of the tax was to stop the manufacture of spirits at once, just as the effect now of a large increase of the tax will be to stop it. The manufacture of whisky was so enormously pushed forward in the summer of 1862, that in September of that year only about 20,000 gallons were made, and it increased slowly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In September, 1862, over 22,000 gallons were manufactured according to this table, and September is a month in which but little liquor is ordinarily manufactured. It is proper, I should state here that the census of 1860 includes the production of the southern States as well as the northern States; but Tennessee, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Texas, and Arkansas contributed only 1,231,167 gallons to the total, leaving in the States not within the rebellion about 80,000,000 gallons produced in the year ending June 1, 1860. How does that correspond, I will ask the Senator, to the five months to which he called the attention of the Senate, the months of December, 1863, and January, February, March, and April, 1864? and the Senate will observe that these are the months during which nearly all the liquor is produced. It is not expected that in the summer months very much liquor will be produced; it is not the interest of the country that it should be so. During these five months the production has been 41,400,619 gallons. In 1859 and 1860, in the northern States, not now in rebellion, the year's production was 80,000,000 gallons. In the five months to which the Senator has called particular attention, December, 1863, January, February, March, and April, 1864, the months when the production is largest, possibly, the entire production according to the Treasury Department is 41,000,000 gallons, one half of the production of 1860, the favorable five months producing about one half of what was produced in a year before a tax was imposed. I am very glad the Senator has brought these facts to our attention. I had not concurred in the general impression that this interest had been stimulated and that the production had increased, though I had not the facts before me to enable me to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion about that. But now it is very clear that since the war and since the imposition of the tax of twenty cents on the gallon, the production of liquor has certainly not been increased. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not propose to discuss that, as the chairman does not favor it.

Mr. WILSON. I think the figures presented by the Senator from Ohio go to show us that we should have made some money for the Government if we had taxed the whisky on hand; but that question is settled; it is too late to discuss it now.

The Senator from Maryland expressed the hope that I did not mean to impeach the motives or the wisdom of the Senator. Certainly not, sir. I suppose that all of us are actuated by substantially the same motives, but we have differences of opinion in regard to the details of the bill, that is all. Nor did I wish to reflect in the slightest degree upon the action either of the Committee on Finance or of the Senate. This bill came to us at a very late day; I think it should have come from the House of Representatives weeks before it did; but it is now here. The Committee on Finance have devoted days and nights to its examination, and they have improved it in almost every section, and have been generally sustained by the Senate in the amendments which they have proposed. A vast deal of labor has been bestowed on the bill by the Committee on Finance and by the Senate. Those amendments are nearly all adopted and we are about to pass the bill. My own judgment is, and it is the judgment of some of the best minds of the country, that this bill will not produce all the income we ought to have at this time. All admit that we ought to raise from three to four hundred million dollars by internal taxation. I think we can do it by increasing the duty on whisky and tobacco and by taxing manufactures seven per cent., and as the representative of a manufacturing State, I am willing to put seven per cent. upon manufactures instead of five.

I have offered this amendment to increase the tax on whisky because I believe it can bear it; it will not diminish the consumption; its effect in that way will be hardly perceptible. The heavy taxes put upon spirits in England have not diminished the consumption there, and they will not here. The Senator from Indiana tells us that under our taxation the production has been diminished. I apprehend that at the close of last year and the beginning of the present year it was rather stimulated in view of the fact that there would be an increased duty imposed; everybody saw that it must be so; and it was diminished in the spring for the reason that the manufacture always diminishes in the spring. The latter months of autumn and the winter are the portions of the year when distilling is most active. If we adopt the amendments we shall raise $300,000,000 during the coming year by this act. This will tend to restore the waning credit of the country, improve the currency, and will enrich the Government and the country. The country demands increased taxation. The demand comes from all quarters of the country, and especially from the business men, the manufacturers, the mechanics, the merchants all over the land. I have moved this amendment from a sincere conviction that the needs of the country demand it, and that the good of the people requires that we shall adopt it; and if it be adopted I intend, if nobody else will, to move an increase of the tax on the articles taxed in the ninety-third section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. During the consideration of this bill I have refrained as much as possible from entering into general discussion; and have said as little as I could consistently with the duty which was imposed on me to explain the different provisions of the bill if I should be called on to explain them. I anticipated that we should have a full discussion of this particular branch of the bill when it came up in the Senate, and I was desirous that we should have a session this evening for the purpose of settling this question at least, if we could. I think, sir, we may as well take some things for settled, and when they are settled, and we have come to the conclusion that they are settled, let them alone. Now, the Senator from Ohio says that he regards the question of putting a tax upon liquors on hand as settled by the Senate. I suggest to him, then, whether it is not as well to drop the subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have said that I do not propose to raise that question again.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understood the Senator to raise it just now, for he predicated his action on this question by our action in regard to taxing liquors on hand. Now, allow me to say that the only way in which you can avoid (and then only partially and to a very limited extent, in my judgment) the difficulty that arises from the state of things as it is as it affects the revenue is to tax liquors on hand. If you put a tax upon those, you save a certain amount of money, or rather an uncertain amount; some Senators think more, some less. Before the Senator from Ohio introduced his tables I was inclined to think that we might save more than I now think we could; for, with the Senator from Indiana, I am somewhat surprised at the result of the tables themselves. If only about eighty million gallons have been manufactured in the last nineteen months—that is the amount, I believe, exclusive of what is exported, and which you do not count—I should like to know what amount of stock there is on hand at the present time, making allowance for all that has been used in the ordinary way, and all that has been used for manufactures in the country. Manufactures of course would make but a small percentage, perhaps not over ten per cent. of that; but the table certainly shows, because the use has been going on for the whole nineteen months, the use both for manufactures and by way of ordinary consumption, that the distillation has not been greater than the average before that time.

Under these circumstances, taking those tables as correct, I should like to know what becomes of these broad statements that are made that there are fifty or sixty million gallons on hand at the present time. If those tables may be relied upon nobody can believe that for a moment. We have had before the Committee on Finance all manner of statements with regard to the quantity on hand. It has gone from twelve millions up to sixty or seventy millions. As I remarked, one gentleman in particular who was very anxious a year ago and insisted that it was a ruinous policy and an improper policy in every way to put a tax on liquors on hand had changed his views expressly upon the ground that there was so much of it you could get a large amount of money out of it. It was wrong in principle before, but it became right in principle because you could get more money out of it! Those tables would go to show that after all if we do not impose that tax we do not lose so much as we supposed we might be losing, and as I supposed we might be losing, or rather not get.

The result, work it how you may, is inevitable. If there is a large quantity on hand—take that for an assumption—the time must come when there will be a lull and a loss of revenue arising from the fact that the chance of speculation stops the inducement for manufacturing; and the fact of having a stock to meet an anticipated rise in the tax induces the lull, if I may call it so, in the manufacture. The question then simply is, as it must come, when shall it come? If you put a dollar upon liquor now, and follow out the proposition of the honorable Senator from Indiana, and say that a year hence there shall be half a dollar more, the result will be that you will stop the manufacture immediately; that is to say, until the next stock comes in, and then they will begin again, in my judgment. If you put a tax on now and raise it up by degrees, graduate it up to the 1st of January and then stop, you will stimulate production up to that time, and, if a large stock is accumulated, all that will be made after that time will be just as much as they are obliged to make in order to carry out the operations of the distilleries with reference to the cattle, hogs, &c.; they will manufacture no more than they are obliged to do until there is such a consumption of the article as again renders it necessary to produce.

That, it strikes me, is the plain common sense about it, that that time must come somewhere; and the mistake that gentlemen who desire to get revenue make, in my judgment, is this: they try to accomplish an impossibility, to get revenue out of it by some species of legislation all along. The only way to do it that I know of is to keep increasing, expanding the currency of liquor from three months to three months to the end of time, or to the end of that time when we want revenue from the article. You cannot do that, because there is a limit beyond which you cannot go; and, in my judgment, it is not quite so certain, from certain facts that I have heard and some to be still decided, that you may put almost any amount of duty upon liquor and the consumption will not be diminished. I have been induced to hesitate a little upon this subject, ever since this bill was brought into the Senate; for I understand on very good authority that many of the poorer classes who formerly drank liquor are getting in the habit of drinking beer instead. Of course the tax makes no difference to those who do not care how much they pay for a glass of whisky, provided they get a good one. But I am told that that has been the effect to a very considerable extent, or to some extent, to say the least, among the poorer classes. If that be true it may render it doubtful whether there is not a limit beyond which we cannot go, even for the purposes of revenue; and I look upon the whole subject with reference to revenue alone.

Now, sir, let me give you a history of this idea of grading. So far as I know it originated with the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] He was the first that ever suggested it that I know of, and in the Committee on Finance, when the bill came from the House of Representatives at the first part of the session, we followed out his suggestion. To be sure the amount imposed was small; that is to say, ten cents or five

Mr. SHERMAN. Ten, I think.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We put on ten cents. It shows you how the ideas of men expand. We thought a little while ago that twenty cents a gallon on whisky was a good tax. We came together at this session, and when it was imposed we thought sixty cents was a good tax, a large tax. Not satisfied with the sixty cents that came from the House of Representatives, we graduated it and increased it to eighty by putting on ten cents at a certain date and then ten cents more at another period. The House of Representatives adopted our system with reference to that matter. They argued as we did on the subject that it would stimulate production; and that was the exact ground upon which it was placed. We all know what the result was with regard to that bill. We passed it, certainly, and it stands so to this day; it has not been repealed.

But when the House of Representatives came to consider this question anew under this bill, they went a little further, and they raised it to a dollar and a dollar and a quarter, grading it in the same way, but going over from May or June until January. We were induced to believe that it would be wise to make the increase begin on the 1st of October for the reason that that would strike the coming crop, and if we did not do that a very great effort would be made to make all the whisky possible between October and January and then stop; but we came to the conclusion also that it would bear an additional tax, and therefore we increased it to $1.25 in October and put on an additional quarter of a dollar in January. My reasoning was this: that although they would be disposed to stop when it came to January, yet, from the nature of things, it would be difficult for them to do so, and they must continue the manufacture for the very reason that was given by the honorable Senator from Indiana in the debate on the other bill, that having their hogs and their cattle on hand, they must necessarily continue the manufacture for a certain time, until they were disposed of; and that reason, if it was good then, is good now.

The Senate can take its choice between the two systems. I believed then, and I believe now, that the time must come when there will be a lull in the manufacture, and we shall not get revenue from this article; and it makes very little difference when it comes, because, necessarily, the system must continue for years in order to obtain the taxes that will be required. I believe that the article will bear $1.50; and I believe that at this crisis, when we want and shall want revenue from now until the opening of the spring, the system we have suggested and which has been adopted is the one that will be most likely to give us the largest amount of revenue. If it stops then, we shall suffer a loss of revenue for a time, but the period will come when it will begin again; and, as I have said once or twice before, the stopping point must come some time or other from the very nature of the case. You cannot devise a system of taxation upon such an article that will not produce that result. I believe—I do not pretend that my opinion is good for much, but such as it is I am bound to give it—the system we have adopted of gradually increasing the tax is the best one for the revenue at the time when we want revenue; and that we may as well take our revenue now and from this time henceforth up to the period when it will stop by a gradual tax as to put on the whole amount of duty we intend to get ultimately at this particular time, which would have the effect of stopping the revenue because it would cause the manufacture to cease, except so far as is absolutely necessary in order to keep the distilleries in operation.

The system proposed by the Senator from Indiana does not meet my view, although the Senate may take a different view of it. I cannot say that I feel indifferent to the result, because, believing that the public good depends upon our action to a certain extent, I naturally prefer that which, in my judgment, seems best calculated to promote it. I shall be happy, should the Senate adopt a different system, if it turns out that I was entirely mistaken; because I am always willing, I trust, to be found to be mistaken when my being so is in its results productive of benefit to the public. The whole matter is before the Senate, and I hope we shall be able to settle it before we adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him what is his opinion of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts? He said nothing about that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With reference to that, if the Senate shall so determine, I do not think the two dollars would be a very unreasonable tax. I think the article would bear two dollars; but I think there is some risk about it, after all. My opinion, deliberately formed, and that of the committee, was that $1.50 was as high as we could afford to go, with our present light on the subject. As I said before, we have been gaining light every day. Not long ago we thought twenty cents was a high tax; we have got now to $1.50; and I should not be surprised if in a short time we got it higher still, because it seems we expand in our ideas (whether we grow wiser or not) with the progress of time. Time only can tell whether it is wisdom to increase so much.

With regard to the other proposition that my friend from Massachusetts has made on the subject of manufactures, I will suggest to him that he cannot do it in a single clause by adding two per cent. or anything else. He must go over the thing item by item, and be prepared to go through and move an increase upon every one. They are not all fixed at five per cent.; they are five, three, two, and one, throughout; and if he undertakes to do it I trust he has a sufficient knowledge of all those items to decide wisely. I confess I have not. With all the study I have been able in the time I have had to give them I have not been able to acquire the information, and I have relied with very great confidence on the great labor and examination that was given to the bill by the Committee of Ways and Means. I believe they devoted themselves untiringly and with a close examination of facts in order to arrive at a right conclusion, and in many particulars I rested upon them. If the Senator is prepared with information which justifies him in going further, so be it.

He says that he represents a manufacturing community, which is true, and that many of the manufacturers are willing for you to put on ten per cent. I have no doubt of it at all, not the slightest. The larger the manufacturer is the more wealthy he is, and the greater stock he has on hand the more he is willing that you put on the stock. A tax of ten per cent. would be wonderfully for the benefit of the rich manufacturer, but very much against the interest of the small and poorer one. That is the simple truth of it. In the first place they make large sums on the amount of stock which they have accumulated, and they are able to stand it, because the more you put on, experience has shown, the more they will make. If you call it five per cent. they will tax their customers seven; if you call it ten they will tax their customers fifteen; experience has shown that that is the result. Therefore I place very little reliance on the subject of manufactures of cotton, or tobacco, or whisky, or anything else upon the recommendation of the very large and wealthy manufacturers who can stand anything and make their profits out of it at the expense of the community and of those whom they would very willingly crush.

Mr. POWELL. I have been very much struck with the latter part of the speech of the honorable Senator from Maine, and I think that in every respect it is correct. I think we have some evidence of that kind by the declarations of gentlemen who have large stocks of whisky on hand. I have no doubt those who have large stocks on hand would not care if you tax it four dollars a gallon at this hour.

I am of the opinion, however, Mr. President, that a tax of $2 or even $1.50 will yield to the Government less revenue than a small tax. I confess that I was a great deal astonished this evening when I heard the statement that was sent to the Secretary's table by the honorable Senator from Ohio read, showing the amount of production for the past five months, and then when the production for 1860 was read by the Senator from Indiana. I really had supposed that more whisky had been made in the past year than was made in the year 1860; but such does not seem to have been the fact. For some time past the price has been high. We thought that inducements existed to stimulate the manufacture of the article; it was believed that an increased tax would be laid and that on hand would be exempt. That of itself tended very much to stimulate the manufacture of whisky; and yet it appears that no more was made than in 1860.

I have no doubt, sir, that some people will drink whisky at any price, but I am equally sure that if you lay a tax of even $1.50 on whisky you will greatly diminish the consumption; and by doing that you will, of course, diminish the production. I am satisfied that less of it will be drank, and the people will resort to other and cheaper beverages. I believe that you would get more revenue from whisky in the next five years if you were not to tax it higher than sixty cents than if you tax it any higher sum. As I said the other day, I believe a dollar a gallon the very outside that you should tax it if revenue is the object; and I believe that when the matter is tested my opinions will be found to be true.

I am, therefore, opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. Indeed, I am opposed to that offered by the Committee on Finance. I think the tax should be so regulated as not to go over a dollar a gallon; indeed, if I thought I could carry the proposition I would advocate that the highest tax should be sixty cents. Not being able, in the present temper of the Senate, to carry that, I would not put it higher than a dollar. You might have for some months an amount less than that, if you chose, but that should be the outside amount. My own impression is that it would bring more revenue than it will if you put it to $1 50, and afterwards to $2. I know that this is an article off which we ought to raise as much revenue as we conveniently can, having due regard to the interests of the corn-growing region. I do not believe we ought to lay a tax upon it with a view to prevent the production of the article, for it is a very heavy interest in the western country. The corn, hog, and cattle interests in the valley of the Mississippi are very much interested in this subject of the production of whisky. I think we should have due regard to the great agricultural interests of the West, for they are all deeply connected with it. I therefore shall advocate even a lower tax than that proposed by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I wish to make a suggestion to my colleague, which, it seems to me, will be an improvement of his amendment. I am for his amendment precisely as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] said he was for it, because it is an improvement on the proposition of the committee; but it seems to me his amendment would be improved still further if it were so contrived as to bring the tax to bear more between October and January than it does; and for this reason: it is in October that the crops have come in, that the material for the distillery has accumulated; it is the best time for the distiller. The distiller through that period, from October to January, may make the most money, unquestionably. I start with that proposition. During the autumn, from October to January, is the harvest time of the distiller.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is no better than from January to March.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg your pardon; but even supposing it is no better than from January to March, we do propose to put a tax of $2 at January. Now, I propose to my colleague that he should alter his amendment in this way, so that it shall begin at $1 50, and from October to January it shall be $1 75, and from and after January, $2. Assuming, as the Senator from Maine suggests, that it is a good time for the distiller from January until March, I would put the tax of $2 upon him during that time; from October to January let him be taxed $1 75.

Mr. FESSENDEN, (to Mr. Wilson.) How much does your amendment raise from July?

Mr. SUMNER. My colleague's amendment begins at $1 25, and then from October to January it is $1 50. I propose that it should begin at $1 50, and from October to January it should be $1 75, and after January $2.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Senator from Massachusetts is greatly mistaken when he supposes that the distillers can make more from October to January than in any other season of the year. In the fall season of the year the distillers lay in their stock of corn, their hogs, and their cattle, from which they make their greatest profit. If you break down their establishments in January you destroy them utterly. They make their whole arrangements in November or October, when the corn begins to come in; they have their stock on hand, and they are compelled to carry on the distilleries till May or June. Hence it is that they are not able to stop the large establishments after they get under way until their stock is fattened and taken to market. Therefore, so far as the Senator's argument is concerned, it does not apply to these cases at all.

Mr. HOWE. As the yeas and nays have been called and I have got to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, I want to tell him why. It is not because I believe he proposes to put a higher duty on whisky than it will bear. I know of no reason why whisky will not pay $3 a gallon in this country. I am told it pays $2 80 in England; I am told it pays $5, and I was told so by very high authority. I have not any positive evidence as to what it does pay. My own understanding is that it pays $2 80.

Mr. COWAN. Two dollars and forty cents—ten shillings.

Mr. HOWE. The people who drink it in this country are as able to pay a heavy tax as the English whisky-drinking population are. Here whisky has no rivals; there it has several—more and better beer, more and better porter, and a great many cheaper wines than we have here to compete with; and if it can pay $2 40 there I do not know why it cannot pay $3 or $4 here; and therefore I do not refuse to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts because I believe it is a higher rate of duty than this article will bear.

My idea is that in settling this tax the first question the Senate ought to answer to itself is, how much tax can you put on so that with the aid of the new crop in September or October next the manufacturer can recommence the work of distillation and sell his product in competition with the stock on hand? That is the first question to be settled. Whisky made now pays sixty cents a gallon. It seems to me just as clear as the light of midday that all the tax you want to put on up to the time the new crop comes in ought to be put on now. If you think distillation can start at a dollar a gallon, or a dollar and a quarter a gallon, or a dollar and a half a gallon, you ought to put it on now, and let it stop there until the new crop comes in; and why? Because by leaving it off, whatever the increase is in October, you hold out just so much inducement to the manufacturer to crowd his distillery and keep producing between now and then, when the interest of the country is, as was explained the other day, that no more of the material which the Government wants for other purposes should be put into this article.

If it be conceded that you can start with $1 25 a gallon, you must understand that the manufacturer who wants to commence manufacturing in the fall puts the question to himself whether he can do so. He knows that there is a large quantity of this whisky on hand, that it has just so much advantage in the market as the difference between the tax it has paid and the tax we put on it. If you raise the tax to a dollar now, and it stands at that price on the 1st of October, then this stock unconsumed has an advantage in the market of forty cents, and to compete with the holders of that stock the manufacturer must make his whisky at forty cents less. But if you suppose that they can start with $1 25 then the difference is sixty-five cents a gallon.

If, however, you do not fix the rates so high but that the manufacturer can recommence distillation, then what can you do afterwards? Several Senators assume that in three months after that you can raise the duty again twenty-five cents. If that be so, I ask Senators if it is not better both for the Government and for the manufacturer, instead of levying a tax of $1 25 for three months and then putting on $1 50, to raise it ten cents every month? Then you get it up in the course of three months to thirty cents instead of twenty-five cents; and if the distillation is seven million gallons a month it has paid $700,000 to the Treasury for the first month, and $1,400,000 for the second month, and $2,100,000 for the third month. There is an aggregate of $4,200,000 that you get into the Treasury by raising it ten cents a month instead of letting it run at an even $1 25 for three months, and then putting it up a quarter of a dollar.

There is another advantage in raising it in that way. If you let it run at a fixed sum for three months, the speculator, whether he be a distiller or not, the man who has capital, has a great inducement to invest it in this article and hoard it, and thus to cripple the poorer manufacturer who has not that capital to use. He has this inducement, because every gallon that he sells when the three months come around will be worth twenty-five cents more in the market. But if you raise it ten cents at a time, and he saves say in the month of October a certain number of gallons, he has got to save that for three months before he can realize an increase on it, before the new rate is imposed. The leakage, the loss, the depreciation in whisky, I am told, is very nearly five per cent. a month. I am told that the average loss is about six per cent. on the transit of whisky from Illinois to New York. That is a serious discouragement in the way of this hoarding. The whisky that he saves in the second month, in November, pays an additional ten cents to the Government. Then he has but sixty days, to be sure, to hold that; there is but sixty days' depreciation to sustain; but he has paid an additional ten cents. That which he makes in December he suffers a depreciation on of only thirty days; but he has paid twenty cents additional tax on that; so that for the manufacturer it is materially better that you should raise this tax gradually and frequently than that you should raise it by large sums and at periods more remote from each other.

I shall therefore vote against every proposition which proposes to raise this duty once in three months twenty-five or fifty cents at a time. I am willing to put on the duty now at any sum which the Senate agrees will not prevent the manufacturers from starting their distilleries in the fall. I am willing then to raise it ten cents a month, and to continue to do so just as long as any one pleases, at least till it gets up as high as three dollars a gallon. I think for the reasons I have endeavored to state that that is the safest way in which we can get up to the maximum rate which this article will bear.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Morrill, Ramsey, Sumner, and Wilson—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Hale, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Richardson, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, and Wiley—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Conness, Dixon, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—17.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to amend the bill on page 59, section fifty-four, by striking out from line seven down to and including the word "gallon" in line fourteen, and as follows:

October, 1864, a duty of $1 on each and every gallon; on and after October 1, 1864, and prior to the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1 25 on each and every gallon; on and after the 1st day of January, 1865, a duty of $1 50 on each and every gallon.

And to insert:

July, 1865, a duty of $1 on each and every gallon; and on and after the 1st day of June, 1865, a duty of $1 50 on each and every gallon.

I desire to submit a very few remarks in favor of the amendment which I have proposed; but the Senate is thin to-night, and I would rather no vote would be had upon it.

Mr. COWAN. I think it is time to adjourn, and I will make that motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let us settle this question to-night. I really want to get through with the bill to-morrow.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senator from Maine will not insist on a vote to-night. There are several Senators absent, and this is an important question.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I know that. I am afraid the committee's proposition will lose by their absence, instead of gaining.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have some hopes of that myself; but it is fair that we should have on so important a question a full Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator must be aware that if we now adjourn and leave this question unsettled and open for debate, we cannot possibly get through with the bill to-morrow night, when it is important to close it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It has not been customary in our night sessions to take an important vote.

Mr. GRIMES. We have just taken an important vote.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What was that?

Mr. GRIMES. On the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not much afraid of that. I did not think the Senate would adopt that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Then the importance of a question depends on whether the Senator is afraid of it or not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But we are now coming to an important question, one which affects the people I represent very largely, and I hope a vote will not be taken to-night. I do not want to speak at any length on the amendment that I propose, and would just as lief, so far as that is concerned, speak now as at any future time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question will be on the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe there was a motion made to adjourn.

Mr. COWAN. I withdraw it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I must ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 9, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Davis, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Powell, Richardson, and Sumner—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The proposition which I have felt it to be my duty to submit to the Senate, is that from the 1st day of July, 1864, until the 1st day of June, 1865, the tax upon liquors distilled in the country shall be $1 a gallon, and after the 1st of June, 1865, $1 50 a gallon. I suppose every Senator is desirous of raising revenue, but the first question to be considered is whether this is a fair measure with a view to revenue. I do not think any Senator can say with confidence from the experience we have had under the past legislation that the revenue will be increased by going over a dollar on the gallon. The tables furnished by the Senator from Ohio show that since the enactment of the law two years since the production of liquor in the country has decreased; that for the nineteen months closing with April last the production was eighty-one million gallons, while for the twelve months ending June 1, 1860, the production was eighty-one million gallons; so that under the law taxing liquor it required nineteen months to produce the amount of whisky that was produced in twelve months in 1859-60. Then how can any Senator say that there is the same amount produced, whether it be taxed or not taxed? Something has caused a decrease in the production. What is that cause? Is it because the country has become more temperate in the use of it? I do not think any Senator can say that. The cause is in the fact that the price of liquor has gone up, not altogether owing to the fact that it was taxed twenty cents on the gallon, but in part owing to the fact that the increase of the currency has increased the price of this article with everything else. I do not say it is all chargeable to the fact that the tax has been imposed upon it. But the production has been decreased is the important point to be considered by Senators when they are voting upon this question with a view to volume.

But, sir, the important question to which I wish the attention of the Senate to be given is the effect upon a large interest which I represent—the corn-growing interest of the Northwest. Senators say that whisky will bear a tax of a dollar or a dollar and a half or two dollars, and I believe the Senator from Wisconsin expressed the opinion that perhaps it would bear a tax of $2 50 on the gallon. I ask Senators if they ask that question in respect to any other interest of the country?

The Senator from Massachusetts, in making his proposition, stated with great apparent generosity and frankness that he was willing to increase the tax upon New England manufactures to seven per cent.—a very liberal proposition. But what is that? It is an increase on the tax of 1862 of slightly over one hundred per cent. The proposition that I now submit to the Senate is to tax a western production five hundred per cent. more than it was taxed in 1862. The tax of 1862 was but twenty cents on the gallon. I propose a tax now of five hundred per cent. upon that; and is not that increase enough? When the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to increase the tax upon the production of his section of the country one hundred per cent. do I not make a sufficient answer to his liberality when I go five hundred per cent. upon a western production? I think this is too high. It is not according to my judgment that whisky should be taxed five hundred per cent. more than it was in 1862; but I see from the temper of the Senate that it is not worth while for us to ask less, and I have gone to what I think a very extreme figure in agreeing to one dollar on the gallon.

But Senators say it will bear this. I repeat the question, do Senators ask that in respect to any other proposed tax? When the Senator from Massachusetts proposes but seven or ten per cent. upon New England production, does he say that it will bear no more? Who in this Senate asks the question how much New England manufactures and Pennsylvania minerals will bear? I dare say that we might put twenty per cent. upon New England production, and it would bear it. It would bear it, because the people of the Northwest have to buy your cotton and your woolen goods. Twenty per cent. upon the productions of the mines of Pennsylvania perhaps would be borne, for the reason that the people of the West and of all sections of the country have to buy the iron that is produced in Pennsylvania, whatever it may cost. But you do not ask what it will bear. You ask the question in respect to every other interest, "What is right in view of the taxes that are imposed upon other productions?" and for a northwestern production I ask that you shall apply the same fair and equitable rule which you do in taxing every other interest in the country. If you say but five per cent. is a fair tax, not what it will bear, but a fair tax upon New England production, is it not right for me to say that when the tax upon a western production is increased five hundred per cent. that is enough?

Mr. President, I care but little about the interest of the distiller. There are not very many distillers; one hundred distilleries furnish a market for perhaps a thousand farms, ten thousand, thirty thousand farms. I look to the interest of the corn-grower. You say it will bear so much; but how? By increasing the price upon the consumer, and by taking away from the corn-grower the profit that he ought to make upon his labor. When you tax this interest I ask that you shall leave some margin for profit to the man who produces the corn which makes the whisky. Does any Senator dispute that a tax upon an article already manufactured is a tax upon every article of value that goes into that manufacture? Every New England Senator admits that. He admits it when he asks a free list or a low list in the tariff of those articles that are important for his manufacturing purposes. Do you not admit, then, according to the same reasoning which you apply in that class of legislation, that when you tax whisky you tax the corn that goes into the whisky?

Then I ask of Senators when they tax this article, that they shall leave some room for profit, not only to the distiller, which he ought to have, but to the corn-grower. Mr. President, I think we may well ask this now for the Northwest. As I suggested the other day, our market is cut off. Heretofore we have sold our corn down the Ohio river. We cannot find a market there any more. We must find our market somewhere, and if we bring our corn to the East the profit or labor on the northwestern farm is consumed in transporting that article into market. If it is converted into whisky, then it may be transported and find a market that will pay to the producer of the corn; but if you cut off this use of the corn, and compel us to seek a market now, what is our condition? No other section of the country is circumstanced just as the corn-growing region of the Northwest is, cut off from her usual market, a profitable market, a desirable market. We now ask that you shall leave us that production which enables us to find a market in another direction.

Mr. President, if Senators are willing to tax every other interest in the like proportion, then put whisky at $2 a gallon; but I am not content to sit quietly in the Senate and see an increase of from three to five per cent. upon the productions of another region of the country, and five hundred per cent. refused as too low upon a northwestern production. When it is asked that it shall be put on a thousand per cent., I think I have a right to object. We want some profit left, not only to the producer of the whisky, but to the man who raises the corn.

I make this appeal to the Senate, to the sense of right and of fairness on the part of the Senate. I have conceded, and I think the Northwest is willing to concede on this floor, a fair tax upon whisky, such as will bring you all that you are sure you can get by any other tax. You can put a high tax on this article and stop the production, but you will not get any revenue. I understand every Senator to say that his vote will be governed by the consideration of producing a revenue. A high duty may cut off production, may injure us, but not benefit the Government. I ask a fair thing. This proposition according to the opinion of many Senators will give to the Government all the revenue that she can realize from this article. Go higher and you will get less revenue, but you will injure a section of the country which under the circumstances ought not to be injured. I ask for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Richardson, and Sherman—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Clark, Cowan, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wilson—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Harding, Hicks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CARLILE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 3, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the report of the Postmaster General, and appendix, be printed for the use of the Post Office Department.

The resolution, under the rules, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PAY OF CONTESTANTS.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House referred to the Committee of Elections a resolution for the compensation of two contestants for seats upon this floor. I do this for two reasons: the resolution is of such a nature that it cannot be reported back except when the committee is called in its regular order; it is not a question of privilege and cannot be reported at any time; and secondly, there is no occasion to refer such resolutions to the Committee of Elections, for the House understands the merits of these cases just as well without reference as they will after reference. The Committee of Elections have presented their views time and again on the subject. I think, therefore, that the resolution had better be now disposed of. It may be weeks before the committee is called in the ordinary way for reports. I demand the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed, out of the contingent fund of the House, to pay John H. McHenry, Jr., and John H. Birch, the mileage of a member for one session, and monthly pay from the beginning of this session, for contesting the seats of Hon. George H. Yeman and Hon. Austin A. King.

Mr. WILSON moved to strike out the name of John H. Birch.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the whole subject be laid upon the table.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 49.

Mr. GRINNELL demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Blow, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas F. Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McIntoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—66.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Anderson, Bailly, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Perry, Prun, Robinson, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—60.

So the whole subject was laid upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the subject was laid upon the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays upon the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 62, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Blow, Broomall, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Gooch, Grinnell, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Longyear, Marvin, McIntoe, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Windom, and Woodbridge—62.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Anderson, Bailly, Blaine, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, McAllister, McDowell, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Pendleton, Prun, William H. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Smith, John B. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Thomas, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—61.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

During the vote,

Mr. ALLISON stated that his colleague, Mr. KASSON, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

INSPECTORS OF STEAMBOATS.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, from a committee of conference, made the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 426) to create an additional supervising inspector of steamboats and two local inspectors of steamboats for the collection district of Memphis, Tennessee, and two local inspectors for the collection district of Oregon, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their first amendment.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

Z. CHANDLER,

J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. B. WASHBURNE,

THOMAS D. ELIOT,

W. A. DUTCHINS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. FENTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois explain the effect of the report?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The committee recommend that the Senate recede from their first amendment which struck out that provision of the House bill abolishing the board of inspection at Wheeling. The committee also recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to the Senate amendment in relation to bringing the inspectors of hulls of the smaller class of steamboats under the steamboat law, and agree to the same.

I demand the previous question upon agreeing to the report.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL EXPENSES OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to have the bill printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN. To avoid the necessity of reading this bill now, I suggest that the points of order which may be raised to this bill may be made in Committee of the Whole the same as if the bill were read and the points of order raised now.

Mr. STEVENS. Will not the bill be opened to points of order when it comes up for consideration?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not if it is now referred to a Committee of the Whole. I wish to have it, by general consent, opened to points of order the same as if it was now read in the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not understand how that can be done.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent to reserve the point of order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object. I insist upon the bill being read. It contains provisions not in accordance with law, and I shall raise the point of order on everything which is not intended to carry out existing laws.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. As the gentleman from Vermont desires to proceed with the consideration of the tariff bill, if this bill can be postponed I will not insist upon its being read at this time.

The SPEAKER. If the House pass over this bill now, the question will be upon seconding the demand for the previous question upon the unfinished business pending last evening in relation to a land grant to Michigan.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman from Vermont allow this bill to go to the Committee of the Whole with an understanding that the points of order may be raised there?

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose we can move to postpone the further consideration of this bill, and I move it be postponed until Wednesday next, and be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will agree to that, not waiving, however, my right to have the bill read when it comes up.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to having it postponed, with the understanding that the points may be raised when the bill comes up.

Mr. PENDLETON. I make no objection to reserving points of order which may properly come up on the third reading of the bill; but I object to raising those points of order which were waived on the first and second reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Illinois raised the point of order in time.

The bill was then postponed until Wednesday next, and ordered to be printed, reserving the right to raise the points of order at that time.

GRANT OF LANDS TO MICHIGAN.

The question recurred, as the next order of business, on seconding the demand made last evening for the previous question upon the bill (S. No. 250) to amend an act entitled "An act making a grant of alternate sections of public lands to the State of Michigan to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, and for other purposes."

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would ask the gentleman from Michigan if there is any limit to the time in which this road shall be built?

Mr. UPSON. There is a limitation to the year 1866, leaving two years unexpired.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will put in a provision that the time shall not be extended. I think the bill may now be construed so as to allow the road to be built during an indefinite period.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether this bill does not give additional privileges to the company in the selection of lands?

Mr. UPSON. The original act allowed the company to go within six miles of the road, or, where the land could not be found in that distance, within fifteen miles. This bill, following the precedent in the cases of Iowa, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, extends the right to make up the deficiency within twenty miles.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I understand the bill gives the company the right to select better lands elsewhere if they do not find good lands within the twenty miles.

Mr. UPSON. I would say in reply to the gentleman from Vermont that they can only go outside of the six miles to make up any deficiency, just like all other railroads which have received land grants from the Government.

Mr. MORRILL. And of course in making up the deficiency, if they can find better lands within twenty miles than within fifteen they will take them.

Mr. SLOAN. They can only go outside of the limits prescribed by the original act in case they cannot find lands within the original limits, and then they are confined to the odd sections, so that they have no chance to select the best lands outside of the original grant.

Mr. MORRILL. I understand that this bill has not been considered by any committee of the House, and that the Committee on Public Lands of the House had under consideration a similar proposition, which was rejected, as I hope this will be.

Mr. UPSON. The Committee on Public Lands have informally considered this measure, and have no objection to it.

Mr. MORRILL. I had my information from a member of the Committee on Public Lands, and I supposed it to be correct.

Mr. CRAVENS. I must object to further debate. I believe that no debate is in order.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will now move an amendment, with the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Urson.]

Mr. UPSON. I will withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to add to the bill the following proviso:

Provided, further, That the time prescribed in the original act within which this road shall be built shall not be extended.

I now demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. Will the gentleman let me move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Public Lands?

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

Mr. UPSON. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will permit the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to answer the question of the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I withdraw the previous question for that purpose.

Mr. JULIAN. I have been absent from the House for several days, but I understand the fact to be that the Committee on Public Lands unanimously agreed to this bill provided there was no extension of the time within which the road is to be built. It was only upon that condition that we agreed to report the bill, and if that provision is not in this bill it ought to be amended.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I wish to say that I am on the Committee on Public Lands, but I am not aware that this bill has been before that committee since it came from the Senate. It has certainly never been submitted to me, and there must be some mistake in the statement that that committee unanimously indorsed this bill. A similar project was at one time before the committee, but they did not favor it, and I will say that one serious objection I have to it is that it proposes to give lands in the northern portion of the State to build a road in the southern portion of the State where there are no lands.

Mr. UPSON. The bill has been changed in that respect, and I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. UPSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF CURRENCY BILL.

Mr. HOOPER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That five thousand copies of the act to provide a national currency, &c., be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the House, and two thousand copies for the use of the Treasury Department.

ADJOURNMENT FOR TEN DAYS.

Mr. SMITH asked the consent of the House to introduce the following concurrent resolution:

With a view to afford time to the Doorkeeper to have the ventilators of the Hall cleaned and prepared for warm weather,

Ordered, (the Senate concurring,) That when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday, the 13th instant.

Several MEMBERS objected.

RACHEL MILLS.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill granting a pension to Rachel Mills, widow of Peter Mills, deceased, late a major in the United States Army; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I now propose to move to go into committee, but before doing so will move that all general debate upon the tariff bill be closed in one minute after its consideration is resumed in committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SCHENCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 494) to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN stated that general debate having been closed, the bill would be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. MORRILL moved in line thirty-six of page 2 to strike out "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof "eight;" so as to make it read:

On molasses from sugar-cane eight cents per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move in line one, page 3, after the word "that" to amend by striking out the word "from" and inserting in its place the word "on;" so that it will read "that on and after the day," &c. I shall make the same amendment wherever the word occurs under like circumstances in the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to amend in line seventeen by increasing the tax on wines valued at not over fifty cents per gallon from twenty to forty cents per gallon. If the amendment shall be adopted I will follow it up by moving to increase the duty on wines valued at more than fifty cents and not more than $1 a gallon, from fifty to eighty cents per gallon; and on wines valued at over $1 a gallon, from $1 to $1 50 per gallon.

Mr. Chairman, I think this article will very well bear this tax as well as it will the tax in the bill. It is well understood that most of the wines imported evade their proper duty by being valued at much less than their real value. To impose the additional duty I have proposed will afford, perhaps, some little protection to the producers of domestic wines in some portions of the country—as a gentleman suggests, particularly in California, and especially in my district. [Laughter.] I therefore propose this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If it should be we should present the anomaly of taxing these low-priced medicinal wines at higher rates than are imposed on those of the most costly and luxurious character. These low-priced wines are now taxed in the bill not less than 65 per cent. ad valorem, and I do not think we can properly raise the price higher. Twenty cents per gallon and then 25 per cent. in addition on these lower-priced wines, costing less than fifty cents per gallon, is more than double the rate they have been heretofore taxed.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. This amendment having been rejected I will not propose the others indicated by me.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to amend the following proviso:

Provided further, That all imitations of brandy, or spirits, or of wines, and all wines imported by any names whatever, shall be subject to the duty provided for the genuine article which it is intended to represent.

So as to make it read as follows:

Provided further, That all imitations of brandy, or spirits, or of wines, imported by any names whatever, shall be subject to the highest rate of duty provided for the genuine article respectively intended to be represented, and in no case less than $1 per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move on page 5, section three, line one, to strike out the word "from" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "on;" so that it will read:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That on and after the day and year aforesaid, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the goods, wares, and merchandise hereby enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move in section three, page 6, line thirteen, to strike out the word "four" and in lieu thereof to insert "two;" so that it will read:

On bar iron, rolled or hammered, comprising flats not less than one inch or more than six inches wide, nor less than three eighths of an inch or more than two inches thick; rounds not less than three fourths of an inch nor more than two inches in diameter; and squares not less than three fourths of an inch nor more than two inches square, one cent per pound. On bar iron, rolled or hammered, comprising flats less than three eighths of an inch thick or more than six inches wide; rounds less than three fourths of an inch or more than two inches in diameter; and squares less than three fourths of an inch or more than two inches square, one cent and one fourth per pound.

Provided, That all iron in slabs, blooms, loops, or other forms, less finished than iron in bars, and more advanced than pig iron, except castings, shall be rated as iron in bars, and pay a duty accordingly: And provided further, That 35 per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move to add the following:

Flats less than one fourth of an inch in thickness, and rounds and squares less than seven sixteenths of an inch thick, also slit rods and all other descriptions of rolled or hammered iron not otherwise provided for, one cent and one half per pound.

Mr. Chairman, I will say to the Committee of Ways and Means that by adopting this amendment a subsequent portion of the bill may be stricken out. If the amendment be adopted I will at the proper time move to strike out, on page 8, lines fifty-three to fifty-six, inclusive; also, lines sixty to sixty-two, inclusive, on same page. My object is to increase the duty on small iron, less than seven sixteenths, used by wire-drawers and wood-screw manufacturers, the rate of which as proposed, in my judgment, is not in proportion to rates on larger-sized iron. Indeed, the protection on this small iron will be less, considering the internal revenue tax and increased tariff on the raw material, than it is under the present tariff. I cannot suppose the committee intended this, and trust they will correct what is obviously an injustice to the makers of this class of iron and a discrimination against them.

Mr. MORRILL. On this description of iron the tariff was originally $20 a ton of 2,240 pounds, and on larger descriptions of iron $15 a ton. As the bill is reported it is $1 25 per hundred pounds, making nearly $8 a ton more than under the tariff of 1861, and it is taxed in the internal revenue bill, I think, only $6 per ton.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Do I understand that the present duty on that description of iron is only $20 per ton?

Mr. MORRILL. That is one cent and a quarter per pound.

Mr. GRISWOLD. What does the present tariff make it?

Mr. MORRILL. Under the former internal revenue bill the manufacturers of this description of iron were paying five per cent., a very much larger duty than they pay under a specific duty of $6 a ton. There was a mistake which ought to have been remedied, and it may have been by the Senate. The increase of duty provided by this bill is from $20 on the gross ton to $25 on the net ton on small iron, and from $15 on the gross ton to $20 on the net ton on large iron.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read, as follows:

On slit rods and all other descriptions of rolled or hammered iron not otherwise provided for, one cent and one fourth per pound.

Mr. HALE. I move to increase the duty from one cent and one fourth per pound to one cent and a half.

Mr. Chairman, the bill does not increase the duty as much as the internal tax is increased in this description of iron, and for that purpose it is necessary to adopt my amendment. If the duty be increased from one and one fourth to one and one half it will make this bill in this particular harmonize with the internal revenue bill; and I hope that my amendment will be accepted by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope that the amendment of my colleague will be adopted. I know that in practice iron merchants go to Pittsburg to buy common iron, as it is called, and to New York for fine iron. We can make fine iron here, but to do so this duty must be made one cent and one fourth.

Mr. MORRILL. This section includes "iron of all other descriptions." I suppose it would be indispensable for my friend from Pennsylvania to show that he was on the alert when this section on iron came up; or his constituents would find fault with him. I do not find any fault with him for that; but now the speech has been made, I hope that the House will let the bill stand as it is.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I move, in the same paragraph, after the word "rod," to insert the words "all iron, round or square, smaller than seven sixteenths."

Mr. MORRILL. If that be inserted there will be two places where the same description of iron will be provided for, and at different rates of duty.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the following:

On screws, commonly called wood screws, two inches or over in length, six and one half cents per pound; less than two inches in length, nine and one half cents per pound.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend by striking out "six and one half" and inserting "one and one half." It is known that under the present tariff of 1862 there have been no wood screws brought into this country. It is known further that a single company has a monopoly of the manufacture of these screws in this country. It is further demonstrable that one year ago the cost of manufacturing these screws, two inches and over in length, did not exceed forty cents per gross, and that while the manufacturers were manufacturing them at forty cents per gross, they were selling them at $1 60 per gross, realizing a profit upon each gross of $1 20.

Now, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means propose to increase the tariff upon this article from one and a half cent per pound to six and a half cents. What is the purpose of this? Certainly not to get revenue, for at a duty of one and a half cent we derived no revenue from it. What, again I ask, is the purpose of this increased duty? It is that the gentlemen engaged in this manufacture may increase their profits upon their sales. A tax is proposed of six and a half cents per pound, which, on screws of two inches and over in length, will be equal to a duty of thirty-nine cents per gross. The purpose is to enable this company who have the monopoly of this manufacture to add to their profits of one dollar and twenty cents per gross an additional profit of twenty-six cents per gross.

I ask if it is fair and just that they should be thus protected? Is it fair and just that those who are compelled to use this article—and no man in this country is so humble that he is not occasionally obliged to use them—shall pay this enormous profit to swell the revenues of this monopoly? It is wrong in principle. And I discover, upon examining this bill, that the same pernicious principle runs throughout many of its provisions. This is not a bill to raise revenue, but to protect manufacturers. The purpose is not to raise revenue, but to enable those engaged in manufacturing to compel the consumer to pay whatever tax may be assessed upon this article. I say it is wrong in principle. They ought to bear their fair proportion of the burden of taxation. The mere fact that they are engaged in the manufacture of this article is no reason why they should not be compelled to bear their fair proportion of taxation.

If the purpose be to derive revenue from the duty placed upon wood screws, you must lower the tax so as to enable the foreign manufacturer to compete with them. If we have not been able to derive a revenue at one and a half cent per pound, how much less at six and a half cents! It is a wrong principle, and it runs throughout many of these sections.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman has made a very excellent speech, but it is in the wrong place, and he should have fitted it to some other article, for it so happens that we have not proposed to raise the duty upon wood screws at all, for this rate here proposed is precisely as the law is now.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the act of 1862.

Mr. MORRILL. I state the fact, and the gentleman will find that it is so; and I will give him time to study it out.
